NILES' WEEKLY REGISTER.

No. 1 of VOL. VII.] BALTIMORE, SATURDAY, SEPTEMBER 10, 1814. [WHOLE NO. 157.]

Hec olim meminisse juvabit.—VIRGIL.

Printed and published by H. NILES, South-st. next door to the Merchants' Coffee House, at $5 per ann

No. 1 of Volume VII.

CONDITIONS OF THE WEEKLY REGISTER.

This paper is issued every Saturday, at Baltimore, at $5 per annum, payable in advance; and makes two heavy volumes a year.

It is packed with so great care that it reaches the most distant post offices in safety. In evidence of this—a gentleman living 1100 miles hence, informs that he has never lost a paper. But missing numbers, to a reasonable amount, are gratuitously supplied; whether lost in the mail or otherwise accidentally destroyed, application being made therefor, free of expense to the editor.

The work may be had from its commencement, or from the beginning of any volume, the current year in advance being added to the charge for the volumes desired, as follows:

From No. 1 (Sept. 7, 1811) to 156, or (Sept. 1814) three years, $15—advance to Sept. 1815, $5—20 dollars.

From No. 27, being No. 1 of vol. II, or March 7, 1812, 2½ years, to Sept. 1814, $12.50—advance to Sept. 1815, vol. 5—$17.50. And so on.

Vol. III. began Sept. 5, 1812; vol. IV. March 6, 1813; vol. V. Sept. 4, 1813; vol. VI. March 5, 1814—vol. VII. commences with this number.

A heavy extra supplement of 12 sheets was published for the 5th volume. The price of it is $1; which must be added to the above by those who desire it. It will, therefore, cost $21 to obtain a complete set; which may be forwarded by mail to any part of the union at a trifling expence. This supplement contains a great deal of highly interesting and important matter, and attaches as well to any other volume as to the fifth, having its own index with it.

Further patronage is respectfully solicited. No drudgery shall be spared to deserve it, by registering the events of these important times, as well as to present other matter of laborious composition, as usual. Grateful for favors received, and jealous of the good opinion held of this work, our old and approved course shall be pursued. Conscious in the rectitude of his motives, the barkings of faction shall not tempt the editor to turn to the right hand or to the left; and, while a free spot remains to fix a press upon, and he has the power to support it, he humbly trusts the REGISTER will continue to vindicate the "principle of the revolution," and maintain the constitution of the United States, without regard or reference to individuals or parties. All sorts of personal controversies shall be avoided, as heretofore; and every attention be excited to embody the events of the day, in order, harmony and truth.

The support of the friends of the WEEKLY REGISTER is particularly needed. The immediate presence of the enemy severely affects the usual proceeds of the establishment, and we must look to those removed from the theatre of war for the means of meeting our increased expences. The advance, with the payment of what may be due, if any, is earnestly solicited of all; remittances may be made by mail, as usual, and at the risk of the editor, to Baltimore, from which he has no present prospect of moving. And even if he should, matters are so arranged that the mails will have their usual safety. The establishment of the REGISTER is such that, in any morally possible event the work will be continued. We speak positively on those things on account of several late communications.

Editorial Address.

At the commencement of a volume, it has been our custom to indulge in some speculations on the past, or anticipations of the future. In the noise and bustle of our city, with the general derangement of business, we have little opportunity for that quiet and retirement that we delighted to appropriate to such objects; and what we would or might say must be postponed until a more convenient season. On one event, only, shall we offer a remark.

The hate with which we have always said Great Britain regarded us, is now exhibiting by a Gothic-like war, which the late strange events in Europe enables her to carry on with extraordinary force and energy. The barriers with which civilized nations have circumscribed their military operations, are cast down by the foe; and the contest, began for unalienable rights on the sea, is becoming a struggle for liberty and property on the land. The shores of the Chesapeake are lighted by the flames of farm houses and cottages, hitherto respected in war; and the fruits of the earth are wontonly consumed by the invader's torch. Whatever of private property pleases him, he lays hold of as prize; and wickedly destroys what he cannot carry away. Household furniture has been a favorite object of his vengeance, and negroes and tobacco are his darling spoils! His late capture of Washington City is an honor to the valor of his soldiery; but his conduct in burning the capitol, the president's house and the public offices, is a disgrace that he will not wipe away, more easily than we shall the — something that permitted the irruption. The capitals of the greatest empires and kingdoms of the old world were frequently captured by the contending parties, in the late wars. The outlaw, Bonaparte, entered Lisbon, Madrid, Amsterdam, Berlin, Vienna, [several times] Moscow, Tülin, Rome, Naples, and the capitals of ten or fifteen of the minor states of Europe, but never, in the case of the Kremlin excepted, destroyed a public building undevoted to military purposes; and that was not demolished until it was evident that the people of Moscow would themselves destroy the city. Let us look at it fairly: See the capitulation of Alexandria in the last number of the REGISTER; and tell me, on what occasion that "relentless tyrant" exacted so severe terms on a people at his mercy, as the Scotchman, captain Gordon has done? We heard much of the contributions he imposed; but never did a city that submitted—that threw itself on his clemency, suffer like Alexandria. It is no matter that the conduct of the Alexandrians was base and pusillanimous, so as to excite rather the contempt than the pity of their countrymen—for it does not affect the principle of the terms offered by the enemy to a defenceless, non-resisting place. It is an act that the most furious and unfeeling of all the men that the events of the French revolution brought to power under Bonaparte, would pronounce savage and base; and contrary to every thing that should govern an honorable enemy. Ransack the history of the last twenty years, and behold all the interesting incidents that that fruitful period affords—follow Napoleon from Caïro to Moscova, and you will not find a single parallel for the proceedings of the “religious and magnanimous” British at Washington and Alexandria. I bring forward Bona-parte, not to excuse him; but to condemn the hypocrisies that trumpeted forth his enormities to excuse their own, ten-fold more cruel and barbarous. The scales are falling from the eyes of our people; if the blaze of the capitol shall enlighten their mind, and remove their prejudice, so that they may see the character of our enemy as it really is—the present safety and future peace of the United States, is cheaply purchased, by the capture of Washington and destruction of the public buildings thereat.—The capitals of every power in Europe—London, Stockholm and Constantinople, from peculiar circumstances excepted, have fallen into the hands of their enemies; and treaties have been dictated at some of them at the will of the conqueror. Our capital has also been polluted by a triumphant enemy. We ought to have prevented it—but it is a common lot—it was evacuated with precipitation—and has had no other effect than to rouse the nation to arms; and we hope, to give energy where, indeed, it was wanted. It will make a great noise in England; for John Bull will easily believe the city to be ten miles square; but much will he wonder, if one shall say to him, that it contained only 8,000 inhabitants, and had less weight in the affairs of the nation, except by the mere residence of the functionaries of the government, than the ruined house at Old Sarum.

The times are interesting and, indeed, momentous. It seems the fixed determination of the enemy, profiting by the peculiar circumstances of Europe, and of his own military force, to attempt to dragoon us into “unconditional submission.” But there is a spirit in man that resists abused power. We shall become an united people; and with the resources we possess, will fritter down his forces, “a little here and a little there;” and, spite of his strength, teach him that the homes of freemen shall not be disturbed with impunity. A pity, indeed, is it, if we have not as good materials to repel an intruder as Spain!—What is to be seen at Baltimore, Philadelphia, and New-York shews, that we are not yet prepared to abandon one iota of our just rights; and, I trust in God, we never shall be. Fiat justitia ruat cælum. THE REPUBLIC SHALL LIVE! and the people be led to virtue, to patriotism, to a NATIONAL CHARACTER and HOME FEELING, by the “events of the war.” The defects of our system, or the errors of our practice, shall be discovered by experience, (sometimes, indeed a “dear school”), and our strength, and the best way of applying it, be ascertained as our wants demand its exertion. Nothing is to be despaired of by those determined to effect an honorable purpose. But in such determination is involved an exercise of all our natural or acquired faculties—and, if the people do not bring forward their means to support the government they themselves have established—they must expect to fail in this contest for their homes and fire-sides; and prepare themselves to become “hewers of wood and drawers of water” to the spoilers of “peace, liberty, and safety.” Our cause is just, and it who established civil and religious freedom in America will sustain it, if we deserve the rich heritage. Courage, then! let every one come forward in the way that he can best serve the nation, and the end shall be glorious; though inconveniences and sufferings must be encountered. Let faction cease—let party moderate its warmth—and political peace be established until the foreign war is done. “DON’T GIVE UP THE SHOT!”

Events of the War.

BY THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA. A PROCLAMATION.

Whereas the enemy by a sudden incursion have succeeded in invading the capital of the nation, defended at the moment by troops less numerous than their own, and almost entirely of the militia: during their possession of which, though for a single day only, they wantonly destroyed the public edifices having no relation in their structure to operations of war, nor used at the time for military annoyance; some of these edifices being also costly monuments of taste and of the arts, and others depositories of the public archives, not only precious to the nation as the memorials of its origin and its early transactions, but interesting to all nations, as contributions to the general stock of historical instruction and political science.

And whereas, advantage has been taken of the loss of a fort, more immediately guarding the neighbouring town of Alexandria, to place the town within the range of a naval force, too long and too much in the habit of abusing its superiority wherever it can be applied, to require, as the alternative of a general conflagration, an undisturbed plunder of private property, which has been executed in a manner peculiarly distressing to the inhabitants who had, inconsiderately, cast themselves upon the justice and generosity of the victor:

And whereas, it now appears, by a direct communication from the British commander on the American station, to be his avowed purpose to employ the force under his direction “in destroying and laying waste such towns and districts upon the coast as may be found assailable;” adding to this declaration the insulting pretext that it is in retaliation for a wonton destruction committed by the army of the United States in Upper Canada, when it is notorious, that no destruction has been committed, which, notwithstanding the multiplied outrages previously committed by the enemy, was not unauthorised, and promptly shown to be so; and that the United States have been as constant in their endeavors to reclaim the enemy from such outrages, by the contrast of their own example, as they have been ready to terminate, on reasonable conditions, the war itself:

And whereas, these proceedings and declared purposes, which exhibit a deliberate disregard of the principles of humanity, and the rules of civilized warfare, and which must give to the existing war, a character of extended devastation and barbarism, at the very moment of negotiations for peace, invited by the enemy himself, leave no prospect of safety to any thing within the reach of his predatory and incendiary operations, but in manifold and universal determination to chastise and expel the invader:

Now, therefore, I, James Madison, president of the United States, do issue this my proclamation, exhorting all the good people thereof, to unite their hearts and hands in giving effect to the ample means possessed for that purpose. I enjoin it on all officers, civil and military, to exert themselves in executing the duties with which they are respectively charged. And more especially, I require the officers commanding the respective military districts, to be vigilant and alert in providing for the defence thereof; for the more effectual accomplishment of which, they are authorised to call to the defence of exposed and threatened places portions of the militia most convenient thereto, whether they be or be not parts of the quotas detached for the service of the United States under requisitions of the general government.

On an occasion which appeals so forcibly to the Proud feelings and patriotic devotion of the American people, none will forget what they owe to themselves; what they owe to their country and the high destinies which await it; what to the glory acquired by their fathers, in establishing the independence which is now to be maintained by their sons, with the augmented strength and resources with which time and Heaven had blessed them.

In testimony whereof, I have hereunto set my hand and caused the seal of the United States to be fixed to these presents.

Done at the city of Washington, the first day of September in the year of our Lord, 1814, and of the independence of the United States the 39th. JAMES MADISON.

By the president,

FOURTH MILITARY DISTRICT.—Head quarters, Philadelphia, Aug. 26, 1814.

GENERAL ORDER.—The militia of the city of Philadelphia, who have volunteered their services, and the militia who have been drafted, detailed and organized under the requisition of the president of the United States, of the fourth of July last, and general orders of the commander in chief of Pennsylvania, of the 22nd of the same month, will parade this morning at 10 o'clock, in Sixth-street, right on Chesnut-street, equipped completely for the field.

By order of general Bloomfield.

AFTER ORDERS.

The captains will proceed with their companies with all possible expedition to Kennet's square, Chester county, where they will encamp and be mustered.

The contractor will supply provisions on the returns of the commanding officer of companies, until further orders.

The quarter-master-general will furnish transportation. By order of general Bloomfield, WILLIAM DUANE, Adjutant general.

NEW-JERSEY. Head-Quarters, Trenton, Aug. 29, 1814.—The demonstrations of the enemy must now evince to every reflecting man, a determined hostility to the freedom and independence of America. That their proposition for peace is insidious, designed to lull us into security, and paralyze the efforts of the nation. The Gothic barbarity exercised in the demolition of public edifices unconnected with war, manifest their envy and hatred of our prosperity, and the practical freedom and independence of our government. We have no choice left but submission to a haughty unjust foe, or a manly resistance. If the enemy are not at our own doors, they are at our neighbors, affording us at once admonition to be in readiness, and time for preparation. It behoves us, therefore, to avail ourselves of this circumstance, to put ourselves in a posture of defence. The commander in chief, therefore solemnly calls on the whole body of the militia of the state, to prepare themselves with every weapon of defence within their reach, to turn their immediate attention to perfecting themselves in the art of war—to be in readiness to march on the shortest notice, to protect every thing dear to freemen—to shield their wives and their children, their fire-sides and their altars, from the ferocity of a barbarous army, collected from the outcasts of Europe, and the filth of the West India Islands, and disembogued on our shores, for the purpose of compelling the free born sons of America to absolute submission to the will of a proud, unjust nation, a corrupt ministry, and a profligate prince.

The commander in chief enjoins it on the commanders of divisions, brigades, regiments, battalions, squadrons, troops and companies, to use every exertion within their power to be in readiness for actual service. At the same time he has to inform them that he has used, and is now using, every means within the compass of his resources to supply the deficiency in munitions of war, and which will be brought into action in a manner best calculated for practical use. The commander in chief thinks it scarcely necessary to remind the intelligent militia of New Jersey, that the invaluable legacy of our freedom was transmitted to us by the patriots of our revolution; that it is a pious duty to their memory to preserve it unimpaired, and transmit it as a patrimonial inheritance to our children. We have reason to believe that the same just and beneficent Deity that preserved our country amid the perils and vicissitudes of the revolution, will still save it from the malignant vengeance with which it is at this time threatened: Should we for a moment hesitate to suffer privations, abandon our imaginary pursuits of wealth, suspend political dissensions, and unanimously draw our swords with an unalterable determination never to sheathe them until our country is safe, we are unworthy the high title of freemen and fit only for slaves. WILLIAM PENNINGTON.

PENNSYLVANIA. General Orders.—The landing upon our shores by the enemy hordes of marauders, for the purpose avowedly to create by plunder, burning and general devastation, all possible individual and public distress, gives scope for action to the militia of Pennsylvania to repel that foe, and with just indignation seek to avenge the unprovoked wrongs heaped on our unoffending country. The militia generally within the counties of Dauphin, Lebanon, Berks, Schuylkill, York, Adams, and Lancaster, and that part of Chester county which constitutes the 2d brigade of the 3d division, and these corps particularly who when danger first threatened, patriotically tendered their services in the field, are earnestly invited to rise (as on many occasions Pennsylvania has heretofore done) superior to local feeling and evasions that might possibly be drawn from an imperfect military system, and to repair with that alacrity which duty commands, and it is fondly hoped inclination will prompt, to the several places of brigade or regimental rendezvous that shall respectively be designated by the proper officer, and thence to march to the place of general rendezvous.

Pennsylvanians, whose hearts must be gladdened at the recital of the deeds of heroism achieved by their fellow-citizen soldiers now in arms on the lake frontier, and within the enemy's country, now the occasion has occurred, will with ardor seek and punish that same implacable foe now marauding on the Atlantic shores of two of our sister states.—Under these impressions, and confident that obedience will be given to the pressing call of our country, the commander in chief issues the following

GENERAL ORDERS.

HARRISBURG, 26th AUG. 1814.

To John M. Hyneman, Adjutant General.

You are commanded, in consequence of the requisition from the constituted authorities of the union, to have prepared for marching, and to have marched to Yorktown, the place of rendezvous, 5000 men, Pennsylvania militia, from the 2d brigade of the 3d division, and from the 4th, 5th, and 6th divisions, which detachment is to consist of volunteers who have, or who may tender their services, of flank companies, infantry and riflemen, who are to march in companies, and of drafted militia designated for service under general orders of the 22d July last past, which shall be organized into one division and two brigades (if not otherwise directed) on the 5th day of September next, agreeably to law and conformably to the regulations prescribed for the United States army.

For the command of which division I designate major-general Nathan Watson, and brigadiers general John Foster and John Addams. The major-general and the officers and men under him, are to obey the commands and execute the orders of general William Winder, commandant for the United States, within the 10th military district.

The troops may be marched from York either in division after organization, or in smaller bodies before organization, if it further the service and general Winder shall so direct; and to such place as by him shall be designated.

Term of service to be six months unless sooner discharged by the authority of the United States.

SIMON SNYDER,

Governor of the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania.

N. R. BOILEAU, aid-de-camp

GENERAL ORDERS.

HARRISBURG, 27TH AUG. 1814.

The recent destruction of the capitol of the United States, the threatened and probable conflagration of the metropolis of a sister state, and the general threatening aspect of affairs, warranting the opinion that an attack is meditated by the enemy on the shores of the Delaware; the governor, to guard against surprise, and to have ready an efficient force of freemen to repel the enemy in case of such an event, orders and directs the militia generally, within the counties of Philadelphia, Bucks, Montgomery, Delaware, Chester, Lancaster, Dauphin, Lebanon, Berks, Schuylkill, Lehigh, Northampton and Pike (in addition to those drafted and designated for the service of the United States under the orders of the 22d July, who are already subject to the orders of brigadier-general Bloomfield) to be held in readiness to march at a moment's warning to such place as may be designated in subsequent orders that will issue if the exigencies of our country shall require.

The several brigade inspectors within their respective bounds, are commanded to execute promptly this order. The generals and other officers are urged to assist in the providing of equipments for the men. Those for whom arms cannot be found within the respective brigade bounds, will, it is presumed, be furnished by the United States, at the place of rendezvous.

It is confidently hoped, the ardor and love of country which pervades the hearts of Pennsylvanians at the present alarming crisis, will induce many to form themselves into volunteer corps, and immediately to march for Philadelphia. It is thus a proper spirit to resist an intolerant foe will be evinced, and many difficulties obviated. The governor promises himself the satisfaction of meeting there an host, nerved with resolution to live free or die, in defence of their liberties and their country. He will act with them in any capacity for which his talents shall fit him.

SIMON SNYDER,

Governor of the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania.

N. B. BOILEAU, aid-de-camp.

VIRGINIA: By the Governor—a Proclamation—Having received intelligence that the enemy took possession of Washington, on Wednesday the 24th inst. and immediately, without discrimination of public or private property, entirely destroyed that city: having every reason to believe that the other towns in the district of Columbia are destined to, if they have not already undergone the same fate; being also informed that the enemy has landed a force in the neighborhood of Fredericksburg, threatening that town with like destruction; perceiving that his operations are principally directed against Virginia; and considering that his past conduct forbids any, the least, reliance on his respect for the laws of civilized warfare; that, on the contrary, it is plainly his intention to lay waste, with fire and sword, every part of the country which may fall under his power; so that no hope remains for the safety of whatever is dear and valuable to men, but in prompt and vigorous resistance, combining every resource which the government can command, or the people voluntarily afford:—

I have therefore thought proper to issue this my Proclamation, to assure the good people of this commonwealth, that every effort has been made, and is making, to embody the militia, and, by all possible means, to provide such a force as may be able to repel and chastise the invaders, hereby inviting in addition thereto, the aid of volunteers of every description, from every part of the state; earnestly calling upon all men, capable of bearing arms, and particularly such as are young and without families, to repair to the standard of their country, to defend their homes, their property and their liberty, their wives, their children, and their aged parents. Let all volunteers bring with them knapsacks, clothes, and all arms and accoutrements in their possession; let them repair to the city of Richmond, hereby appointed their place of rendezvous, singly or in companies, and above all, without delay; to which end, it is recommended and desired, that such as can, should come mounted. They will be organized under the immediate orders of the Executive. On an occasion like the present, demanding whatever of zeal and courage and patriotism exists amongst us, the Executive will not fail to do its duty to the utmost of its ability, nor allow itself to fear that the people will be wanting to themselves.

Done at Richmond, this 26th day of August, one thousand eight hundred and fourteen, and of the Commonwealth the thirty-ninth.

JAMES BARBOUR.

The spirit of Virginia is completely roused; and her gallant sons by thousands have already marched to meet the enemy. The very "bones and nerves" of the state have entered into the contest. The conflagration of the Capitol has lighted a flame that, conducted by talents, shall avenge the wanton, barbarian deed, and retribute the wrongs of Hampton, and the desolated shores of the Potomac, &c. on the heads of the destroyers. The like observations apply equally to New-Jersey and Pennsylvania.

MICHIUMACKINAC.

Copy of a letter from Lt. Col. Croghan to the Secretary of War, dated U. S. S. War Niagara, off Thunder Bay, Aug. 9th, 1814.

SIR—We left Fort Gratiot (head of the Straits St. Clair) on the 12th ult. and imagined that we should arrive in a few days at Malshadash Bay. At the end of a week, however, the commodore from the want of pilots acquainted with that unfrequented part of the lake, despaired of being able to find a passage thro' the island into the 'bay, and made for St. Joseph's, where he anchored on the 20th day of July. After setting fire to the fort of St. Joseph's, which seemed not to have been recently occupied, a detachment of infantry and artillery, under major Holmes, was ordered to Sault St. Mary's, for the purpose of breaking up the enemy's establishment at that place. For particulars relative to the execution of this order, I beg leave to refer you to maj. Holmes' report herewith enclosed. Finding on my arrival at Michilumackinac, on the 26th ult. that the enemhad strongly fortified the height overlooking the old Fort of Mackinac, I at once despaired of being able with my small force, to carry the place by storm, and determined, (as the only course remaining) on landing and establishing myself on some favorable position, whence I could be enabled to annoy the enemy by gradual and slow approaches, under cover of my artillery, in which I should have the superiority in point of metal. I was urged to adopt this step by another reason, not a little cogent; could a position be taken and fortified on the island, I was well aware that it would either induce the enemy to attack me in my strong holds, or force his Indians and C. nadians (the most efficient, and only disposable force) off the island, as they would be very unwilling to remain in my neighborhood after a permanent footing had been taken. On enquiry, I learned from individuals who had lived many years on the island, that a position desirable as I might wish, could be found on the west end, and therefore immediately made arrangements for disembarking. A landing was effected on the 4th inst. under cover of the guns of the shipping, and the line being quickly formed, had advanced to the edge of the field spoken of for a camp, when intelligence was conveyed to me, that the enemy was ahead, and a few seconds more brought us a fire from his battery, of 4 pieces firing shot and shells. After reconnoitering his position, which was well selected; his line reached along the edge of the woods, at the further extremity of the field and covered by a temporary breast work; I determined on changing my position, (which was now two lines, the militia forming the front) by advancing m-j. Holmes' battalion of regulars on the right of the militia, thus to outflank him, and by a vigorous effort to gain his rear. The movement was immediately ordered, but before it could be executed, a fire was opened by some Indians posted in a thick wood near our right, which proved fatal to maj. Holmes and severely wounded captain Desha, [the next officer in rank.] This unlucky fire, by depriving us of the services of our most valuable officers, threw that part of the line into confusion from which the best exertions of the officers were not able to recover it. Finding it impossible to gain the enemy's left, owing to the impenetrable thickness of the woods, a charge was ordered to be made by the regulars immediately against the front. This charge altho' made in some confusion, served to drive the enemy back into the woods, from whence an annoying fire was kept up by the Indians.

Lieut. Morgan was ordered up with a light piece to assist the left, now particularly galled; the excellent practice of this brought the enemy to fire at a longer distance. Discovering that this disposition from whence the enemy had just been driven, (and which had been represented to me as so high and commanding) was by no means tenable, from being interspersed with thickets, and intersected in every way by ravines; I determined no longer to expose my force to the fire of an enemy deriving every advantage which could be obtained from numbers and a knowledge of the position, and therefore ordered an immediate retreat towards the shipping.

This affair, which has cost us many valuable lives, leaves us to lament the fall of that gallant officer maj. Holmes, whose character is so well known to the war department. Captain Vanhorn, of the 19th infantry, and lieut. Jackson of the 24th infantry, both brave intrepid young men, fell mortally wounded at the head of their respective commands. The conduct of all my officers on this occasion merit my approbation. Capt. Desha, of the 24th infantry, although severely wounded, continued with his command until forced to retire from faintness through loss of blood. Cpts. Saunders, Hawkins and Stunges, with every subaltern of that battalion, acted in the most exemplary manner. Ensign Bryan, 2d rifle regt. acting adjutant to the battalion, actively forwarded the wishes of the commanding officer. Lieuts. Hickman, 28th infantry, and Hyde of the U. S. marines, who commanded the reserve, claim my particular thanks for their activity in keeping that command in readiness to meet any exigency. I have before mentioned lieut. Morgan's activity: his two assistants, lieut. Pickett and Mr. Peters, conductor of artillery, also merit the name of good officers.

The militia were wanting in no part of their duty. Col. Cotgreave, his officers and soldiers, deserve the warmest approbation. My acting assistant adjutant gen. capt. N. H. Moore, 28th infantry; with volunteer adjutant M'Comb, were prompt in delivering my orders. Capt. Gratiot of the engineers, who volunteered his services as adjutant on the occasion, gave me valuable assistance.

On the morning of the 5th, I sent a flag to the enemy, to enquire into the state of the wounded (two in number) who were left on the field, and to request permission to bring away the body of major Holmes, which was also left, owing to the unpardonable neglect of the soldiers in whose hands he was placed. I am happy in assuring you, that the body of maj. Holmes is secured, and will be buried at Detroit with becoming honors.

I shall discharge the militia to-morrow, and will send them down, together with two regular companies to Detroit. With the remaining three companies I shall attempt to destroy the enemy's establishment in the head of Naw-taw-wa-sa-ga river, and if it be thought proper, erect a post at the mouth of that river.

Very respectfully, I have the honor to remain, sir, your obedient servant.

G. CROGHAN, Lt. Col. 2d Riflemen.

Hon. J. Armstrong, Secretary of War.

Copy of a letter from maj. A. H. Holmes, to lieut. col. Croghan, dated

On board the U. S. schr. Scorpion, 27th July, 1814.

Sir—Pursuant to your orders of the 1st inst. I left the squadron with lieut. Turner of the navy, and arrived at the Sault St Mary's at noon the day after; two hours before, the North West Agent had received notice of our approach, and succeeded in escaping with a considerable amount of goods, after setting fire to the vessel above the falls. The design of this latter measure was frustrated only by the intrepid exertions of Mr. Turner, with his own men and a few of capt. Saunder's company.

The vessel was brought down the falls on the 25th, but, having bilged, Mr. Turner destroyed her. Much of the goods we have taken were found in the woods, on the American side, and were claimed by the agent of John Johnston, an Indian trader.

I secured this property because it was good prize by the maritime law of nations as recognized in the English courts, (witness the case of admiral Rodney adjudged by lord Mansfield) further, because Johnston has acted the part of a traitor, having been a citizen and a magistrate of Michigan territory, before the war, and at its commencement, and now discharging the functions of a magistrate under the British government. Because his agents armed the Indians from his stores at our approach; and lastly because those goods or a considerable part were designed to be taken to Michilimackinac. Pork, salt and groceries compose the chief part. Johnston himself pos-said to Michilimackinac since the squadron arrived at St. Joseph. With high respect

A. H. HOLMES, major 32d infantry.
Lieutenant colonel Croghan, 2d rifle commanding.

Extract of a letter from general M. Arthur to the secretary at war, dated MALDEN, Aug. 18, 1814.

"The squadron under commodore St. Clair is still cruising on lake Huron; have taken two small vessels and are in pursuit of others. I trust it will be able to remain on the Upper Lakes until the garrison at Mackinaw and the British posts in that quarter will be reduced for want of provisions."

Extract of a letter from col. B. Hawkins to the secretary at War, dated.

CREEK AGENCY, Aug. 16, 1814.

"General Jackson terminated his negotiations with the Creeks on the 9th, and left there on the 11th with the regular troops going by water down the Usuma. The line of limits is Coosau river with a reserve of two miles square for Fort Williams, to the falls of the river seven miles above fort Jackson, thence eastwardly to a point 2 miles north of Ofuchshee (a large creek six miles below fort Decatur) thence across Tallapoosa to the mouth of the creek, and up the same ten miles in a direct line thence to Chattohochee, and across it at the first creek two and a half miles below Okeloyocenna about 68 miles north of the confluence of Chattohochee and Fliat, thence to Georgia with an eventful reservation to accommodate the Kinnards."

GEN. ARMSTRONG'S LETTER.

To The Editors of the Baltimore Patriot.

It may be due to myself, and is certainly due to others, that the reasons under which I retired from the direction of the War Department, at a juncture so critical as the present, should be fully and promptly known to the public. These reasons will be found in the following brief exposition of facts.

On the evening of the 29th ultimo, the President called at my lodgings, and stated that a case of much delicacy had occurred; that a high degree of excitement had been raised among the militia of the district; that he was himself an object of their suspicions and menaces; that an officer of that corps had given him notice, that they would no longer obey any order coming through me as secretary of war; and that in the urgency of the case, it might be prudent so far to yield to the impulse, as to permit some other person to exercise my functions in relation to the defence of the district.

To this statement and proposition I answered substantially as follows—that I was aware of the excitement to which he alluded, that I knew its source and had marked its progress; that the present was not a moment to examine its more occult causes, objects and agents; that it ostensibly rested on charges known to himself to be false, that it was not for me to determine how far the supposed urgency of the case made it proper for him to yield to an impulse so vile and profligate—so injurious to truth and so destructive of order; but that for myself, there was no choice; that I could never surrender a part of my legitimate authority, for the preservation of the rest—that I must exercise it wholly, or not at all; that I came into office, with objects exclusively public; and that to accommodate my principles or my conduct to the humours of a village mob, stimulated by faction and led by folly, was not the way to promote these; and that if his decision was taken in conformity to the suggestions he had made, I intreated him to accept my resignation.—This he declined doing. It was an extent, he was pleased to say, to which he meant not to go; that he knew the excitement was limited, as well with regard to time as to place; that he was now, and had always been, fully sensible of the general zeal, diligence and talent, which I had put into the discharge of my duty, and that it would give him pleasure, were I to take time to consider his proposition. I renewed the assurance of my great personal respect and my readiness to conform to his wishes on all proper occasions. I remarked, that whatever zeal, diligence and talent I possessed, had been employed freely but firmly, and according to my best views of the public good, and that as long as they were left to be so exerted, they were at the service of my country—but that the moment they were made to bow to military usurpation or political faction, there should be an end of their public exercise. We now parted, with an understanding that I should leave Washington the following morning.

It has been since stated to me, as a fact (to which I give the most reluctant belief) that on the morning of the 29th, and before my arrival in the city, a committee of the inhabitants of Georgetown, of whom Alexander C. Hanson, editor of the Federal Republican, was one, had waited on the President, by deputation, and had obtained from him a promise that I should no longer direct the military defences of the district. On this fact, all commentary is unnecessary.

It but remains to exhibit and to answer, the several charges raised against me, and which form the ground work of that excitement, to which the President has deemed it prudent to sacrifice his authority, in declining to support mine. They are as follows:

1st. That from ill-will to the district of Columbia and a design to remove the seat of government I gave orders for the retreat of the army, in the affair of the 24th ult. under circumstances not making retreat necessary or proper.

This charge has not for its support the shadow of truth. The commanding general will do me the justice to say, that I gave him no such order, and that he was and is under the impression, that the retreat was made earlier than I believed it to be proper. To the president I appeal, whether I did not point out the disorder and retreat of a part of the first line, and soon after the action began, and stigmatise it as base and infamous.

That in despite of the remonstrances of general Winder, and by the interposition of my authority, I had prevented him from defending the capitol.

This charge contains in it a total perversion of the truth. When the head of the retiring column reached the capitol, it was halted for a moment. General Winder here took occasion to state to Mr. Monroe and myself, that he was not in condition to maintain another conflict, and that his force was broken down by fatigue and dispersion. Under this representation, we united in opinion, that he should proceed to occupy the heights of Georgetown.

3d. That I had withdrawn the covering party from the rear of fort Washington, and had ordered captain Dyson to blow up the fort without firing a gun.

This charge is utterly devoid of truth. The covering party was withdrawn by an order from general Winder, and captain Dyson's official report shews, that the orders under which he acted, were derived from the same source, though, no doubt, mistaken or misrepresented.

4th. That by my orders, the navy yard had been burned. This like it's predecessors, is a positive falsehood.

Perciving that no order was taken for apprising commodore Tingey of the retreat of the army, I sent Major Bell to communicate the fact and to say, that the navy-yard could no longer be covered. The commodore was of course left to follow the suggestions of his own mind, or to obey the orders, if orders had been given, of the navy department.

5th. And lastly, that means had not been taken to collect a force sufficient for the occasion.

As the subject of this charge may very soon become one of congressional enquiry, I shall at present make but a few remarks:

1st. That no means within reach of the war department had been omitted or withheld—that a separate military district, embracing the seat of government, had been created; that an officer of high rank and character had been placed in charge of it; that to him was given full authority to call for supplies and for a militia force of fifteen thousand men; that to this force was added the 36th regiment of the line, a battalion of the 53th, detachments of the 12th, of the artillery, and of the dragoons, the marine corps, and the crews of the flotilla, under the special command of commodore Barney—making a total of 16,300 men.

General Winder's official report of the engagement of the 24th ult. shews, how much of this force had been assembled, and the causes why a greater portion of it had not been got together. These will be found to have been altogether extraneous from the government, and entirely beyond its control: and

2d. That from what is now known of the enemy's force, of the loss he sustained in the enterprise, of the marks of panic under which he retreated, &c. &c. it is obvious, that if all the troops assembled at Bladensburg, had been faithful to themselves and to their country, the enemy would have been beaten, and the capital saved.

JOHN ARMSTRONG.

Baltimore, 3d September, 1814.

Copy of a letter from com. Barney to the secretary of the navy,

Farm, at Elk Ridge, Aug. 29, 1814.

SIR—This is the first moment I have had it in my power to make a report of the proceedings of the forces under my command since I had the honor of seeing you on Tuesday, the 26d inst. at the camp at the "Old Fields." On the afternoon of that day we were informed that the enemy was advancing upon us. Our army was put into order of battle and our positions taken; my force were on the right flanked by the two battalions of the 36th and 39th regts. where we remained some hours. The enemy did not, however, make his appearance. A little before sunset general Winder came to me and recommended that the heavy artillery should be withdrawn, with the exception of one twelve pounder to cover the retreat. We took up the line of march, and in the night entered Washington by the Eastern Branch bridge. I marched my men, &c. to the marine barracks, and took up quarters for the night. About two o'clock, gen. Winder came to my quarters, and we made some arrangements. In the morning I received a note from gen. Winder, and waited upon him. He requested me to take command and place my artillery to defend the passage of the bridge on the Eastern Branch, as the enemy was approaching the city in that direction. I immediately put my guns in position, leaving the marines and the rest of my men at the barracks, to wait further orders. I was in this situation when I had the honor to meet you with the president and heads of departments, when it was determined I should draw off my guns and men, and proceed towards Bladensburg, which was immediately put into execution. On our way I was informed the enemy was within a mile of Bladensburg; we hurried on, though the day was very hot, and my men much crippled from the severe marches we had experienced the preceding days. I preceded the men, and when I arrived at the line which separates the District from Maryland, the battle began. I sent an officer back to hasten on my men—they came up in a trot. We took our position on the rising ground, put the pieces in battery, posted the marines under captain Miller, and flotilla men, who were to act as infantry under their own officers, on my right, to support the pieces, and waited the approach of the enemy. During this period the engagement continued—the enemy advancing, and our army retreating before them—apparently in much disorder. At length the enemy made his appearance on the main road in force and in front of my battery, and on seeing us made a halt; I reserved our fire, in a few minutes the enemy again advanced, when I ordered an 18 pounder to be fired, which completely cleared the road; shortly after, a second and third attempt was made by the enemy to come forward, but all who made the attempt were destroyed. The enemy then crossed over into an open field and attempted to flank our right. He was there met by three 12 pounders, the marines under captain Miller, and my men acting as infantry, and again was totally cut up. By this time not a vestige of the American army remained, except a body of five or six hundred posted on a height on my right, from whom I expected much support from their fine situation. The enemy from this period never appeared in front of us. He however pushed forward his sharp shooters, one of whom shot my horse from under me, which fell dead between two of my guns.—The enemy, who had been kept in check by our fire nearly half an hour, now began to outflank us on the right. Our guns were turned that way—he pushed up the hill about 2 or 300 men towards the corps of Americans stationed as above described, who to my great mortification made no resistance, giving a fire or two and retiring.

In this situation we had the whole army of the enemy to contend with; our ammunition was expended, and unfortunately the drivers of my ammunition waggons had gone off in the general panic.

At this time I received a severe wound in my thigh. Captain Miller was wounded, sailing master Warner killed, acting sailing master Martin killed, and sailing master Martin wounded; but to the honor of my officers and men, as fast as their companions and messmates fell at the guns, they were instantly replaced from those acting as infantry. Finding the enemy now completely in our rear and no means of defence, I gave orders to my officers and men to retire. Three of my officers assisted me to get off a short distance, but the great loss of blood occasioned such a weakness that I was compelled to lie down. I requested my officers to leave me, which they obstinately refused, but upon being ordered, they obeyed: one only remained. In a short time I observed a British soldier and had him called, and directed him to seek an officer; in a few minutes an officer came, who, on learning who I was, brought general Bross and admiral Cockburn to me. These officers behaved to me with the most marked attention, respect and politeness, had a surgeon brought and my wound dressed immediately. After a few minutes conversation, the general informed (after paying me a handsome compliment) that I was paroled, and at liberty to proceed to Washington or Bladensburg, as also Mr. Hufflington, who had remained with me, offering me every assistance in his power, giving orders for a litter to be brought, in which I was carried to Bladensburg. Captain Wainwright, first captain to admiral Cochrane, remained with me, and behaved to me as if I was a brother.

During the stay of the enemy at Bladensburg, I received the most polite attention from the officers both of the navy and army.

My wound is deep, but I flatter myself not dangerous; the ball is not yet extracted. I fondly hope a few weeks will restore me to health, and that an exchange will take place, that I may resume my command, for any other that you and the President may honor me with. Yours, respectfully,

JOSHUA BARNEY.

Hon. Wm. Jones, secretary of the navy.

CAPTURE OF THE AMERICAN FRIGATE ESSEX.

From the Jamaica Chronicle of July, 21. Intelligence of the capture of the above frigate in the Bay of Valparaiso, in the Chili seas, reached admiral Brown yesterday, brought by the Argo frigate, who politely favored us with a copy of the following letter, addressed to him, by captain Hillyar, of the Phoebe, detailing the particulars of the affair:—

H. M. ship Phoebe, Valparaiso bay, 30th, May 1814.
SIR—I have the honor to acquaint you that, at 3 o'clock in the afternoon of the 28th inst: after nearly four months anxious watching with his majesty's brig Cherub, for the United States frigate Essex and her companion, to quit the port of Valparaiso, we saw the former under way, and immediately the two ships made sail to close with her:

On rounding the outer point of the bay and hauling her wind, for the purpose of endeavoring to weather us, and escape, she lost her main topmast, and afterwards, not succeeding in an effort to regain the limits of the port, she bore up and anchored so near the shore (a few miles to lee-ward of it,) as to preclude the possibility of either of his majesty's ships passing ahead of her without risk: as we drew near, my intention of going close under her stern was frustrated, from the ship's broaching off, and from the wind blowing extremely fresh. Our first fire commenced a little past four and continued about ten minutes, but produced no visible effect; our second, a few random shot only, from having increased our distance by wearing, was not apparently more successful; and having lost the use of our main sail, jib and mainstay, appearances were a little inauspicious; in standing agian towards her, I hailed the Cherub, and signified my intention of anchoring, to captain Tucker, for which we were not ready before with springs, directing him to keep under sail, and take a convenient station for annoying our opponent.

On closing the Essex, at 35 minutes past five, the firing commenced, and before I gained my intended position, her cables were cut, and a serious conflict ensued, the guns of his majesty's ship becoming gradually more destructive, and when it pleased the Almighty to bless the effort of my gallant companions, and my personal very humble ones, with victory. My friend captain Tucker, an officer worthy of their lordships best attention, was most severely wounded at the commencement of the action, but remained on deck till it terminated, he also informs me his officers and crew, of whose loyalty, zeal and discipline, I entertain the highest opinion, conducted themselves to his satisfaction. I have to lament the death of four of my brave companions, and one of his, and my first lieutenant, among the number, he fell early. Our list of wounded are small. The conduct of my officers, &c. was such as became good and loyal subjects.

The defence of the Essex, taking into consideration our great superiority of force, the very discouraging circumstances of having lost her main-topmast, and being twice on fire, did honor to her commander, and must fully prove the courage of captain Porter.

I was much hurt on hearing that her men had been encouraged, when the result of the action was evidently decided, some to take to their boats and others to swim to the shore, many of whom were drowned in the latter attempt; 16 were saved by the exertions of our people, and others, I believe between 30 and 40, effected their landing. I informed captain Porter that I considered the latter, in point of honor, as my prisoners; he said the encouragement was given when the ship was in danger from fire, and I have not pressed the point. The Essex is completely stored and provisioned for six months, although much injured in her upper works, masts and rigging, is not in such a state as to give the slightest cause of alarm respecting her being able to perform a voyage to Europe with perfect safety. I have the honor to be, &c.

(Signed) JAMES HILLYAR, captain.

THE SPIRIT OF THE NATION is roused. If the barbarian warfare of an inflated enemy, "let loose for a season," like Satan, would not have roused it, our liberties had perished for ever. "Feeling power and forgetting right," Britain has determined to satisfy the old grudge she owed us. Her "magnanimity" which was thoughtlessly extolled to the skies, is shewing itself in actions disgraceful even to the "untutored indian." On the sea we have met and conquered her, over and over—on the land we have erected military trophies that shall not soon pass away. Brown, Scott and Grimes have redeemed the character of the nation; and other heroes pant for an opportunity to gain the laurel. War is a new business to us; but we must "teach our fingers to fight,"—and Wellington's invincibles shall be beaten by the sons of those who fought at Saratoga and Yorktown. "We can more easily become a military nation than any other in the world, and we must become one, or be slaves." But before we learn the needful, but dreadful trade of war, let us be cautious to avoid the mastery of the business that belongs to field action. Our policy is to destroy his force in detail; until, like those who fought at Chippewa, we shall be able to meet the enemy any way he pleases. Let him be harrassed from the moment that he sets foot amongst us, and wherever he goes.

BARBARISM. Copy of a letter from the Attorney General of the United States to the Mayor of Philadelphia.

"Washington, Sept. 1, 1814.

"Dear Sir—A dispatch was yesterday received by the Secretary of State from admiral Cochrane, commander in chief of his Britannic majesty's ships and vessels upon the North American station, dated on board the Tonnant, in the Patuxent river, August 18, 1814.

"In this dispatch admiral Cochrane explicitly declares it to be his intention to issue to the naval force under his command, an order 'to destroy and lay waste such towns and districts upon the coast as may be found assailable.'

"I beg you will have the goodness to give publicity to this information as soon as may be, at Philadelphia.

"I have the honor to be, with great respect, your friend and servant,

RICHARD RUSH.

"JOHN GREYER, Esq. Mayor of Philadelphia."

EXTENSIVE SMUGGLING.—A letter from Burlington, Vt. dated August 15, says—"It is a fact, that there are two neutral vessels on this lake which carry on a profitable trade. We passed several waggon loads of bale goods from Whitehall to Troy and Albany. It is said from ten to twelve thousand head of cattle have been driven into Canada this season from this state, and large sums in specie are continually going over both from Boston and New York.

GENTILITY. A Mr. Adams, a collector of the U. S. direct tax in Vermont, was lately made prisoner by a small party of the enemy, who took from about $1000, the greater part of which had been collected of that tax. General Brisbane, who commands at Odetown, sent over a flag and returned the money. There is as much difference between Brisbane and Cockburn, as between B. and C.

REINFORCEMENT. Norfolk, Aug. 31.—On Monday a line of battle ship, and a frigate, came in from sea, and proceeded up the Bay. Yesterday afternoon, a frigate (having in tow a sloop, supposed her prize) a sloop of war, and a brig, transport or store ship, came in from sea, and anchored in Lynhaven; this morning they proceeded up the bay with a fair wind.

CALL OF THE LEGISLATURE.—The Governor of Virginia has issued his proclamation for a convention of the legislature of that state, at Richmond, on the second Monday of October.

FROM CAMPLAIN we have yet nothing important. There is some skirmishing between the armies, but no appearance of an immediate battle, other than has been noticed. The British captain Maghera, who was wounded in a late skirmish, has since died—his remains were sent to the enemy. Some of the British gun boats shewed themselves, on the 20th ult. but soon retired. Communication across the line, on the Vermont side, is said to be prohibited by the British commander. Possibly this is preparatory to a movement. It is stated they have made an arrangement with the Indians, in which they engage to pay them five dollars for the campaign, and the savages are to have all the plunder they can take.

Izard's army is in the best possible state for action, but we fear is too weak to beat the enemy; who, it is said, will attack us by land and water at the same time. See pages 10 and 16.

NANTUCKET.—From the New-York Evening Post.—We learn from Boston that the British brig Nimrod went into Nantucket last Monday with a flag of truce, with despatches from admiral Hotham to the constituted authorities of the place, stating that it having been represented to him that the inhabitants of Nantucket were much distressed for want of provisions and necessities of life, he had in consequence sent in the present flag with the following propositions:—That if the citizens of Nantucket would lay down their arms, and stipulate that they would not fight against his Britannic majesty's subjects during the present war; a certain limited number of vessels would be permitted to ply unmolested between the island and the ports of the United States and those of the British dominions, for the purpose of procuring provisions, fuel and other necessities of life for the inhabitants; but that they should not be permitted to fish for cod or whale in or near his majesty's dominions. As soon as the propositions were received, a town meeting was called, and a committee of four was appointed to confer with the admiral on the subject. They went off in a flag of truce, and agreed to the propositions, which were reduced to writing and approved by the people. The intelligence is given on the authority of one of the committee.

THE CREEKS.—Milledgeville, (Geo.) Aug. 17.—A gentleman of respectability who passed through the Creek nation last week, and who conversed with general Jackson, informs us, that the boundaries for the future residence of the Creeks had been finally adjusted, apparently to the satisfaction of the chiefs, some of whom at first expressed dissatisfaction, but were silenced by the firmness of the United States' commissioner. Our informant describes the line designating the indian boundary as follows: "taking the Choctaw line and keeping a direct course to the Coosa, thence down that river to a point opposite to the mouth of Otchee creek on the Tallapoosa, which empties into that river on the east side, a few miles below Cahbee creek, or Autossee town—up the said Otchee creek to its head, and thence in a direct line to the Chatahoochee. The present line of forts are reserved by the United States, and the indians to be cut off from all communications on the sea-board."

Another gentleman, who was present when this boundary was described to our informant by general Jackson, understood that the indian line extended from the Chatahoochee to the Ocmulgee, which is their present eastern boundary. We shall forbear to make any comments on this arrangement till our information shall be more precise.

DEFENCE.—The Philadelphia papers are filled with military business and notices. Volunteer corps are forming with astonishing activity. The ladies are willing to equip the soldiers, and brothers, &c. The city council has appropriated 300,000 dollars, borrowed of the bank of Pennsylvania, to works of defence, and the corporations of Southwark and the Northern Liberties, 100,000 each. Camps are forming, and we trust that their forces may be organized by the time they have need of them. The general committee appointed by a public meeting of the citizens have appointed other committees, viz. of Superintendence—to correspond, and procure and disburse the funds, &c. Of Supplies—to furnish arms, ammunition and provisions, &c. and fix the place of rendezvous, &c. Of defence on the Delaware, to procure seamen, &c. Of organizing the citizens into military bodies, &c. and a committee to make provision for the families of the drafted militia and volunteers who need assistance.

One hundred ladies met at the Commissioners Hall, in Southwark, on the 30th ult. and on that and the following day made up 120 rifle uniforms, for a new company.

THE ALLIES.—From a late Jamaica paper.—The Orpheus frigate of 35 guns, captain Pigott, and Shelburne schooner, of 12 guns, lieutenant Hope, lately anchored in the bay of Apalache from B. rounds, and supplied the indians with about a thousand stand of arms and a quantity of ammunition. Colonel Woodbine, formerly of this island, shortly after joined the indians with about four hundred men, who had proceeded from George, and the whole amounting to five thousand, marched against the Americans, and from a letter addressed to lieutenant Hope from colonel Woodbine, it was ascertained that an immediate attack was to be made upon fort Mireh li, and from the want of ammunition, that fortress would undoubtedly become an easy conquest. Numbers of adherents daily flocking to the standard of the indians, and the Americans were in terrible consternation, and removing their property in the greatest haste.

At New-Orleans the war was very unpopular, and it was publicly ascertained that in the event of a Spanish force coming to Louisiana, there would be but few of the inhabitants who would not join them.

[That the British landed the arms spoken of may be true—but that they had collected a force of five thousand men is false. We have much later accounts of the proceedings of the Creeks than could reach us by way of Jamaica. We insert the article chiefly to shew the enemy's good will for a new massacre, as at fort Mims.]

EASTPORT. The British soldiers are constantly deserting from this post. It is stated as a fact that 60 or 70 of them came off in one body; they immediately reported themselves to our officer commanding at Nuchias. The enemy is making great exertions to break up all smuggling trade, with that place except in a treasonable traffic with our people for provisions, of which they are reported to be exceedingly in want; being on two thirds allowance. Pork 53s a barrel. As several entire guards had deserted, the officers were obliged to stand guard themselves, having lost all confidence in their men; of whom, it is said, only 300 remained on the island.

THE TRUE SPIRIT. From the Albany Register.—By the steam-boat Paragon, of Sunday evening, we received the following gloomy and disastrous intelligence; [alluding to the capture of Washington City] but gloomy and disastrous as it is, let it not damp the ardor of American patriotism; let it not, for a moment, discourage or throw us into the arms of despondency. Our capital is gone, but of what advantage to the enemy is this destruction of a few public buildings, the monuments of art and of national munificence? The loss of property is insignificant, compared with our resources, and the event cannot surely strike terror into the bosoms of freemen, or repress for a moment the energies of a nation roused to resentment and exertion by this daring invasion of its territory. Let us hope, that ere this our southern brethren in arms have made the enemy pay dearly for his temerity.

We observe that the annunciation of this intelligence is mingled in several prints with criminations of the administration. These may be just; but they are ill-timed. Believe us, fellow citizens, this is no moment for crimination, and recrimination, which necessarily follows. While the lightning of war flashed dimly in the horizon, and its thunder was scarcely heard within our borders, it was still proper enough to give vent to our criminations and complaints, to the just feelings of regret or indignation, excited by the bad management of our rulers. But when the clouds have gathered over our heads, and are bursting upon our altars and our fire sides; when the heart of our country is penetrated by hostile bands, and the smoking ruins of our capital admonish us that union alone is salvation, it is worse than fruitless to complain of grievances, the redress of which is necessarily remote. Hushed then be every murmur of discord, while a hostile foot pollutes the land of our fathers; let us forget all minor considerations of political or personal animosity; let one voice and one spirit animate us all—the voice of our bleeding country; and the spirit of our immortal ancestors.

THE BANKS of New-York, Philadelphia, and Baltimore have stopped their payments in specie. The great quantity of the precious metals drawn off by the enemy, through his friends amongst us, by the sale of bills of exchange, &c. has rendered this procedure necessary to secure the safety of our monied institutions. It is a very proper and prudent measure; unpleasant and inconvenient, indeed, but the preventive of absolute loss, and a guarantee of their future credit and usefulness. The publications that belong to this interesting matter are laid off for our next.

FROM ONTARIO. It is stated that the British vessels blockaded in the Niagara have escaped. It is likely they will fall into our hands. Lt. Gregory was taken prisoner in one of his daring excursions in a gig with 10 men. He obstinately resisted; is reported to have been wounded. Many gun-boats are building at Sackett's Harbor—nine were already in the water. Gen. Brown has resumed the command at Fort Erie. A continual cannonade is kept up on both sides, with little apparent effect on either.

FROM CHAMPLAIN. The British army, represented to be about 5000 strong, have advanced under maj. gen. Bristow, who has issued a general order directing the most scrupulous regard to discipline—to refrain from plunder, &c. our fleet was off Plattsburgh on the 21st inst. (our latest date) to operate with the army in defence of that place; which is said to be prepared to receive the enemy. We have no doubt but that Izard will give a good account of them.

NEW HAVEN was in a bustle and alarm on the 6th inst. The British were reported to be landing from two ships near Killingworth. Every one capable of bearing arms was on the alert. It does not appear, however, that the enemy landed.

CASTINE, &c. It seems that the British with a force of about two thousand men, took possession of Castine and Belfast (adjacent) in the district of Maine, on the 31st ult. The U. S. ship Adams is in danger.

Spain. The (Phila.) Democratic Press of the 5th inst. says, "A letter from M. Daschkoff, to his secretary in this city, dated at New York has endorsed on it in the Russian language, 'I have just received advices that Spain has declared war against the United States.'"

PRINCE DE CHAIN. The post at this place was surrendered to the united British and Indians on the 20th July. The enemy forced about 250 regulars, 600 Indians. One, a lieutenant's commission. The prisoners were paroled, and escorted by the British to protect them from the Indians, and have arrived at St. Louis.

CONGRESS. The large building erected at Washington city, for a hotel, is fitting up for the accommodation of congress. It was formerly occupied as the general post office, patent office, &c.

FOREIGN NEWS. London dates to the 26th July have been received via Halifax. It does not appear that the British ministers had, at that date, proceeded to Ghent. A letter from that place dated July 2, says, "The English ministers are lord Gambaier and messrs. Colburn and Adam, but none of them have yet arrived at Ghent. The American ministers are messrs. Bayard, Gallatin, Adams, Russell and Clay. They have all been here for some days, except Mr. Gallatin, who is shortly expected to arrive."

Additional vessels and troops are leaving England for America. There seems no prospect of an immediate peace. The governor at Halifax has received orders to forbid all encouragement of a breach of the blockade of our coasts. The Montreal papers say, that "the burning of Newark and the atrocities committed at Queenston, Dover, St. David's, Long Point and Chippewa, will be retributed on the American settlements; and that orders have been given by admiral Cochrane, as well as sir George Prevost, "to destroy and lay waste such towns and districts as the troops and navy may find assailable; and to hold directly in view the coast and duct of the American army towards his majesty's assailable subjects." The admiral says these papers, "has also instructed his officers to take every opportunity of explaining to the people how much he laments the necessity of following the rigorous example of the commanders of the American forces, and to state to them, that as their commanders must obviously have acted under instructions from the executive government of the United States, whose intimate and unnatural connexion with the late government of France has led them to adopt the same system of plunder and devastation, it is therefore to their own government the unfortunate sufferers must look for indemnification for the loss of property."

From every thing that we see, we must learn the "fog of war," in its most barbarous form. Well-armed in a just quarrel, and devoted to our republican institutions, let all say

"Don't give up the soil!"

Better times will come—and perseverance and courage shall establish the republic, with power, in glorious security. Mighty events appear yet to be expected in Europe—the present calm cannot last—a little while allowed to renovate their strength, and that continent will again be in a flame. Every thing that this moment against us—and changes for the better must happen, at home and abroad.

Extract of a letter dated Liverpool 11th July received by a respectable mercantile house in Baltimore.

"The American commissioners are assembled at Ghent and waiting there for the British commissioners to meet them; it is generally believed they will be met in all this month, by admiral Gambier, Mr. Adam and Mr. Colburn; when I hope, a peace will take place. The people here openly express their wishes for a continuance of the war; but secretly, rest assured, a peace with the United States is the sincere wish of their hearts; as every thing is uncommonly dull, both here and in Manchester, and British manufactures of every description have fallen nearly to what they were in 1812: owing to this country being excluded from exporting to France; and, the continent elsewhere are so very poor that they cannot buy, money being there entirely out of the question.

The late astonishing changes had made the people here almost mad, and they have hardly come to their senses yet; however, they begin to find out that their trade is not what they expected would be the result of a peace with France. I am credibly informed that there are twenty thousand packages of goods here and fifteen thousand in Lisbon ready to be sent to America, those in Lisbon would have been shipped in neutral vessels, had not Cochrane issued his blockading proclamation.

The trade of the United States is much more important to the manufacturers here than they are willing you should know; be assured they now feel sensibly the want of it and the government are more conscious of this than the people.

A great number of troops have been shipped from Bordeaux for America; general Hill who is to take command of them has not yet left this country, and I hope he will not."

FROM BERMUDA, July 24.—By an arrival at Bermuda from Gibraltar, it was ascertained that ten thousand British troops (part of the duke of Wellington's army) from the Gironde had actually sailed for the coast of America, to touch at Bermuda. H. M. ship Tonnant was remaining there in readiness to accompany the expedition. Canada must be well insured, as well by its old brave defenders, as the respectable reinforcements already gone there. In the western extremity of the continent a very formidable force will soon be in operation, that will require a deal of energy, force and money on the part of the American government, to present any thing like a position. The force therefore from England and the Gironde, we shall not be disappointed to hear, has been ordered to the Deimare. This force should be, and no doubt will be formidable: the ten thousand troops, above alluded to, must be but the first division. This will create such a diversion in the heart of America, that the defence of its extremities will be held but of secondary moment.

A very short time now must put in motion all the schemes of our government, for bringing this deluded people to their reason; and we trust that special directions have been given for separating the sheep from the goats, so that the innocent may not suffer for the guilty.

NEW-YORK.—Governor Tamkins has issued his proclamation, calling an extra session of the New-York legislature at Albany on the 26th of this month. The works for the defence of the city approach their completion. The labor of the people has accomplished wonders. The cannon are mounting. Declaro takes command at fort Greene, the greatest work. Fort Swift is finished and fort Lawrence nearly done. The Tammany society, in number about 1500, in a body, gave one day's labor; as did the Free Masons, nearly one thousand strong. The following curious incident is mentioned in the Columbian—

Female patriotism. Yesterday afternoon a company of ladies went to Brooklyn, and forming a procession at the ferry, with the music of Tammany Society, increased as they went to Fort Greene, to between 2 and 300, where they performed an hour's work on the fortifications, amid the plaudits of the citizens on the ground. Several patriots of the revolution were among them; and a lady of 72 years of age wheeled a barrow of earth with great activity. The scene was extremely gratifying by its novelty—but the practice would soon become repulsive and detrimental to the public service if indiscriminately indulged. More permanent and appropriate employment for the sex will be found in the associations for needle work for the soldiery forming throughout the city.

Public spirit.—The corporation of New York have opened a loan for a million of dollars for the purpose of defence. The voluntary contributions of the citizens, sell arms and munitions to their labor on the fortifications, to several hundred dollars per day.

"DON'T GIVE UP THE SOIL." It would give us pleasure to record all the instances of patriotism that press upon us for insertion. We cannot. But to the account of what is doing at New York: we must notice, that about 1000 men from New Ark, N.J. proceeded to a day's labor on the works for the defence of that city. They had flags and music, and each one this label on his hat

We trust this will become the motto of every American. GENERAL ARMSTRONG, says the National Intelligencer, "has resigned the office of secretary of war."—And adds, "we greatly regret the occasion of his resignation; and can only wish that a successor may be found equally well qualified."

CARLEIGH ship Anolatan has arrived at Savannah from Jamaica, with 170 American prisoners.—It only 6: there.

SAVANNAH, Aug. 25. By a gentleman of undoubted veracity who left Havana on the 7th inst. and arrived at St. Mary's on the 15th—information is received that on or about the 1st inst. two British ships from Europe (the Ceyron and Hermes) each mounting 4 guns, reported to have on board 400 men, some of whom were marine-artificers, 190 of whom were said to be officers, had arrived at Havana, under the command of col. —, who said he was born at Colerain in Ireland. They applied to the governor of the Island for permission to land at Pensacola; but it was refused—they then applied for permission to land at Havana for the refreshment of the men until a reinforcement should arrive; this also was refused. The governor is said to have assured the commanding officer that their landing would be repelled within any territory under his command—immediately after which a Spanish vessel was despatched for Pensacola, and it was reported that she conveyed orders for the governor of West Florida to repel the landing of British troops in that province with all the force under his control.

The colonial commanding dined at a public house; he spoke freely of great cruelties committed by the troops under general Jackson during his expedition against the Indians; and seemed exasperated against the Americans. He urged that the country belonged to the Indians—they were the first settlers, and it was his intention to restore it to them. His friend would be at Colerain in Georgia, and from thence to Savannah. The col. reported that he expected a reinforcement of 4000 men; that he had on board the two ships 3000 uniforms, epaulets, swords, &c. for officers whom he intended to commission. A gentleman who was on board the Hermes read one of the proclamations signed by col. Woodbine inviting all classes and descriptions of people to the British standard for protection and freedom.

The British brig Childers had conveyed to West Florida a quantity of arms and ammunition, and on her return had called at Havana—it was well known there are several British vessels that had been employed in that way, and that a large supply of arms and ammunition was deposited in that neighborhood on British account.

FROM PENSACOLA. Milledgeville, (9.) Aug. 24. We understand that gen. Jackson dispatched a courier to the governor of Pensacola, demanding the surrender of M^{rs} Queen and Francis [who, it was stated, had sought shelter under Spanish authority] and the reason why they, and their adherents have received succour and assistance from the subjects of his Catholic Majesty, between whose government and that of the united States, he conceived there were existing relations of amity and good will. His excellency, it is stated, became highly exasperated at the peremp-tory manner of the demand; returned an insulting and ambiguous answer—said that he knew nothing of Francis and M^{rs} Queen—that Jackson should hear from him shortly.

Upon the receipt of this answer, delivered verbally, and which general Jackson, no doubt, supposed to bear something of a threatening appearance, he immediately left Fort Jackson for the purpose of occupying Mobile point—at which post, it is said, he will shortly have a force of 5 or 6000 strong—which, it is supposed, will not only be sufficient for defensive, but, if necessary, offensive operations.

THE CREEKS. We have a variety of rumours and reports of the intrigues and operations of the British with the Creek Indians. It is pretty well ascertained that the enemy has landed some men and a considerable quantity of arms at Appalachicola, 130 miles east of Pensacola. Many of the Creeks had taken refuge in the Spanish territory, and it is said they have accepted the supplies. Jackson, however, seems prepared to manage the allied forces.

State troops.—His excellency the governor (says the New York "Columbian") has determined to enlist 1 or 2000 men, for three months or (with the sanction of the legislature) twelve months or during the war, with officers to be commissioned by him, and two dollars per month extra pay to the soldiers, to be confined at present to the defence of the seaboard of the state. Also, the commander in chief will organize a battalion of Sea Fencibles under the act of congress for that purpose, for the defence of this city and harbor.

On the requisition of gen. Porter, and by order of the governor of Virginia, we are happy to find, that gen. Taylor is again called into the service of the United States.—Norfolk Herald.

A handsome affair. The Menelaus frigate, capt. sir Peter Parker, had been for some time moving about in the upper parts of the Chesapeake, frequently landing detachments and committing barbarous depredations on the shores, burning several houses, wheat stacks, and a pig pen with the pigs in the sty! They also seized some negroes for guides, but whether they carried them off is not stated. About the 20th ult. a schooner came up the bay with orders for the Menelaus to fall down; but sir Peter said he must have "a frolic with the Yankees before he left them," and on the 30th at night, after dancing and drinking, they proceeded to the sport, and made a circuitous route to surprize col. READ, (a m of the revolution) encamped in Moore's fields, not far from Georgetown X Roads, on the Eastern Shore, of Maryland. The colonel was fully apprized of all their proceedings—his force was 170 officers and men, (militia, armed with muskets and a few rifles, and 2 pieces of field artillery.) The enemy disgorged all his force except about 20 men from the frigate, and it amounted to 230 men; 150 armed with muskets, and the rest with pikes, cutlasses and a pair of pistols each. The British advanced with firmness to the charge, but were met with equal resolution and courage. The ground was obstinately contended for for nearly an hour, when the enemy retreated leaving 15 killed and 3 wounded on the field. It is ascertained that they carried off 17 others, among whom was sir Peter, who, with several others are since dead. The incendiary captain fell before the artillery, when he attempted to carry it by storm, and was buried the next day with the usual ceremonies. Happy, indeed, was it that the enemy retreated when they did, for our people had expended nearly every round of cartridge, and had no supply at hand. This circumstance prevented a pursuit, which would probably have been more fatal to the enemy than the battle—they had had but 20 rounds a man. We had three men slightly wounded, none killed. Many muskets, cutlasses and boarding pikes with a grenade, a rocket, and some poles supposed to have been brought to be used in discharging them, were picked up by the military next morning.

The next morning the lieutenant commanding the frigate sent a flag on shore to propose an exchange for the prisoners he supposed were left, for on mustering the crew forty were found to be missing. The enemy has had his "frolic," and Read has shewn the value of materials so often disgraced by the ignorance or cowardice of officers who, some how, have got command.

The affair occurred in the night; but a clear moon made it sufficiently light to distinguish objects.

The frigate has since gone down the bay.

General Gaines. We are sorry to learn, (says the National Intelligencer of the 6th inst.) from the Northern frontier, that on the 29th ult. gen. Gaines was severely (not dangerously) wounded in four or five different parts of his body, by a shell thrown by the enemy, which fell into his quarters. Other persons, among whom was the person from whom this information was derived, in his tent or room at the time, received no injury.

Savannah, Aug. 23. On Saturday last colonel Manning with about 500 United States troops horse and infantry, arrived in this town from Camp Jack; it is stated that they are to operate as marines on board gun boats, &c. to prevent the incursions of the enemy in our bays and inlets.

Pittsburg, Aug. 31. On Sunday capt. Reed's company of artillery 80 strong, took up their line of march from this place for Buffalo.

Gen. M'Arthur has made a requisition to the governor of Kentucky for 1000 militia to strengthen the garrison at Detroit. They will rendezvous at Newport on the 10th of Sept. A similar call for 500 mounted volunteers has been made on the governor of Ohio. They are to rendezvous at Urbanna on the 20th of Sept.

Defence of New-Haven. The citizens of New Haven have commenced, by voluntary labor and subscription, the erection of strong works on Prospect Hill, on the east side of the harbor, for the better defence of that city.

NAVAL.

Another naval victory! A London paper of the 15th July, contains an account of the capture of the British sloop of war Reindeer, carrying 21 guns; by the United States sloop Wasp; captain Blakeley, of 20 guns, near the Lands-end. The Reindeer was to windward, and twice attempted to board the Wasp; but was twice beaten off with great loss. The battle lasted but twenty-five minutes—the British captain, and twenty-one of his men were killed, and 60 wounded. The loss on board the Wasp, is not known. The wounded were put on board a neutral vessel and had arrived in England; and the Reindeer, being shattered to pieces, was blown up by captain Blakeley the day after the battle. The Wasp had been cruising off the Lands-end 14 days. She had made six other prizes, one worth 30,000£. The London paper says, one of her masts was badly wounded and that several sloops of war had gone in pursuit of her. The famous privateer Rattlesnake has at length been taken and sent into England, July 9.

Barney's flotilla, blown up in the Patuxent, consisted only of one cutter, one gun-boat, and 13 barges—not of "26 gun-boats, and 10 or 15 barges," as stated in an Eastern paper.

The corvette, Adams, captain Morris, has arrived in the Penobscot, after a cruise in which she made five prizes. We have captain Morris' account of his cruise, as well his letter giving a report of the damages his ship suffered by running on some rocks near the port he arrived at—which must lay over for the present. She will require considerable repairs.

Captain Porter, and his men, the remains of the gallant crew of the Essex, now at Baltimore, collected them by the following animating summons!

"FREE TRADE AND SAILORS' RIGHTS—to the crew of the old Essex. SAILORS, the enemy is about attempting the destruction of your new ship at Washington, and I am ordered there to defend her. I shall proceed immediately, and all disposed to accompany me will meet me at 5 o'clock this afternoon at the navy agent's office. D. PORTER.

New-York, August 22d, 1814.

Extract of a letter from the Secretary of the Navy to Com. Rodgers, dated August 29, 1814.

"The terms of capitulation for the town of Alexandria are so degrading and humiliating, as to excite the indignation of all classes of people—those who have hitherto been the most vehement in their denunciation of the war and of the administration, are no less ardent in their determination to defend this city and Georgetown to the last extremity, than the warm advocates of both. The arrogant foe has required the surrender of all articles of produce and merchandize, even retrospectively, to the 19th inst. including all that has been sent from the town subsequent to that date, together with all the shipping, whether afloat or sunk, to be delivered to him in perfect order, to carry off his immense booty, which he is now busily engaged in loading and preparing for departure."

Extract of a letter from commodore Chauncey to the secretary of the navy, dated on board the United States ship Superior, off Kingston, August 10, 1814.

"I have been duly honored with your letters of the 19th and 24th July.

"I do assure you, sir, that I have never been under any pledge to meet general Brown at the head of the lake; but on the contrary when we parted at Sacketts harbor, I told him distinctly, that I should not visit the head of the lake, unless the enemy's fleet did.

"I can ascribe the intimation of general Brown, that he expected the co operation of the fleet, to no other motive, than a cautious attempt to provide an apology for the public, against any contingent disaster to which his army might be exposed.

"But, sir, if any one will take the trouble to examine the topography of the peninsula, (the scene of the general's operations) he will discover that this fleet could be of no more service to general Brown, or his army, than it could to an army in Tennessee.

"General Brown has never been able to penetrate nearer to lake Ontario than Queenstown, and the enemy is in possession of all the intermediate country; so that I could not even communicate with the army, but by a circuitous route of 70 or 80 miles.

"Admitting general Brown could have invested fort George, the only service he could have derived from the fleet, would be our preventing the supplies of the enemy from entering the Niagara river; for the water is so shallow that the large vessels could not approach within two miles of their works.

"General Brown had therefore two abundantly sufficient reasons for not expecting the co-operation of this fleet; it was not promised to him—and was chimerical in itself.

"My fixed determination has always been to seek a meeting with the enemy the moment the fleet was ready and to deprive him of an apology for not meeting me, I have sent four guns on shore from the Superior, to reduce her armament in number to an equality with the Prince Regent's, yielding the advantage of their 68 pounders. The Mohawk mounts two guns less than the Princess Charlotte, and the Montreal and Niagara are equal to the General Pike and Madison. I have detached, on separate service, all the brigs; and am blockading his four ships, with our four ships, in the hope that this may induce him to come out."

☞ We have another letter from com. Chauncey, dated August 10, accounting, to perfect satisfaction, for the delay of the sailing of the fleet, &c. Also, a copy of a letter from general Brown to him, dated July 13, with the reply. They are highly interesting; but came too late for the present number. The commodore disavows all idea of an expectation that he should have acted with the army, at the time of the general's crossing into Canada.

The anchor left by the Despatch brig at Stonnington when she "cut and run," has been got up and brought to New-London. It weighs upwards of 20 cwt.

Mr. Chalmers, late master of the Terror, bomb vessel, employed in the attack on Stonnington, has been captured in a British barge and sent to Providence—he says 170 bombs were discharged from that ship in the attack on Stonnington, which were found to weigh 80lb. each; the charge of powder for the mortar was 9lb; adding to this the wadding, that vessel must have disgorged eight tons weight.

The new brig at Vergennes, the keel of which was laid about thirty days since, is now, we understand, completely fitted and ready for the lake. She mounts 2^d heavy guns.——Col. Pat.

New-London, August 26 1814. Yesterday a boat from the Superb, with a midshipman and five men (2 of whom were Americans) went on shore at Little Gull Island. On reaching the shore, the three Englishmen jumped out, and the two Yankees pushed off and pulled for this place. Immediately on their arrival and telling the news, the same boat returned back to the island, took the midshipman and two men, and landed them safely here at 7 o'clock this morning. One of the Americans was Daniel Holt of this place, the other belonging to the eastward.

Charleston, August 24. The owners of the schr. Santee, and her cargo, have awarded to captain Leavins 1500 dollars, being one third of the estimated value of vessel and cargo. We understand that 4 or 500 dollars have also been made up for captain L. by private subscription, and $ 50 by the Union Insurance company; this with 100 dollars a head for each of his five prisoners, which the government ought to give him, whether he is entitled to it or not by law, will be a handsome reward for his heroic conduct in the recapture of his vessel.

BALTIMORE.

At the recommendation of the Committee of Vigilance and Safety, (inserted in our last number) the people commenced their labors to fortify the city, on Sunday the 27th ult. The work done demonstrates their power and zeal, to the astonishment of all who behold it. Baltimore has long been remarkable for the patriotism and liberal spirit of her citizens; and her high character for these qualities is fully maintained by the free offering of men and money for the purposes of defence. In the mean time, volunteers and militia from the adjacent parts of Maryland, Pennsylvania and Virginia, have flocked in to our aid. We are restrained, by the request of the Committee of Vigilance, from mentioning any particulars; but the honorable record shall yet be made. We restrain the desire to notice these things because enjoined by the committee; for we are very sure the enemy is apprised of almost every thing that is transacted here: but he has learnt nothing to our discredit. The means of defence have given confidence to the people—many families who had left the city have returned—nothing is relaxed; every thing goes on as though an attack were immediately expected, but, with the exception of performing their military duties, the people have their usual composure and quiet. To our brethren who have flown to our assistance, we are greatly indebted, as well for the decorum of their conduct in the city, as their patriotism in coming to the camp. The sudden collection of so many people, of all classes and conditions, might have been expected to create much confusion and disorder; but no event has yet occurred, that we have heard of, which can sully the character of an individual soldier; and the city is as quiet, (the sound of the drum, or the rattling of waggons pertaining to the different corps, excepted) as ever it was. This tribute is due to the gentlemen associated to repulse the enemy. Major-general Smith, of the Maryland militia (of Mud Fort memory) commands the troops collected specially for the defence of Baltimore. Brigadier-general Winder has under him the forces belonging to his military district. He is now here, and the whole is acting in concert.

On a former distressing occasion we felt it a duty to caution the public against the infamous lies that were circulated respecting Baltimore. Such letter-writing, or letter-making has prevailed in the present case, with its usual baseness. One of these letters, published at Boston, says—"There is, at this moment, a contest between the civil and military powers—the former are for sending a capitulating embassy, but the military men will not consent."

Extract of a letter from major Wm. B. Barney, to general Smith, dated Annapolis half-past 7 o'clock P. M. Sept 8 1814.

Three deserters from the British have just come in. I have examined them separately and they agree in their stories—the substance of which is—that they left the fleet lying at the mouth of the Patuxent on Monday evening. They were ashore watering—the fleet was watering from casks sunk in the sand.

A bomb ship and the Havanna frigate joined on Saturday last; no reinforcement of troops that they heard of; heard great complaints of the loss sustained in the taking of Washington, said to be 1100 men. Nothing said about going to Baltimore; but a great deal about taking New-London, or Long-Island, and making winter quarters there.

The two admirals (Red and White) with several line of battle ships went down the bay on Monday. The admiral of the Blue remains with the fleet. Orders to get under way yesterday morning had been given. Captain Parker of the Menelaus certainly killed in the affair with colonel Reed.

FROM THE PATUXENT.

The whole naval force of the enemy, recently lying in the mouth of the Patuxent, got under way on Tuesday evening, and proceeded down the bay.

WASHINGTON CITY.

Miscellaneous particulars.—The Washington City Gazette gives as a list of persons who suffered by conflagration or robbery of the enemy by the late capture of the capital. The public property destroyed was—the capitol; the president's house; the war office; the treasury office; the fort and magazine at Greenleaf's point; the public stores, &c. at the marine barracks. [The navy yard being fired by order of the secretary of the navy.]

The private buildings burnt were—the houses of Messrs. Sewell, Ball, Frost, Philips, Tomlinson, and Mrs. Hamilton's.

They also burnt Messrs. Ringgold's and Chalmers rope walks, and Mr. Heath's twine walk.

And plundered the houses or stores of Messrs. B. Sprigg, Boon, Birch, Long, Rapine, D. Waterson, McCormick, Caldwell, W. Elliott, B. Burns, Ricks, G. Burns, Crampton and Washington—and destroyed Gales and Seaton's types, &c.

The cannon at the navy yard, with many other military appurtenances at and near Washington, was but little if any injured. The national loss in buildings and stores is estimated at two millions. The walls of the capitol stand firm and that and the other public buildings may be repaired at a comparatively small expence. The former had very little wood work in it. Foxall's cannon foundry was not destroyed, as reported.

A general hospital has been established at Capitol Hill.

SURRENDER OF ALEXANDRIA.

At a meeting of the Committee of Vigilance, on Monday, the 28th of August, 1814.—Present Joseph Dean, John Thompson, William Herbert, Matthew Robinson, Thomas Vowell.

This meeting being called at the request of the chairman, Charles Simms, who, with Edmund J. Lee and Jonathan Swift, are gone as a flag to the British frigates off the fort, now in their possession.

Resolved, That two expresses be procured to wait on general Hungerford, from Virginia, or any other officer commanding troops, informing them that the town has no artillery or any military force to protect it, and that they intend to surrender at a discretion, and therefore think it injurious to the interests of the town, for any troops to enter at this time, being under the direction of the civil authority. And that a copy of this minute be handed to each of the expresses.

THOMAS VOWELL, chairman, pro tem.

In the Common Council of Alexandria.

The following order was unanimously concurred in by the Common Council of Alexandria, 28th August, 1814.

The forts erected for the defence of the district having been blown up by our men [United States regular troops] and abandoned without resistance, and the town of Alexandria having been left without troops or any means of defence against the hostile force now within sight, the common council of Alexandria have with reluctance been compelled from a regard to the safety of the inhabitants to authorise an arrangement with the enemy, by which it has been stipulated that during their continuance before the town they shall not be molested—no superior power having on this emergency appeared to defend or direct, the common council has considered itself authorised from extreme necessity to make the above stipulation—they consider it binding on themselves and on the nation, and require a faithful observance of it from all the inhabitants of the town.

Resolved, That copies of the above resolution, be transmitted to brigadier-general Winder, of the 10th military district, and to generals Young and Hungerford, with the request of the common council, that proper measures may be used to secure a strict observance of the public faith which the common council has been compelled to pledge.

THOS. HERBERT, Pres't.
J. GIRD, clerk pro tem.

In Common Council of Alexandria.

Resolved, That the common council of Alexandria, in assenting to the conditions offered by the commander of the British squadron now off the town, has acted from the impulse of irresistible necessity, and solely from a regard to the welfare of the town—that it considers the assent by it given only formal, inasmuch as the enemy already had it in their power to enforce a compliance with their demand by a seizure of the property required from us; and believing the safety of the persons of the inhabitants and their dwellings, and of such property as is not comprehended within the requisition to depend entirely on the observance of the terms of it.—The common council recommends to the inhabitants an acquiescence, at the same time it does expressly disclaim the power of doing any act in its part to enforce compliance, its authority in this particular being limited to recommendation only.

At a meeting of the Common Council of the town of Alexandria on the 29th of August, 1814.—Present

Thomas Herbert, president; Henry Nicholas, Andrew Elensing, James Millan, Heulen Johnston, Anthony Rhodes, John Hunter Wm. Veitch, Ezra Kenzie, Robert I Taylor, and John Gird.

The above resolution was unanimously adopted. It was also resolved, that in the opinion of the council the loss to be sustained by the depredations of the enemy on the inhabitants, ought to be equalized; but the council does not consider itself as possessing the powers necessary to pass any law to that effect, nor does it consider the present as a proper time to act on this subject.

Resolved, That if any plan can be devised by which the loss to be sustained by the inhabitants can be equalized, it will meet with the approbation of the council.

THOS. HERBERT, Pres't.
W. VEITCH, Clerk, pro tem.

The vessels carried by the enemy from Alexandria were 14—laden with from 15 to 18,000 bbls flour, 800 bbls tobacco, 120 bales cotton, some small quantities of sugar and coffee, and a medley of other articles.

While the enemy were employed in loading a vessel, captains Porter and Creighton of the U. S. navy made a dash into Alexandria on horseback, rode up to the midshipman who was superintending the loading of the boat, and captain C. seized him by the cravat and endeavored to take him off; but his cravat gave way and he escaped. The officers immediately galloped off leaving the inhabitants in great consternation.

The signal of alarm was immediately given on shore to all those employed on the wharves who promptly embarked, and all hands were ordered to prepare for action. The inhabitants apprehended an immediate destruction of the town; but a deputation being sent from the corporation to state that the act was unauthorized by them, nor done by any inhabitant of the place, and promising that they would place guards at the intersection of each street leading to the water to prevent a similar occurrence, the commanding officer said he would overlook it, and the town was again quieted.

A series of desperately daring exertions were made by Rodgers, Porter, and Perry, with the men of the two former, and some of the Virginia militia, to prevent the escape of the frigates from Alexandria with their great booty. All that men could do, with the means they had, by fire ships, barges, and hastily erected batteries, was done—but the enemy got off with some loss, taking all the vessels with him. About twelve men were killed, and several wounded at Porter's battery—at Perry's only one was wounded. Rodgers suffered no loss, that we have heard of. The details of these exploits have not yet reached us; but the facts shall be recorded to the honor of the concerned.

The Washington City Gazette pointedly intimates, that the flour and tobacco carried off by the British from Alexandria, was actually sold to them by the merchants.

Commodore Porter hoisted a large flag over his battery, on which was inscribed in sufficiently legible characters "FREE TRADE AND SAILORS' RIGHTS." Who does not echo the sentiment? The gallant captain Creighton was his second.

The misfortune was, that the artillery that could be collected for the sudden occasion, were too light. Rodgers' and Porter's crews are now at Baltimore.

CHRONICLE.

The duke of Wellington has arrived in England, and was received with great shouts by the people. The garrison at Strasburg refused to mount the white [Bourbon] cockade; a tumult ensued, and several lives were lost. At Lyons, affairs are reported to be unsettled, and many hints are held out as though another revolution was brewing in France. It is stated that the French army was collecting, that they considered Austria as the cause of their degradation, and were clamorous for a war with that power. They speak with enthusiasm of their former successes, and it was thought would force Louis into a contest. The French parliament is in session. The king of Prussia had arrived at Paris, in cog. In Spain 4000 arrests had taken place since the return of ungrateful Ferdinand. A London paper of July 7, says—There appears to have been a serious disturbance at Madrid. The king suddenly left the Capitol in the middle of the night on the 19th ult. and the stone upon which the constitutional inscription had been engraved, was torn from its place, and two other inscriptions substituted.—The next day the statue of Ferdinand was placed upon the same spot, and we infer that it gave rise to insurrection on the part of those favorable to the constitution. However, they are said to be put down, and the most mischievous arrested. The king seems to have been very ill advised since his return.

A part of Wellington's army is to be stationed in the Netherlands. The Swedes have been repulsed in an attempt to invade Norway, which, however, it is intimated, will be given up to them. The British have lately taken several Norwegian vessels and sent them to Sweden. The princess of Borghese, one of Bonaparte's sisters, has arrived at Elba.—Ireland continues in a disturbed state; a new bill is before Parliament: the object of this bill was to re-enact some of the provisions of the Insurance act of 1796. The Princess of Wales is to have a separate establishment of 35,000 pounds per annum. The allied sovereigns had left England. A congress of kings, it is said, is to be held at Vienna.

It does not appear that the Spaniards are on the best terms with the British, as to their expeditions to Florida—See page 11.

The Charleston Courier of Aug. 29, says—There had been a late arrival at Havana from Old Spain; but the news she brought was not allowed to transpire. It was whispered that there had been commotions in Spain, and that the people were greatly dissatisfied with the recent conduct of Ferdinand.

The Philadelphia Democratic Press has the following—Captain Pitner, of the Schr Jane, arrived this day from Matanzas; he heard at Cuba, a few days before he sailed, that the news had come down from St. Thomas's, that Spain had declared War against England. Captain Pitner has been only 8 days on his passage; he further adds, that the news was generally believed. We hope it is true!

The count De La Chatre is the French ambassador in England.

The king of France has presented to the Chamber of deputies a law on the Liberty of the Press.

Louis XVIII appears not to be in good health, and is using baths at the Tuilleries.

Gen. Rapp, and the other French generals who were of the garrison of Dantzic, have sent from Russia their adherence to Louis XVIII.

From the London Morning Herald of July 15.—The infraction of the matrimonial engagement between the Princess Charlotte and the Prince of Orange has been promulgated with too much assiduity by opposition to require any longer concealment of the fact. The party have too well succeeded in impressing her royal highness with the atrocious idea, that her banishment from England was the secret object of this union. She was advised, therefore, to demand security "by a clause in the marriage contract, that she was not to leave England, without her own consent, for any time whatever." To this the royal lover could but pledge his honor, that after introducing her to his nation, he would immediately reconvey her back; but this she was told would give no security at all, and therefore she was directed to write a letter to the Prince Regent and Queen, renouncing the intended union (of which the party had the first copy, if not the original) and also another, containing similar sentiments, to her discarded lover, who in consequence immediately embarked for Holland, in that state of mind which violated affection, and wounded honor, must naturally have excited!"

Montreal, Aug. 6.—The restoration to France of the right of fishing on the banks of Newfoundland, appears impolitic, unless, however, some stipulation has been entered into by the contracting parties, which will in future exclude any pretensions of the Americans to trouble those waters on any pretext. There is great consolation, happen what will, in knowing that Talleyrand is in principle an avowed enemy to the American republic, and all the members of the administration. There is reason to think that, by being liberal to France, she in her turn, will be generous in aiding to crush the Eighteen Headed Hydra, standing between the Atlantic and Mississippi.

French manufactures.—A London paper of June 4, mentioned samples of manufactures brought into England from France and Switzerland, and says—"unless the price of labor is considerably reduced in this country (England) we shall be utterly unable to enter into a competition with the continent.

American Prizes.

MONTHLY LIST—CONTINUED FROM VOL. VI.

The winds and seas are Britain's wide domain,
And not a sail, but by permission spreads!"

British Naval Regis. ten.

1098. Brig —, from Madeira for Liverpool, N. S. captured by the Rambler of Boston, on her way to Canton, divested of 80 or 90 casks of wine, and given up.

1099, 1100. A brig and a schooner captured by the late U. S. brig Rattlesnake and sunk.

1101. Brig Fortitude, from Rio Janeiro, with a great cargo of hides, coffee, dye-wood, &c. sent into Union River, Maine, by the Surpriza of Baltimore.

1102. Schooner George Canning, from Spain for England, laden with Merino wool and fruit, captured by the Gen. Armstrong of New York, and sent into Thomastown.

1103. Ship Pizarro, from Liverpool for Amelia Island, with dry goods, crates, copper and salt, sent into Savannah by the Midas of Baltimore.

1104. Brig Espiranza, from Amelia for Havana, with cotton, rice and flour, sent into ditto by ditto.

1106, 1107, 1108, 1109. Ship Julia, brig Mary Ann, schooners John Duncan and Louisa, captured by the Harrison of Baltimore, divested of goods to the value of £18,000 sterling, and given up or destroyed.

1110. Schooner —, with a large amount of specie on board, captured by ditto, and manned for the United States.

☞ The Harrison has arrived at Savannah with her rich spoils.

1111. Brig Betsy, with a cargo of fish, from Newfoundland for Barbadoes sent into Boston, by the York of Baltimore.

1112. Ship Alfred, ballast, sent into a southern port by the Harpey of Baltimore.

1113. Ship Antonia under Russian colors, from Lisbon for St. Michaels, laden with dry goods, brandy, and some hard ware and crockery, sent into ditto by ditto.

1114, 1115. Two brigs in ballast, captured by ditto and burnt.

1116. Schooner Henry, with a cargo of fish, from Halifax, captured by the Saratoga, of New-York, (then 4 days out) and sent into New-Bedford.

1117. Packet — captured by the Harpey of Baltimore, and divested of 10,000$. The Harpey has arrived at an eastern port. This vessel was the Princess Elizabeth, 8 guns (two long brass 9's &c. 9, 12 lb. gunnades) and 38 men, taken after a warm defence, in which she had some killed and wounded, and was much cut up. She had on board a Turkish ambassador for England; an aid to a British general; and the 2d officer of a 74. She was ransomed for $2,000 after taking from her the specie, and her two brass, and two other guns (the rest being thrown overboard) five pipes of wine, &c. The privateer had one man killed.

1118. Ship Hero from Newfoundland, with 4,333 quintals of cod fish, sent into Hyannis, by the Ida of Boston.

1119. East-India company's ship Countess of Harcourt, 320 tons 6 heavy guns and 90 men; outward bound, laden with dry-goods, brandy, rum, gin, &c. &c. separated from the fleet in a gale, and captured in the British channel by the Sabine of Baltimore, and sent into a southern port. This is the first British Indiaman that has visited us for many years. We should like to have a few dozen more of them!

1120. "His majesty's" packet, the cutter Landraile, — guns, 33 men, captured after a hard battle in the British channel, by the Syren of Baltimore, divested, &c. and the prisoners brought to New-York.

1121, 1122, Two brigs captured by the same; one burnt the other released, being divested, &c.

1123, 1124, 1125, 1126, 1127, 1128, 1129, 1130, 1131, 1132, 1133, 1134, 1135, 1136; fourteen enemy vessels, captured in the British channel by the Governor Tompkins of New-York (chiefly owned in Baltimore,) divested of their valuable articles, and burnt. The privateer had also taken six other prizes. We hope to hear further of them.

1137. Brig Betsey and Mary, from Spain for London, with wool, &c. captured by the Kemp of Baltimore, divested of 105 bales merino wool, and burnt.

1138. Ship Calypso, under Swedish colors, with Dutch papers, captured by the same, divested of some part of her cargo and permitted to proceed.

1139. Brig Caledonia, from Bordeaux for Lisbon, also under Swedish colors, but with British papers captured by the same, divested of 30 bales of dry-goods and 3000$ in specie belonging to the paymaster of the 41st regiment (who was paroled) and suffered to proceed.

1146. Brig New-Frederick from Smyrna for Hull, captured by the same, and out of humanity to an Italian lady, permitted to proceed, after divesting her of some articles.

☞ The Kemp has arrived at North Carolina from Nantz, where she completed her cargo, which is exceedingly valuable. She sailed as a letter of marque.

1141. Schooner Contract, laden with salt, sent into North Carolina by the Roger of Norfolk.

1142. "His majesty's" transport brig Doris, No. 650, captured by the Grampus of Baltimore, sent into Marblehead. The Doris was from Senegal bound to Portsmouth; and had on board 30 or 40 soldiers; also two elegant horses, one hyena, two jackalls, &c. presents for the prince Regent.

1143, 1144. Ship Hoppet, and brig Eliza, from Amelia bound to England with cotton, sent into Savannah by the Saucy Jack of Charleston.

1145, 1146. Two merchantmen captured by the United States brig Syren, and burnt. Particulars not yet known.

1148. "His majesty's" brig Melville, 14 guns, laden with valuable stores, chased ashore on lake Ontario and destroyed.

POSTSCRIPT.

Our latest accounts from below assure us of the fact that the enemy's force has gone down the bay. Perhaps, to return with a strong southerly wind, the more unexpectedly.

The National Intelligencer of yesterday contains another letter from colonel Croghan. He landed at the Nautauwasaga (which empties into Lake Huron, and is the line of communication with York, &c.) where he found the enemy's schooner, the Nancy, under the protection of a block-house. He opened a fire with some howitzers, and in a little while he blew up the block-house—the flames communicated to the schooner and she was also destroyed. She was laden with stores for Michillimackinac. The colonel has returned to Detroit.

FROM THE REPUBLICAN.

Plattsburgh, September 1—10 o'clock A. M.—The enemy's forces have advanced into our country—they last night encamped near Champlain. Their force is represented at 5,000—eighteen or twenty pieces of artillery. Of this force, 400 are said to be Indians, and 1 or 200 dragoons. It is believed they design to attack this place. Major Appling, with his corps, are in Chazy. An express who came in this morning, has furnished us with the following copy of a BRIGADE GENERAL ORDER.

Camp, near Odeltown, Aug. 30.

Major-general Brisbane having received instructions to advance with the troops under his command into the territory of the United States, avails himself of the opportunity of requesting that commanding officers will use every exertion to maintain the strictest discipline in the troops under their command; and he holds them responsible that in every instance where a complaint is made to him of any injury sustained by the inhabitants, that he will see them redressed, and whatever damage is done, is instantly to be paid for, and charged against those concerned; and where this cannot be ascertained, to the corps in general, so that offending people may not be sufferers.

On taking the necessary precaution against individuals who may so far forget what is due to themselves and their country as to commit plunder or violence, the major-general is at the same time fully convinced, that almost the whole of the troops are determined that their conduct shall not bring disgrace on the British name; he therefore calls upon them to discover those who may be guilty of any act of plunder or oppression, that they may be brought to the punishment they merit, and the soldiers must soon find that such a line of conduct will add much to their comforts, for the inhabitants of the country finding they are properly treated and protected, will bring every article requisite into the camp; for those who remain quiet in their houses are not in the smallest degree to be molested nor their property taken from them, without their full consent, and its being paid for, as it is not against such persons that Great Britain makes war; but against the government, whose folly and ambition has brought the miseries of war into their country, and the army and individuals in arms in support of such a government.

The major-general commanding has requested the magistrates of the country to explain to the people his object and determination on entering the American territory, and he trusts that the conduct of the soldiers will be such as to reflect no shade of dishonor on their country.

By command of major-general Brisbane.

Baltimore, September 24, 1814.

Being disturbed by the enemy, and having every person in the office, a small boy excepted, under arms, last Saturday passed without a publication of the WEEKLY REGISTER. We shall bring up the now two wanting numbers as fast as we can, without regard to particular days of publication, until we get into regularity of time, with our work. The pressure of important matter is a particular inducement to this mode of proceeding at this time; and the index for the 6th volume will be a little delayed for the purpose of speedily laying many documents and facts before our readers.

As the "events of the war" thicken, the utility of such a record as this becomes the more manifest. By copious details and methodical arrangement we shall exert ourselves to meet the expectation of our patrons and friends.

The present number contains an account of four glorious events—the defeat of the British at fort Erie, at Plattsburg, and Baltimore, and the capture of their whole fleet on Champlain. "Te Deum laudamus!"

Copy of a letter from vice-admiral Cochrane to Mr. Monroe.

His Britannic majesty's ship, the Tonnant, in the Patuxent river, 18th August, 1814.

SIR—Having been called upon by the governor general of the Canadas to aid him in carrying into effect measures of retaliation against the inhabitants of the United States, for the wanton destruction committed by their army in Upper Canada, it has become imperiously my duty, conformably with the nature of the governor general's application, to issue to the naval force under my command, an order to destroy and lay waste such towns and districts upon the coast, as may be found assailable.

I had hoped that this contest would have terminated, without my being obliged to resort to severities which are contrary to the usage of civilized warfare, and as it has been with extreme reluctance and concern that I have found myself compelled to adopt this system of devastation, I shall be equally gratified if the conduct of the executive of the United States will authorise my staying such proceedings, by making reparation to the suffering inhabitants of Upper Canada: thereby manifesting that if the destructive measures pursued by their army were never sanctioned, they will no longer be permitted by the government.

I have the honor to be, sir, with much consideration, your most obedient humble servant.

Copy of a letter from Mr. Monroe to sir Alexander Cochrane, vice admiral, &c. &c.

Department of state, September 6, 1814.

SIR—I have had the honor to receive your letter of the 18th of August, stating, that having been called on by the governor general of the Canadas, to aid him in carrying into effect measures of retaliation against the inhabitants of the United States, for the wanton desolation committed by their army in Upper Canada, it has become your duty, conformably with the nature of the governor general's application, to issue to the naval force under your command, an order to destroy and lay waste such towns and districts upon the coast as may be found assailable.

It is seen with the greatest surprise, that this system of devastation which has been practised by the British forces, so manifestly contrary to the usage of civilized warfare, is placed by you on the ground of retaliation. No sooner were the United States compelled to resort to war against Great Britain, than they resolved to wage it in a manner most consonant to the principles of humanity, and to those friendly relations which it was desirable to preserve between the two nations, after the restoration of peace. They perceived however with the deepest regret that a spirit alike just and humane was neither cherished nor acted on by your government. Such an assertion would not be hazarded, if it was not supported by facts, the proof of which has perhaps already carried the same conviction to other nations that it has to the people of these states. Without dwelling on the deplorable cruelties committed by the savages in the British ranks, and in British pay, on American prisoners at the river Raisin, which to this day have never been disavowed or atoned, I refer, as more immediately connected with the subject of your letter, to the wanton desolation that was committed, at Havre-de-grace, and at Georgetown, early in the Spring 1813. These villages were burnt and ravaged by the naval forces of Great Britain, to the ruin of their unarmed inhabitants, who saw with astonishment that they derived no protection to their property from the laws of war. During the same season, scenes of invasion and pillage, carried on under the same authority, were witnessed all along the waters of the Chesapeake, to an extent inflicting the most serious private distress, and under circumstances that justified the suspicion, that revenge and cupidity, rather than the manly motives that should dictate the hostility of the high minded foe, led to their perpetration. The late destruction of the houses of the government in this city is another act which comes necessarily in view. In the wars of modern Europe, no examples of the kind, even among nations the most hostile to each other, can be traced. In the course of ten years past, the capitals of the principal powers of the continent of Europe have been conquered, and occupied alternately by the victorious armies of each other, and no instance of such wanton and unjustifiable destruction has been seen. We must go back to distant and barbarous ages, to find a parallel for the acts of which I complain.

Although these acts of desolation invited, if they did not impose on the government the necessity of retaliation, yet in no instance has it been authorised. The burning of the village of Newark in Upper Canada, posterior to the early outrages above enumerated, was not executed on that principle. The village of Newark adjoined fort George, and its destruction was justified by the officer who ordered it on the ground that it became necessary in the military operations there. The act however was disavowed by the government. The burning which took place at Long Point was unauthorised by the government, and the conduct of the officer subjected to the investigation of a military tribunal. For the burning at St. David's, committed by stragglers, the officer who commanded in that quarter was dismissed without a trial, for not preventing it.

I am commanded by the president distinctly to state, that it as little comports with any orders which have been issued to the military and naval commanders of the United States, as it does with the established and known humanity of the American nation, to pursue a system which it appears you have adopted. This government owes it to itself, to the principles which it has ever held sacred, to disavow, as justly changeable to it, any such wanton, cruel and unjustifiable warfare.

Whatever unauthorised irregularity may have been committed by any of its troops, it would have been ready, acting on these principles of sacred and eternal obligation, to disavow, and as far as might be practicable, to repair. But in the plan of desolating warfare which your letter so explicitly makes known, and which is attempted to be excused on a plea so utterly groundless, the president perceives a spirit of deep rooted hostility, which, without the evidence of such facts, he could not have believed existed, or would have been carried to such an extremity.

For the reparation of injuries, of whatever nature they may be, not sanctioned by the law of nations, which the military or naval force of either power may have committed, against the other, this government will always be ready to enter into reciprocal arrangements. It is presumed that your government will neither expect nor propose any which are not reciprocal.

Should your government adhere to a system of desolation, so contrary to the views and practice of the United States, so revolting to humanity, and repugnant to the sentiment and usages of the civilized world, whilst it will be seen with the deepest regret, it must and will be met with a determination and constancy becoming a free people, contending in a just cause for their essential rights, and their dearest interests.

I have the honor to be, with great consideration, sir, your most obedient humble servant,
(Signed) JAMES MONROE.

Vice admiral sir Alexander Cochrane, commander in chief of H. B. M. ships and vessels, &c.

From the National Intelligencer.

We observe it mentioned in some prints, that the late letter of admiral Cochrane to the secretary of state was received before the enemy entered Washington. This is not so. We state the fact, on the most unquestionable authority, that it did not arrive in Washington until late in the night of the 30th of August, and that it was not received by the secretary of state until the morning of the 31st.

The letter was dated on the 18th, probably the very day the Tonnant arrived in the Patuxent. It affects to give previous notice of an intention to destroy and lay waste our towns, and yet is not even sent off (although antedated) until after this purpose has been accomplished at Washington. This is a very pretty little trick played off by the vice-admiral in his first essay at diplomatic correspondence, and we doubt not has been matter of pleasant chuckling between himself and friend, that accomplished and high bred gentleman admiral George Cockburn. It is worthy of remark, that a near blood relation of the vice-admiral's has lately been convicted in England and sentenced to the pillory for a deception practised upon the public there. The vice appears to run through the family.

Copy of a letter from lieut. col Croghan to brig. gen. M. Arthur, commanding 8th military district, dated Detroit, August 23, 1814.

DEAR SIR—I communicated in my report of the 11th inst. my intention of continuing on lake Huron with three companies, for the purpose of breaking up any depots which the enemy might have on the east side of the lake.

We were fortunate in learning that the only line of communication from York to Mackinaw, &c. was by the way of lake Simcoe and Nautauwasaga river, which empties into lake Huron about 100 miles S. E. of Cabot's Head. To that river, therefore, our course was directed, in hope of finding the enemy's schr. Nancy which was thought to be in that quarter. On the 13th inst. the fleet anchored off the mouth of that river, and my troops were quickly disembarked on the peninsula formed between the river and lake for the purpose of fixing a camp.

On reconnoitering the position thus taken, it was discovered that the schooner Nancy was drawn up in the river a few hundred yards above us, under cover of a block-house, erected on a commanding situation on the opposite shore.

Having landed with nothing larger than 4 pounders, and it being now too late in the evening to establish a battery of heavy guns, I determined on remaining silent until I could be enabled to open with effect.

On the following morning a fire for a few minutes was kept up by the shipping upon the block-house, but with little effect, as the direction towards it only could be given, a thin wood intervening to obscure the view. About 12 o'clock two howitzers (an 8 1-2 and 5 1-2 inch) being placed within a few hundred yards of the block-house, commenced a fire which lasted but a few minutes, when the house blew up; at the same time communicated the fire to the Nancy which was quickly so enveloped in flames, as to render any attempts which might have been made to save her unavailing. My first impression on seeing the explosion was, that the enemy, after having spiked his guns, had set fire to the magazine himself; but upon examination it was found to have been occasioned by the bursting of one of our shells; which, firing some combustible matter near the magazine, gave the enemy but barely time to escape before the explosion took place. The commodore secured and brought off the guns which were mounted within the block-house (two 24 pound carronades and one long 6 pounder,) together with some round shot, grape and cannister. The enemy will feel sensibly the loss of the Nancy, her cargo consisting (at the time of her being on fire) of several hundred barrels of provisions, intended as a six months supply for the garrison at Mackinac.

Having executed (so far as my force could effect) the orders of the 2d of June, given me by the secretary of war, I left Nautauwasaga on the 15th, and arrived on the 21st at the mouth of the river St. Clair with my whole force except a few soldiers of the 17th infantry, who were left as marines on board two small vessels, which still continue to cruise on that lake.

I am, most respectfully, sir, your most obedient humble servant,

GEORGE CROGHAN,
Lieut. col. 2d rifle reg^t.

commanding 8th military district.*

BATTLE OF FORT ERIE.

Copies of letters from brigadier general Gaines to the secretary of war, dated Head-quarters, Fort Erie, U. C. August 23, 1814.

SIR—Loss of sleep and constant exposure to the weather in its various changes, gave me some days ago a violent cold, which has put it out of my own power to do any thing more than the state of the service here rendered absolutely indispensable. Hence my apology for delaying until this day my report of the battle of the 15th inst.

General Drummond is quietly engaged in collecting his reinforcements. His camp appears to be fortified. I attempted to look at it a few days past, and it cost me a fine young officer, lieutenant Yates of the 4th rifle regiment, killed, and lieutenant Kearsley of that excellent corps, with lieutenant Childs of the 9th, wounded, with the loss of some two or three privates killed and five or six wounded. The loss of the enemy I was unable to ascertain. He would not leave his defences, and I did not think fit to leave mine at all exposed. Several deserters say that the 6th and 82nd regiments arrived last night. If this be true their strength is about the same as it was before the battle of the 15th. Their colonel Scott is dead; about twenty deserters from the De Watteville regiment and some few from other corps concur in the report that their loss in killed, wounded and missing on the 15th was upwards of a thousand.

Your obedient servant,

E. P. GAINES, brig. gen. commanding.

General Armstrong, secretary at war.

SIR—I have the honor to communicate for the information of the department of war, the particulars of the battle fought at this place on the 15th inst. between the left wing of the 2d division of the northern army, under my command, and the British forces in the peninsula of Upper Canada, commanded by lieutenant general Drummond, which terminated in a signal victory in favor of the United American arms.

Our position on the margin of the lake at the entrance of the Niagara river, being nearly a horizontal plain twelve to fifteen feet above the surface of the water, possessing few natural advantages, had been strengthened in front by temporary parapet breastworks, entrenchments and abattis, with two batteries and six field pieces. The small unfinished fort, Erie, with a 24, 18, and 12 pounders, forms the north-east, and the Douglass battery, with an 18 and 6 pounder near the edge of the lake, the south-east angle of our right. The left is defended by a redoubt battery with six field pieces just thrown up on a small ridge. Our rear was left open to the lake, bordered by a rocky shore of easy ascent. The battery on the left was defended by captain Towson; fort Erie by captain Williams, with major Trimble's command of the 19th infantry; the batteries on the front of captains Biddle and Fanning; the whole of the artillery commanded by major Hindman. Parts of the 11th, 9th, and 22d, infantry (of the late veteran brigade of major general Scott) were posted on the right under the command of lieutenant colonel Aspinwall. General Ripley's brigade, consisting of the 21st and 23d, defended the left. General Porter's brigade of New-York and Pennsylvania volunteers, with our distinguished riflemen, occupied the centre.

I have heretofore omitted stating to you, that during the 13th and 14th the enemy had kept up a brisk cannonade; which was sharply returned from our batteries, without any considerable loss on our part. At 6 P. M. one of their shells lodged in a small magazine in fort Erie which was fortunately almost empty. It blew up with an explosion more awful in appearance than injurious in its effects, as it did not disable a man or derange a gun. It occasioned but a momentary cessation of the thunders of the artillery on both sides; it was followed by a loud and joyous shout by the British army, which was instantly returned on our part, and captain Williams amidst the smoke of the explosion renewed the contest by an animated roar of his heavy cannon.

From the supposed loss of our ammunition, and the consequent depression such an event was likely to produce upon the minds of our men, I felt persuaded that this explosion would lead the enemy to assault, and made my arrangements accordingly. The annexed paper No. 1. is a copy of lieutenant general Drummond's order and plan of attack.

The night was dark and the early part of it raining, but the faithful centinel slept not; one third of the troops were up at their posts. At half past 7 o'clock the right column of the enemy approached and though enveloped in darkness* black as his designs and principles, was distinctly heard on our left and promptly marked by our musquetry under major Wood and cannon under captain Towson. Being mounted at the moment, I repaired to the point of attack, where the sheet of fire rolling from Towson's battery and the musquetry of the left wing of the 21st infantry under major Wood, enabled me to see the enemy's column of about 1500 men approaching on that point; his advance was not checked until it had approached within ten feet of our infantry. A line of loose brush representing an abattis only intervened; a column of the enemy attempted to pass round the abattis through the water where it was nearly breast deep. Apprehending that this point would be carried, I ordered a detachment of riflemen and infantry to its support, but having met with the gallant commander major Wood, was assured by him that he could defend his position without reinforcements. At this moment the enemy were repulsed, but instantly renewed the charge and were again repulsed. My attention was now called to the right, where our batteries and lines were soon lighted by a most brilliant fire of cannon and musquetry; it announced the approach of the centre and left columns of the enemy, under colonels Drummond and Scott; the latter was received by the veteran 9th under the command of captain Foster, and captains Broughtons and Harding's companies of New-York and Pennsylvania volunteers, aided by a six pounder judiciously posted by major McKee, chief engineer, who was most active and useful at this point; they were repulsed. That of the centre led by colonel Drummond was not long kept in check; it approached at once every assailable point of the fort, and with scaling ladders ascended the parapet, but was repulsed with dreadful carnage. The assault was twice repeated, and as often checked, but the enemy having moved round the ditch covered by darkness added to the heavy cloud of smoke which had rolled from our cannon and musquetry, enveloping surrounding objects, repeated the charge, re-ascended the ladders; their pikes, bayonets and spears fell upon our gallant artillerists. The gallant spirits of our favorite captain Williams and lieutenants McDonough and Watmough, with their brave men, were overcome. The two former and several of their men received deadly wounds. Our bastion was lost, lieutenant McDonough, being severely wounded, demanded quarter. It was refused by colonel Drummond. The lieutenant then seizing a handspike, and nobly defended himself until he was shot down with a pistol by the monster who had refused him quarter, who often reiterated the order—"give the damned yankees no quarter." This officer, whose bravery, if it had been seasoned with virtue, would have entitled him to the admiration of every soldier—this hardened murderer soon met his fate. He was shot through the breast by one of the regiment while repeating the order "to give no quarter."

The battle now raged with increased fury on the right, but on the left the enemy was repulsed and put to flight. Thence and from the centre I ordered reinforcements. They were promptly sent by brigadier general Ripley and brigadier general Porter. Captain Fanning, of the corps of artillery, kept up a spirited and destructive fire with his field pieces on the enemy attempting to approach the fort. Major Hindman's gallant efforts aided by major Trimble, having failed to drive the enemy from the bastion with the remaining artillerists and infantry in the fort, captain Birdsall of 4th rifle regiment, with a detachment of riflemen, gallantly rushed in through the gateway to their assistance, and with some infantry charged the enemy; but was repulsed, and the captain severely wounded. A detachment from the 11th, 19th, and 22d, infantry, under captain Foster of the 11th, were introduced over the interior bastion, for the purpose of charging the enemy. Major Hall, assistant inspector general, very handsomely tendered his services to lead the charge. The charge was gallantly made by captain Foster and major Hall, but owing to the narrowness of the passage up to the bastion admitting only two or three men abreast, it failed. It was often repeated, and as often checked. The enemy's force in the bastion was, however, much cut to pieces and diminished by our artillery and small arms. At this moment every operation was arrested by the explosion of some cartridges deposited in the end of the stone building adjoining the contested bastion. The explosion was tremendous—it was decisive: the bastion was restored. At this moment captain Biddle was ordered to cause a field piece to be posted so as to enfilade the exterior plain and salient glacis. The captain though not recovered from a severe contusion in the shoulder, received from one of the enemy's shells, promptly took his position, and served his field piece with vivacity and effect. Captain Fanning's battery likewise played upon them at this time with great effect. The enemy were in a few moments entirely defeated, taken or put to flight, leaving on the field 221 killed, 174 wounded, and 186 prisoners, including 24 officers killed and 7 wounded and prisoners. A large portion are so severely wounded, that they cannot survive; the slightly wounded, it is presumed, were carried off.

To brigadier general Ripley much credit is due for the judicious disposition of the left wing previous to the action, and for the steady disciplined courage manifested by him and his immediate command, and for the promptness with which he complied with my orders for reinforcement during the action. Brigadier general Porter, commanding the New-York and Pennsylvania volunteers, manifested a degree of vigilance and judgment in his preparatory arrangements, as well as military skill and courage in action, which proves him to be worthy the confidence of his country and the brave volunteers who fought under him. Of the volunteers, captains Boughton and Harding, with their detachments, posted on the right and attached to the line, commanded by captain E. Foster, of the veteran 9th infantry, handsomely contributed to the repulse of the left column of the enemy under colonel Scott.

The judicious preparations and steady conduct of lieutenant colonel Aspinwall, commanding the first brigade, merit approbation.

To major McKee, chief engineer, the greatest credit is due for the excellent arrangement and skilful execution of his plans for fortifying and defending the right, and for his correct and seasonable suggestions to regain the bastion. Major Wood of the engineers, also greatly contributed to the previous measures of defence. He had accepted the command of a regiment of infantry (the 21st,) for which he has often proved himself well qualified, but never so conspicuously as on this occasion.

Towson's battery emitted a constant sheet of fire. Wood's small arms lighted up the space, and repulsed five terrible charges made between the battery and the lake. Brigadier general Ripley speaks in high terms of the officers and men engaged, particularly captains Marston and Ropes; lieutenants Riddle (of the 15th doing duty with the 21st) and Hall; ensigns Benn, Jones, Cummings and Thomas of the 21st, and Keally and Green of the 19th.

Major Hindman, and the whole of the artillery under the command of that excellent officer, displayed a degree of gallantry and good conduct not to be surpassed. The particular situation of captain Towson, and the much lamented captain Williams and lieutenant McDonough, and that of lieutenant Watmough, as already described, with their respective commands, rendered them most conspicuous. The courage and good conduct of lieutenant Zantlinger and lieutenant Chiles, is spoken of in high terms by major Hindman and captain Towson, as also that of sergeant-major Denhon. Captains Biddle and Fanning, on the centre and right of their entrenchments, threw their shot to the right, left and front, and annoyed the indians and light troops of the enemy approaching from the woods. Lieutenant Fontaine in his zeal to meet the enemy, was unfortunately wounded and made prisoner. Lieutenant Bird was active and useful, and in fact every individual of the corps did their duty.

The detachment of Scott's gallant brigade, consisted of parts of the 9th 11th and 22d infantry, did its duty in a manner worthy the high reputation the brigade had acquired at Chippewa and at the falls of Niagara. The 9th under the command of captain Edmund Foster, was actively engaged against the left of the enemy, and with the aid of lieutenant Douglass' corps of bombardiers, commanding the water battery, and of that of the volunteers, under captains Broughton and Harding, effected their repulse. The good conduct of lieutenants Childs, Cushman and Foot, and ensign Blake, deserves commendation.

The officers killed are captain Williams and lieutenant McDonough of the artillery; wounded lieutenant Watmough of the artillery; ensign Cisna 19th; lieutenant Bushnell 21st; lieutenants Brown and Belknap 23d; and captain Birdsall, 4th rifle regiment all severely.

Lieutenant Fontaine of the artillery, who was taken prisoner, writes from the British camp, that he fortunately fell into the hands of the Indians, who after taking his money, treated him kindly. It would seem, then, that these savages had not joined in the resolution to give no quarter.

To major Jones, assistant adjutant general, and major Hall, assistant inspector general; captain Harris of the dragoons, vol. aid-de-camp; lieutenant Belton, aid-de-camp, much credit is due for their constant vigilance and strict attention to every duty previous to the action, and the steady courage, zeal and activity which they manifested during the action.

The surgeons, doctors Fuller 23d, Troubridge 21st, with their mates; doctors Gale of the 25d, and Everitt and Allen of the 21st, deserve the warmest approbation for their indefatigable exertions and humane attention to the wounded of our army, as well as to the prisoners who fell into their hands.

I have the honor to be, sir, your very obedient servant,
E. P. GAINES, brig. gen. commanding.

Seamen 90.

Detachments of Royal Artillery, 1 sub. and 12 men—capt. Barney, 89th regt. will guide this column, which is to attack the fort.

Capt. Elliott, deputy quarter master general, will conduct this column, which will attack the right of the enemy's position towards the lake, and endeavor to penetrate by the openings betwixt the forts and entrenchments, using the short ladders at the same time, to pass the entrenchment, which is reported to be defended only by the enemy's 9th regt. 250 strong.

The infantry pickets on Buck's Road will be pushed on with the Indians, and attack the enemy's picket on that road. Lt. col. Nicholl, Q. M. gen. of mil. will conduct this column. The rest of the troops, viz.

1st Battalion Royals.

Remainder of De Watteville's regiment, Glengary light infantry and incorporated militia will remain in reserve, under Lt. col. Tucker, are to be posted on the ground at present occupied by our pickets and covering parties.

Squadron of the 19th light dragoons, in the ravine, in the rear of the battery, nearest to the advance, ready to receive charge of prisoners and conduct them to the rear.

The Lieut. Gen. will station himself at or near the battery, where reports are to be made to him.—Lt. col. Fischer, commanding the right column, will follow the instruction which he has received; copies of which are communicated to col. Scott and Lieut. col. Drummond, for their guidance.

The Lieut. Gen. most strongly recommends a free use of the bayonet.

The enemy's force does not exceed 1500 fit for duty, and those are represented as much dispirited.

The ground on which the columns of attack are to be formed, will be pointed out; and orders for their advance will be given by the Lieut. gen. commanding.

ROGER JONES,

Assistant Adj. General.

Copy of a letter from brig. gen. Gaines to the secretary of war, dated

H. Q. FORT ERIE, U. C. Aug. 26, 1814.

Sir—In my report of the battle of the 15th inst. I inadvertently omitted the names of captain Chunn of the 19th, lieuts. Bowman and Larned of the 21st, and lieut. Jewitt of the 11th infantry, as also my brigade major, lieut. Gleason; each of whom bore a conspicuous part in the action, and whom I beg leave to recommend to your notice. Lieuts. Bowman and Larned commanded companies in the 21st, which so gallantly beat the enemy's right column. Capt. Chunn with his company was doing duty with the same regt. I also omitted mentioning that a part of this regiment pursued the enemy's right upwards of a mile and took nearly one hundred prisoners: his left was likewise pursued and more than an hundred prisoners were taken beyond our works. These facts prove that the affair was not merely a defence of our position or a mere repulse of the enemy, as I find it called by some. As regards myself, I am satisfied with the result, and am not disposed to make any difficulty about the name by which the affair may be called; but it is due to the brave men I have the honor to command, that I should say, that the affair was to the enemy a severe beating and a defeat, and it was to us a handsome victory.

Our position is grown stronger every day by the exertions of majors M'Rea and Wood, and the officers and men generally. We keep up a smart cannonade. One of the enemy's pickets yesterday approached nearer to ours than usual. Major Brooks, officer of the day, added one hundred men to our picket, attacked and drove them in with considerable loss; the major brought in about 30 muskets.—In this affair, however, we have to lament the loss of another gallant officer, capt. Wattles, of the 23d, our loss was otherwise inconsiderable.

I have the honor to be, sir, your very obedient servant.

E. P. GAINES,

Brig. gen commanding.

Hon. John Armstrong, Secretary of war.

British official account of the battle at Erie.

A friend at Sackett's Harbor has forwarded us the British official account of this battle, which we have published this day. This account was taken out of a mail which was captured in Canada by a scouting party of our troops. It will be seen by this account that the British acknowledge the loss of 905 men in killed, wounded and missing, and this number is perhaps less than the real loss. [Ev. Post.]

Head Quarters, Montreal, 25th August, 1814.

General Order.—In promulgating to the troops an extract from a district general order issued by lieutenant-general Drummond to the right division of this army, in consequence of the capture of two of the enemy's schooners co-operating in the defence of the enemy's position at fort Erie, the commander of the forces avails himself of the opportunity it presents to acknowledge the high sense he entertains of the valuable services rendered to the right division by captain Dobbs, of the royal navy, and the officers and seamen of the vessels placed under command for that purpose, by commodore sir James Yeo.

This event, so ably planned and so gallantly executed, was followed by a general attack of the enemy's forts and entrenchments.

Lieutenant-general Drummond reports that the spirit with which it was undertaken enabled our troops to surmount every obstacle. Fort Erie and the entrenchments were entered; the guns taken on the barrack block-house (the enemy's last refuge) when unfortunately a most violent explosion occurred on the battery: in its effect destroying and disabling many a valuable officer and soldier, and caused so considerable a consternation as to induce the remaining troops to abandon the works, and all those advantages which they had gained by their determined conduct, and precipitately to retire to our first approaches.

From other causes almost inseparable from night operations carried on in a close and difficult country, the right column failed in the object it had to accomplish.

With deep regret the commander of the forces records the loss his majesty's service has sustained on this occasion.

Head-quarters, camp before fort Erie, 13th Aug. 1814.

Extract from Morning District General Order.

Lieutenant-general Drummond congratulates the army on the brilliant achievements executed last night by captain Dobbs of the royal navy, and a party of seamen and marines, who in the most gallant style boarded, and after a short struggle carried two of the enemy's armed schooners anchored close to fort Erie. Accident alone prevented the capture of the third schooner. Those captured are the Somers and Porcupine; the former mounts two long 12 pounders; the latter one 12. They were commanded by lieutenants, and had on board 35 men each. The lieutenant-general laments to find that lieutenant Radcliffe, commander of his majesty's sch'r Netly, has fallen on this occasion; he was killed in the act of boarding. He will be buried at 12 o'clock, with such marks of respect as circumstances will permit; besides Mr. Radcliffe, our loss has been only one seaman killed and four wounded. The enemy's loss is one seaman killed—3 officers and four seamen wounded. The whole enterprise reflects the highest credit on the ability and spirit of captain Dobbs and the gallant party under his command.

J. HARVEY,

Lieut. Col. Dep. Adj. Gen.

GENERAL ORDERS.

Adjutant General's Office, Fort Erie, Sept. 2, 1814.

Major-general Brown resumes the command of the troops on the Niagara frontier.

The major-general recurs with proud satisfaction to the conduct of his division, since the opening of the campaign. It was opened in defence of the munitions of war destined for the navy, which were embarked at Oswego when the enemy was in force on the lake, landed at Sandy creek, and transported to Sackett's Harbor.
Oswego displays the discipline and prowess of a single battalion of artillery, led by colonel Mitchell—and Sandy creek gives name to the gallant achievement of the first riflemen under lieutenant-colonel Appling.

The bravery alone of American soldiers has often shown them superior to their British adversaries; but on the plains of Chippawa bravery and discipline both rise pre-eminent, and triumph over the enemy's best troops, led on in the ablest manner. There the brigade of major-general Scott fought British veterans, battalion against battalion, and the smallest in numbers conquered. Victory crowned the American arms.

At the falls of Niagara our brave soldiers met a severer trial;
they rose superior to the test, and proved their intrepidity equal to any exigencies. They engaged the whole force of the enemy, and again conquered a larger than their own. The victory was ours—the trophies of victory only were not accomplished. The enemy had relinquished the contest and the field to our superiority.

The glorious defeat of an important expedition of the enemy, on our own shore, is again accomplished by the first rifle regiment on its arrival at this frontier, under the late distinguished major Morgan.

Another trial was left for the brave spirits who compose the American force in Canada. An endurance of fatigue was shewn with unexampled cheerfulness, on the works around their camp at Fort Erie, and a new test of military prowess was called for to complete the glorious character of the division. They were called to repulse the attack of heavy columns of the enemy, on their lines of entrenchment—and the signal manner in which they acquitted themselves, as well as the vigilance of their brave and skilful commander, brigadier-general Gaines, is established by the brilliant victory acquired on the 15th of August. The discomfiture of the forces under lieutenant-general Drummond, was attended with a disparity of loss unexampled in the record of battles.

By order of major-general Brown,

C. K. GARDNER, Adjutant-general.

ATTACK UPON BALTIMORE.

To detail, with reasonable accuracy, the minutiae of the events that have happened at Baltimore since Sunday morning, the 11th inst. when the enemy made his appearance, to the time of his departure on the 15th, is not easily done: but the readers of The Register will expect it, and we shall endeavor to give a succinct narration of the proceedings, with a steady eye to the truth of each matter referred to; avoiding, nevertheless, every thing that may tend to increase the information of the incendiary foe, as to our means or resources. Hence an account of our troops or works will not be expected. Sufficient is it to say, that the same force would make much less impression now than it did, or could have done, at the time of the attack.

After the affair at Bladensburg and capture of Washington, an attack upon this city was confidently expected. Indeed, general Ross had fixed upon it for his winter quarters; and boasted, that with the force he had, he would go where he pleased through Maryland. Thus forewarned, considerable additions were made to the defences of the place—some of the troops of gen. Winder's command were collected—Rodgers and Perry were here; and a good many noble volunteers flocked in from the adjacent parts of our own state and from Virginia and Pennsylvania. The Baltimore brigade was taken en masse into the service of the United States; and the whole submitted to the direction of major-general Smith, of the Maryland militia.

On Saturday, the 10th inst. we had information that the enemy was ascending the bay, and on Sunday morning his ships were seen at the mouth of our river, the Patapsco, in number from 40 to 50.—
Some of his vessels entered the river, while others proceeded to North Point (at the mouth of the Patapsco) distant 12 miles from the city, and commenced the debarkation of their troops in the night, which was finished early next morning. In the mean time the frigates, bomb ketches, and small vessels approached and ranged themselves in a formidable line to cannonade the fort, and the town.—
The frigates were lightened before they entered the river—and the ships of line lay off North Point, to overawe us and protect the whole force.

The force that landed consisted of about 9000 men—viz. 5,000 soldiers, 2,000 marines, and 2,000 sailors. The first under major general Ross—the latter commanded by the famous admiral Cockburn.
The troops were a part of Wellington's "invincibles."
Some works were erecting not far from North Point to arrest their progress; but their incipient state forbade a stand being made at them; and the enemy marched four miles towards us uninterrupted, except by a few flying shots from the cavalry. Here they were met by general Stricker with his entire Baltimore brigade, (except that he had only one company of the regiment of artillery) consisting of
Col. Biays' cavalry; the rifle corps, and the 5th, 6th, 27th, 39th and 51st regiments of infantry, commanded respectively by lieutenant-col. Sterett, J. Donah, Long, Fowler and Amey. In the 5th was incorporated an elegant uniformed company of volunteers from York, Penn. under capt. Spangler; and in the 39th, captain Metzger's fine company of volunteers from Hanover, Penn. and capt. Quantrell's from Hagerstown, Maryland; and in the 6th, capt. Dixon's volunteers from Marietta, Penn.—all the rest were city troops; and the whole, including capt. Montgomery's company of artillery (with 6 four pounders) amounted to about 3200 men. The rest of our forces were judiciously stationed in or near the various defences, &c. About 1 o'clock a party of 150 or 200 men, consisting of captain Levering's and capt. Har-ward's companies of the 5th reg. and capt. Asguth's rifle corps, were detached from the line to feel the enemy, and bring on the battle; they were accompanied by a few artillerists with one of their pieces.
Before they expected it, they were attacked by the British, in very superior numbers, and driven in with some loss after a few fires, to the main body. As the enemy advanced, the artillery opened a destructive fire upon them, which was returned from 2 nine pounders, and the action became general along the line of the 5th and 27th, which were in front. The 39th and 51st were in rear of these, and the 6th advantageously posted still nearer the city, to protect and cover the whole. The fire from the two first named regiments, as well as from the artillery, was very active and uncommonly certain for about an hour. Of the 5th, much was expected, but the 27th behaved, at least, as gallantly. The men took deliberate aim, and the carnage was great—the “invincibles” dodging to the ground, and crawling in a bending posture, to avoid the militia—the “yeomen” they were taught so much to despise. When the 5th and 27th (between which was placed the artillery) were outflanked by the much greater force of the enemy, they retired in better order than could have been expected under a galling fire; and they retired reluctantly at the repeated command of their officers. The artillery had been drawn off a little while before. The right of the 39th was gallantly engaged, but the 51st took no part in the action; and it was not at that time and place expected that the 6th would share in it, else (under its veteran colonel, a soldier of the revolution, and one who met the same foe under Pulaski) it would, no doubt, have distinguished itself. The cavalry, though they performed very severe and important duties, had but little to do in the battle. The whole number of our men actually engaged, did not exceed 1700.

Nearly as much, perhaps, being done at this point as was expected, our force retreated towards the city. The enemy followed slowly, and on Tuesday night approached within about two miles of our entrenchments. Measures were taken to cut them off and punish their temerity; but before general Winder with the Virginia militia, and a squadron of the United States’ cavalry, could bring his plans fully to bear, the British suspecting the design or not liking the appearance of our works, decamped suddenly in the night and embarked with such precipitation that, though closely pursued, a few prisoners only were taken. But the pursuing force merited and have received the thanks of their general; and the whole body collected is entitled to the gratitude of Baltimore and of their country, for the sufferings they so patiently and patriotically endured, being compelled to sleep, if sleep was allowed, in the open air, with the heavens for their canopy, for four nights, during the chief part of which it rained pretty constantly and sometimes heavily. They also received their refreshments irregularly; the whole being packed up in prudent preparation of events that might have happened.

But the attack on fort M’Henry was terribly grand and magnificent. The enemy vessels formed a great half circle in front of the works on the 12th, but out of the reach of our guns, and also those of the battery at the Lazaretto, on the opposite side of the great cove or basin around the head of which the city of Baltimore is built. Fort M’Henry is about 2 miles from the city, a “light little” place, with some finely planned batteries, mounted with heavy cannon, as the British very well know. At 6 o’clock on Tuesday morning, six bomb and some rocket vessels commenced the attack, keeping such a respectful distance as to make the fort rather a target than an opponent; though major Armistead, the gallant commander, and his brave garrison fired occasionally to let the enemy know the place was not given up! Four or five bombs were frequently in the air at a time, and, making a double explosion, with the noise of the foolish rockets and the frings of the fort, Lazaretto and our barges, created a horrible clatter. [Many of these bombs have since been found entire—they weigh, when full of their combustibles, about 210 or 220 lbs. and they threw them much further than our long 42 pounders would reach.] Thus it lasted until about 3 o’clock in the afternoon, when the enemy, growing more courageous, dropped nearer the fort, and gave the garrison and batteries a little of the chance they wanted. The balls now flew like hail stones, and the Britons slipped their cables, hoisted their sails and were off in a moment, but not without damage. When they got out of harm’s way they renewed the “magnanimous” attack, throwing their bombs with an activity excited by their mortification. So they went on until about 1 o’clock in the morning, our batteries now and then firing a single gun. At this time, aided by the darkness of the night and screened by a flame they had kindled, one or two rocket or bomb vessels and many barges, manned with 1200 chosen men, passed fort M’Henry and proceeded up the Patuxent, to assail the town and fort in the rear, and, perhaps, effect a landing. The weak sighted mortals now thought the great deed was done—they gave three cheers, and began to throw their missive weapons. But, alas! their cheering was quickly turned to groaning, and the cries and screams of their wounded and drowning people soon reached the shore; for forts M’Henry and Covington with the City Battery and the Lazaretto and barges, vomited an iron flame upon them, in heated balls, and a storm of heavy bullets flew upon them from the great semi circle of large guns and gallant hearts. The houses in the city were shaken to their foundations; for never, perhaps from the time of the invention of cannon to the present day, were the same number of pieces fired with so rapid succession; particularly from fort Covington where a party of Rodgers’ really invincible crew was posted. Barney’s flotilla-men, at the City Battery, maintained the high reputation they had before earned. The other vessels also began to fire—and the heavens were lighted with flame, and all was a continued explosion for about half an hour. Having got this taste of what was prepared for them (and it was a mere taste) the enemy precipitately retired with his remaining force, battered and crippled, to his respectful distance; the darkness of the night and his ceasing to fire (which was the only guide our people had) preventing his annihilation. All was for sometime still—the silence was awful—but being beyond danger some of his vessels resumed the bombardment, which continued until morning—in all about 24 hours, during which there were thrown not less than 1500 of these great bombs, besides many rockets and some round shot. They must have suffered excessively in this affair—two of their large barges have been found sunk; and in them were yet some dead men. But what the loss really was it is probable we never shall know. They also were at other times injured by fort M’Henry, the Lazaretto and the barges. I myself believe I saw several shot take effect during Tuesday afternoon.

The preservation of our people in the fort is calculated to excite in a wonderful manner our gratitude to that GREAT BEING without whose knowledge “a sparrow does not fall to the ground.” Only four were killed and about 20 wounded, and 2 or 500$ will repair all the damages the fortresses sustained! Lieut. Claagget, of capt. Nicholson’s company of artillery, was the only officer killed in the fort. His friend, sergeant Clemm, of the same corps, received his death at the same time. They were respectable merchants.

The admiral had fully calculated on taking the fort in two hours. Its surrender was spoken of as a matter of course. He said that when it was taken and the shipping destroyed, “he would think about terms for the city.” All about and in the fort is such ample evidence of his zeal to perform his promise, that it seems impossible to believe that greater damage was not done than was really sustained. The gallant and accomplished Armistead, through watching and excessive fatigue (for he had other great duties to do besides defending his post) flagged soon as the fight was done, and now lies very ill; but not dangerously, we trust, though severely afflicted. Many of his gallant companions were also exhausted, but have generally recruited their strength.

To return to the field engagement. The force of the enemy in the battle, may have amounted to 4000 men. They were fine looking fellows, but seemed very unwilling to meet the "yankee" bullets—their dodging from the cannon and stooping before the musquetry has already been noticed. The prisoners and deserters say that for the time the affair lasted and the men engaged, they never received so destructive a fire; and this may well be, for our men fired not by word of command only, but also at an object. Of the 21st British regiment about 500 were landed—on the morning of the 15th they found 171 killed, wounded and missing. Their whole loss may be safely estimated at from 5 to 700 men. Major general ROSS, who did "not care if it rained militia," the incendiary of the capitol, paid the forfeit of that act by his death. He was killed in the early part of the action; and there is reason to believe that two or three other officers high in command met the same fate. Ross was a brave man and an able commander—and if he had been engaged in another system of warfare would have claimed our respectful remembrance. We may admire but we cannot esteem his memory. The character of Moor in Schiller's play of the "Robbers," notwithstanding its grandeur disgusts by the business to which his great talents and accomplishments were devoted. So it was with Ross. His orders, perhaps, may afford some sort of an excuse for his violation of the rules of civilized war. His death was probably the immediate cause why an attack upon our works was not made. General Brooks, on whom the command devolved, would not risk the enterprise.

Our whole loss in the affair was about 20 killed, 90 wounded and 47 prisoners and missing.* The officers killed were James Lowry Donaldson, esq. adjutant of the brave 27th regiment, and one of the representatives of this city in the house of delegates of Maryland—he fell while encouraging his brethren in arms; and lieut. Andre, of the "Gray Vagers" a valuable young man. Maj. Moore of the 27th was severely, but not dangerously wounded. Major Heath of the 5th had two horses shot under him, and major Barry's, of the same regiment, was also killed. The cavalry lost several horses, and some of them on the look-out were taken prisoners. Many particulars must be postponed for want of room. Some interesting incidents will be inserted in our next. For the present we shall only add, that brigadier-general Stricker, whose urbanity has long endeared him to the citizens under his command and the people at large, behaved as became the high charge entrusted to him as a soldier. He has the entire confidence of his brigade. Robert G. Harper, esquire, who volunteered his services as an aid-de-camp, also greatly exerted himself in the hottest part of the fire to encourage and give steadiness to our troops.

The enemy's bomb-vessels, we are told, are much wrecked by their own fire. This may well be supposed when the fact is stated that at every discharge they were forced two feet into the water by the force of it, thus straining every part from stem to stern. Never was the mortification of an invader more complete than that of our enemy. Beaten by militia and defeated by the fort, he went away in the worst possible humor, and a total loss that may amount to not less than 800 men.

The following is from a London paper of June 17—"It is understood, that the grand expedition preparing at Bordeaux for America, under the gallant lord Hill, is destined for the Chesapeake direct. Our little army in Canada, will at the same instant, be directed to make a movement in the direction of the Susquehanna; and both armies will therefore, in all probability meet at Washington, Philadelphia or Baltimore. The seat of the American government, BUT MORE PARTICULARLY BALTIMORE is to be the immediate object of attack. In the diplomatic circles it is also rumored that our naval and military commanders on the American station have no power to conclude any armistice or suspension of arms. They carry with them certain terms, which will be offered to the American government at the point of the bayonet. The terms of course, are not made public; but there is reason to believe that America will be left in a much worse situation, as a naval and commercial power, than she was at the commencement of the war."

H. Q. Hampstead-hill, Baltimore, 14th Sept. 1814—10 A. M.

SIR—I have the honor of informing you, that the enemy, after an unsuccessful attempt both by land and water, on this place, appear to be retiring.

We have a force hanging on their rear—I shall give you further particulars in the course of the day.

I have the honor to be, your obedient servant,

(Signed) S. SMITH, major general commanding.

P. S. The enemy's vessels in the Patapsco are all under way going down the river. I have good reason to believe that general Ross is mortally wounded.

Honorable James Monroe, acting secretary of war.

Head-quarters, Baltimore, 15th September, 1814.

SIR—I have been so incessantly occupied, that it has been impossible for me to convey to you the information respecting the enemy, which it would have been proper for you to have received from me. A detailed statement will be forwarded as soon as it can be made out; in the mean time, I have the pleasure to inform you that the enemy embarked their rear guard about 1 o'clock, and that their ships, a few excepted, are out of the river; their destination unknown.

I have the honor to be, your obedient servant,

Head-quarters, Baltimore, September 15th, 1814.

SIR—I have the honor to enclose to you, for your disposal, two letters from British officers; received by Dr. McCulloh (garrison surgeon,) whom I had sent to the battle ground to attend our wounded.

I have also the honor to send you enclosed a list of our wounded who were made prisoners, and of the agreement made by doctor McCulloh respecting them.

I have the honor to be, your most obedient servant. SAMUEL SMITH, maj. gen. com'g.

Colonel James Monroe, acting secretary of war.

In consequence of the humanity shewn the following American prisoners of war, I do promise upon honor that they shall not directly or indirectly serve against the British until regularly exchanged.

James H. McCulloh, Henry Brice, George Repert, Jacob Noyle, John Robinson, James N. Mariott, Charles Goddard, Walter Muskett, Bryan Allen, George Raintzell, Jacob Hubbard, Benjamin Fleetwood, Thomas Bregman, John Pidgeon, Luther A. Norris, David Davis, William Collings, John Lamb, James Davidson, William Keane, jun. James Gibson,

* Twenty-two of the wounded were paroled on the field—47 are on board the fleet (many of them gentlemen of the first respectability) and it is believed will be sent to Halifax, though all possible means to effect their release were used. By a flag they were all liberally supplied.

Richard K. Cook, Robert Smith, John Jephson, George Bennett, Conrad Euler.

And I do further engage to get the above twenty-six Americans exchanged as soon as possible for a like number of British left at Bladensburg.

JAMES H. McCULLOUGH, jun.

garrison surgeon, U. S. army.

Copy of a letter from major-general Smith to the secretary of war, dated Head-Quarters, Baltimore, September 19, 1814.

SIR—In compliance with the promise contained in my letter of the 15th instant, I have now the honor of stating, that the enemy landed between seven and eight thousand men on Monday, the 12th instant, at North Point, fourteen miles distant from this town. Anticipating this debarkation, general Stricker had been detached on Sunday evening with a portion of his brigade on the North Point road. Major Randal, of the Baltimore county militia, having under his command a light corps of riflemen and musquetry taken from general Stansbury's brigade and the Pennsylvania volunteers, was detached to the mouth of Bear creek, with orders to co-operate with general Stricker, and to check any landing which the enemy might attempt in that quarter. On Monday, brigadier-general Stricker took a position at the junction of the two roads leading from this place to North Point, having his right flanked by Bear creek, and his left by a marsh. He here awaited the approach of the enemy, having sent on an advanced corps under the command of major Heath of the 5th regiment. This advance was met by that of the enemy, and after some skirmishing it returned to the line, the main body of the enemy being at a short distance in rear of their advance. Between two and three o'clock, the enemy's whole force came up and commenced the battle by some discharges of rockets, which were succeeded by the cannon from both sides, and soon after the action became general along the line. General Stricker gallantly maintained his ground against a great superiority of numbers during the space of an hour and twenty minutes, when the regiment on his left (the 51st) giving way, he was under the necessity of retiring to the ground in his rear, where he had stationed one regiment as a reserve. He here formed his brigade; but the enemy not thinking it advisable to pursue, he, in compliance with previous arrangements, fell back and took post on the left of my entrenchments, and half a mile in advance of them. In this affair the citizen soldiers of Baltimore, with the exception of the 51st regiment, have maintained the reputation they so deservedly acquired at Bladensburg, and their brave and skilful leader has confirmed the confidence which we had all so justly placed in him. I take the liberty of referring you to his letter for the more particular mention of the individuals who, new to warfare, have shown the coolness and valor of veterans; and who, by their conduct on this occasion, have given their country and their city an assurance of what may be expected from them when their services are again required. I cannot dismiss the subject without expressing the heart-felt satisfaction I experience in thus bearing testimony to the courage and good conduct of my fellow townsmen. About the time general Stricker had taken the ground just mentioned, he was joined by brigadier-general Winder, who had been stationed on the west side of the city, but was now ordered to march with general Douglas's brigade of Virginia militia and the United States' dragoons under captain Bird, and take post on the left of general Stricker. During these movements, the brigades of generals Stansbury and Foreman, the seamen and marines under commodore Rodgers, the Pennsylvania volunteers under colonels

Cobean and Findley, the Baltimore artillery under colonel Harris, and the Marine artillery under capt. Stiles, manned the trenches and the batteries—all prepared to receive the enemy. We remained in this situation during the night.

On Tuesday the enemy appeared in front of my entrenchments at the distance of two miles, on the Philadelphia road, from whence he had a full view of our position. He manoeuvred during the morning towards our left, as if with the intention of making a circuitous march and coming down on the Harford or York roads. Generals Winder and Stricker were ordered to adapt their movements to those of the enemy so as to baffle this supposed intention. They executed this order with great skill and judgment by taking an advantageous position, stretching from my left across the country, when the enemy was likely to approach the quarter he seemed to threaten. This movement induced the enemy to concentrate his forces (between one and two o'clock) in my front, pushing his advance to within a mile of us, driving in our vedettes and shewing an intention of attacking us that evening. I immediately drew generals Winder and Stricker nearer to the left of my entrenchments and to the right of the enemy, with the intention of their falling on his right or rear should he attack me; or, if he declined it, of attacking him in the morning. To this movement and to the strength of my defences, which the enemy had the fairest opportunity of observing, I am induced to attribute his retreat, which was commenced at half past one o'clock on Wednesday morning. In this he was so favored by the extreme darkness and a continued rain, that we did not discover it until day-light. I consented to general Winder's pursuing with the Virginia brigade and the United States' dragoons; at the same time major Randal was dispatched with his light corps in pursuit on the enemy's right, whilst the whole of the militia cavalry was put in motion for the same object. All the troops were, however, so worn out with continued watching, and with being under arms during three days and nights, exposed the greater part of the time to very inclement weather, that it was found impracticable to do any thing more than pick up a few stragglers. The enemy commenced his embarkation that evening, and completed it the next day at one o'clock. It would have been impossible, even had our troops been in a condition to act offensively, to have cut off any part of the enemy's rear guard during the embarkation, as the point where it was effected was defended from our approach by a line of defences extending from Back river to Humphrey's creek on the Patapsco, thrown up by ourselves previous to their arrival.

I have now the pleasure of calling your attention to the brave commander of Fort M'Henry, Major Armistead, and to the operations confided to that quarter. The enemy made his approach by water at the same time that his army was advancing on the land, and commenced a discharge of bombs and rockets at the fort as soon as he got within range of it. The situation of major Armistead was peculiarly trying—The enemy having taken his position at such a distance as to render offensive operations on the part of the fort entirely fruitless, whilst their bombs and rockets were every moment falling in and about it—the officers and men being at the same time entirely exposed. The vessels, however, had the temerity to approach somewhat nearer—they were as soon compelled to withdraw. During the night, whilst the enemy on land was retreating, and whilst the bombardment was most severe, two or three rocket vessels and barges succeeded in getting up the Ferry Branch; but they were soon compelled to retire, by the forts in that quarter, commanded by lieut. Newcomb, of the navy and lieut. Webster of the flotilla. These forts also destroyed one of the barges, with all on board.—The barges and battery at the lazaretto, under the command of lieut. Rutter, of the flotilla, kept up a brisk, and it is believed, a successful fire during the hottest period of the bombardment. Maj. Arnstead being seriously ill in consequence of his continued exposure to the weather, has rendered it impossible for him to send in his report. It is not, therefore in my power to do justice to those gallant individuals, who partook with him the danger of a tremendous bombardment, without the ability of retorting, and without that security, which in more regular fortifications is provided for such occasions. The only loss sustained in the fort, is, I understand, about 27 killed and wounded—amongst the former I have to lament the fall of lieuts. Claggett and Clemm, who were both estimable citizens and useful officers.

From general Stricker's brigade, the return of the killed and wounded has not yet come in. It is supposed, however, to amount to about 150—among the former, this city has to regret the loss of its representative in the state legislature, James Lowry Donaldson, esq. adjutant of the 27th regt. This gentleman will ever be remembered by his constituents for his zeal and talents, and by his corps for his bravery and military knowledge.

I cannot conclude this report without informing you of the great aid I have derived from commodore Rodgers. He was ever present and ever ready to afford his useful council, and to render his important services. His presence, with that of his gallant officers and seamen, gave confidence to every one.

The enemy's loss in his attempt on Baltimore, amounts, as near as we can ascertain it, to between six or seven hundred killed, wounded and missing—Gen Ross was certainly killed.

I have the honor to be, with great respect, sir, your obedient servant,

S. SMITH,

Maj. gen. commanding.

Colonel JAMES MONROE,
Acting secretary of war.

Copy of a letter from brigadier general Stricker, dated Headquarters 3d Brigade—Baltimore, Sept. 15, 1814.

MAJ. GEN. S. SMITH,

SIR—I have the honor to report to you, that, in obedience to your orders, I marched from Baltimore on Sunday the 11th inst. with part of my brigade, as the advance corps of the army under your command. My force consisted of 550 of the 5th regiment under lieut. col. Sterett; 620 of the 6th, under lieut. col. McDonald; 500 of the 27th, under lieut. col. Long; 450 of the 39th, under lieut. col. Fowler; 700 of the 51st under lieut. col. Amey; 150 riflemen under capt. Dyer; 140 cavalry under lieut. col. Biays; and the Union Artillery of 75 men, with six four-pounders, under capt. Montgomery, making an aggregate of 3185 effective men. I moved towards North Point by the main road, and at 8 o'clock P. M. reached the meeting-house near the head of Bear creek, seven miles from this city. Here the brigade halted, with the exception of the cavalry, who were pushed forward to Gorsuch's farm three miles in advance, and the riflemen who took post near the blacksmith's shop two miles in advance of our encampment. At seven o'clock on the morning of the 12th, I received information from the advanced videttes that the enemy were debarking troops from and under cover of their gun vessels which lay off the bluff of North Point within the mouth of Patapsco river. I immediately ordered back my baggage under a strong guard, moved forward the 5th and 27th regiments, and my artillery to the head of Long-log-lane (so called) resting the 5th with its right on the head of a branch of Bear creek, and its left on the main North Point road, while the 27th was posted on the other side of the road in line with the 5th, its left extending towards a branch of Back river. The artillery I posted directly at the head of the lane in the interval between the 5th and 27th. The 39th occupied a ground 300 yards in the rear of the 27th, and the 51st the same distance in rear of the 5th, extending each parallel to the front line. The 6th regiment was thrown back to a position a short distance this side of Cook's tavern, and half a mile in the rear of the second line. My orders were, that the 5th and 27th should receive the enemy, and, if necessary, fall back through the 51st and 39th, and form on the right of the 6th or reserve regiment. The riflemen were ordered to the skirts of a thick low pine wood beyond the blacksmith's shop, with a large sedgefield in front, that as the cavalry were still in advance who would inform of the enemy's approach, they might take advantage of the covering of the wood and annoy his advance. I soon learned that the enemy's advance party was moving rapidly up the main road, and as the cavalry continually announced their progress, I flattered myself with the hope that the riflemen would soon proclaim by a galling fire their still nearer approach. Imagine my chagrin when I perceived the whole rifle corps falling back upon my main position, having too credulously listened to groundless information that the enemy were landing on Back river to cut them off. My hopes of early annoyance to the enemy being thus frustrated, I threw the riflemen on the right flank of my front line, thereby, with the addition of a few cavalry, very well securing that flank. My videttes soon brought information that the enemy in small force was enjoying himself at Gorsuch's farm. Insulted at the idea of a small marauding party thus daringly provoking chastisement, several of my officers volunteered their corps to dislodge it. Captains Levering's and Howard's companies from the 5th, about 150 in number, under major Heath of that regiment; capt. Aisquith's and a few other riflemen, in all about 70; one 4 pounder with 10 men under lieut. Stiles, and the cavalry, were immediately pushed forward to punish the insolence of the enemy's advance; or, if his main body appeared, to give evidence of my wish for a general engagement. The latter purpose was soon answered; this small volunteer corps had proceeded scarcely half a mile before the main body of the enemy shewed itself, which was immediately attacked. The infantry and riflemen maintained a fire of some minutes, and retired with some loss in killed and wounded; the cavalry and artillery owing to the disadvantageous grounds not being able to support them.—In this skirmish, major Heath's horse was killed under him. At half-past 2 o'clock, the enemy commenced throwing rockets across my left flank, which seemed harmless, and had no other effect than to prepare my line for the sound of the artillery, which soon commenced by us on the enemy's right column then pushing across towards my left, and returned by their six-pounders and a howitzer upon my left and centre. The cannonading was brisk for some minutes, when I ordered my fire to cease until the enemy should get within close range of cannonier.—Seeing that my left flank was the main object of the enemy, I brought up the 39th into line on the left of the 27th, and detached two pieces of artillery to the left of the 39th: still more securely to protect my left flank, colonel Amey of the 51st was ordered to form his regiment at right angles with my line, resting his right near the left of the 39th regiment.

This order being badly executed created for a moment some confusion in that quarter, but was soon rectified by the efforts of my aid-de-camp and brigade majors, who corrected the error of colonel Amey and posted the 51st in its ordered position. The enemy's right column displayed and advanced upon the 39th and 27th. The 51st, unmindful of my object to use its fire in protection of my left flank in case an attempt should be made to turn it, totally forgetful of the honor of the brigade, and regardless of its own reputation, delivered one random fire and retreated precipitately, and in such confusion, as to render every effort of mine to rally them ineffective. Some disorder was occasioned in the second battalion of the 39th, by the flight of the 51st, and a few gave way. The fire now became general from left to right; my artillery in the centre poured forth an incessant volley of cannister upon the enemy's left column, who were endeavoring to gain the cover of a small log-house, about 50 yards in front of the 5th; which, however, precaution had been taken to fire, so soon as captain Sadtler's Yagers from the 5th (who were originally posted therein) should be compelled to leave it. The enemy's line advanced about 10 minutes before 3 o'clock, with a severe fire which was well returned by the artillery, the whole 27th, the 5th except the three companies of captains Levering, Howard and Sadtler, which were too much exhausted by the advanced skirmish of the two former—and the ordered retreat of the latter to resume their positions in line;—and from the first battalion of the 39th, who maintained its ground in despite of the disgraceful example set by the intended support on the left. The fire was incessant till about 15 minutes before 4 o'clock, when, finding that my line now 1400 strong, was insufficient to withstand the superior numbers of the enemy, and my left flank being exposed by the desertion of the 51st, I was constrained to order a movement back to the reserve regiment, under colonel McDonald, which was well posted to receive the retired line which mostly rallied well. On forming with the 6th, the fatigued state of the regiments and corps which had retired, and the probability that my right flank might be turned by a quick movement of the enemy in that direction, induced me, after proper deliberation, to fall back to Worthington's mill; which I was the more persuaded to, by my desire to have the 6th regiment (whose officers and men were eager to share the dangers of their brother soldiers) perfect and in good order to receive the enemy on his nearer approach to the city. All retired as I could wish, and were ready to act as circumstances might require. In this situation you found the brigade on the morning of the 13th, somewhat fatigued, but with increased confidence in ourselves, and renewing our preparation for the annoyance of the enemy alone, if deemed proper, or in conjunction with any other force.

I have thought it due to the merits of my brigade, to detail thus fully their whole movement, and I feel a pride in the belief that the stand made on Monday in no small degree, tended to check the temerity of a foe, daring to invade a country like ours, and designing the destruction of our city, in whose defence some of the best blood of the country has already been spilt, and for whose safety and protection the citizen-soldiers of the 3d brigade are ready to suffer every privation, and meet every danger. Should report be true, (and I doubt not the fact) that the enemy's commanding officer, major-general Ross was killed in this action, and that the enemy suffered in proportion to his superior numbers, I shall feel still more the valuable consequences of our fight.

The conduct of many company officers and privates, was such as I calculated on; that of most of my field officers also merits my particular notice.—Major Richard K. Heath of the 5th, who led on the advance party to bring on the action, behaved as became an officer; the facts of his first horse being killed under him in the first skirmish, his second being badly wounded, and himself receiving a contusion on the head, by a musket ball, in the general action, are ample proofs of his bravery and exposure in discharge of his duty. Lieut. col. Sterett, and major Barry of the 5th, gained my highest approbation, and they unite with all in praise of captain Spangler and his company of volunteers, from York, Pa. then attached to their command; also of adjutant Cheston, who is slightly wounded, Lieut. col. Long of the 27th, and his field and company officers, did well; this whole regiment were unsurpassed in bravery, resolution and enthusiasm. My brigade has to bewail the loss of adjutant James Lowry Donaldson, who fell in the hottest of the fight, bravely discharging the duties of his commission, Lieut. col. Fowler, and major Steiger of the 39th did their duty in every respect; they speak highly of the volunteer companies of capt. Quantril, from Hagerstown, and capt. Metzgar from Hanover, Pa. Capt. Quantril is wounded. Captain John Montgomery, commanding my artillery, gained for himself and his company lasting honor. Captain Aisquith, and his company of riflemen, merit my thanks. Ensign Wilmot, commanding the company of United Volunteers of the 5th, and many of his men, distinguished themselves. To brigade majors Calhoun and Frailey, I am under great obligations for the prompt, and zealous performance of their duty.—To my aid-de-camp, major George P. Stevenson, too much praise cannot be given, his industry in every arrangement before the fight, and in animating the whole line, was conspicuous; his zeal and courage are of the most ardent kind, the sprightliness of his manners in the most trying scenes had the happiest effect upon all to whom he had to communicate my orders; and the precision with which he delivered my commands, could be exceeded only by the coolness with which he always saw them executed. He was animated, brave, and useful. Major William B. Barney, and adjutant Lemuel Taylor, of the cavalry, who, having no opportunity of distinction in their regiment owing to the grounds, did me great service, the former in aiding capt. Montgomery, the latter in conveying my orders through the whole. Mr. Robert Goodloe Harper deserves my thanks. He visited me just before the action; accompanied the advanced party, and aided me much throughout. The brave soldiers under my command have suffered many privations, and I recognise among our killed and wounded many valuable men; of which I will make a report in a few days.

I have the honor to be, your obedient servant,
JOHN STRICKER,

Brig. Gen. Com. 3d brigade, M. A.
GENERAL ORDERS.

H. Q. Baltimore, September 19, 1814.

The enemy having been compelled to retire from before this city, the major general commanding takes pleasure in congratulating the troops under his command, upon a relaxation of those severe duties to which they were for some days necessarily exposed. The readiness with which they submitted to privations of every kind, was as gratifying to him as the alacrity with which they flew to arms for the protection of the city. He feels a particular pleasure in imparting to every officer and soldier his warm acknowledgements for the zeal they displayed in marching to meet the enemy, whose object by his own declaration is known to be devastation and ruin to every assailable point on the seaboard. It is with peculiar satisfaction the commanding general seizes this opportunity of acknowledging the very great assistance he has received from the counsel and active exertions of commander Rodgers. His exertions and those of his brave officers and seamen, have contributed in a very eminent degree to the safety of the city, and should be remembered with lively emotions of gratitude by every citizen.

The successful defence of Fort M'Henry by major Armistead of the United States army having under his command (besides his own corps) three companies of colonel Harris's regiment of artillery commanded by captains Berry and Nicholson and lieutenant Pennington and a part of the 36th and 38th regiments of United States infantry commanded by lieutenant colonel Stuart, is beyond all praise. Their gallantry and intrepidity enabled them to defend the fort against every effort of the enemy, and there is no doubt, that this intrepid officer will be rewarded by the government. The voluntary services of major Lane of the 14th regiment of United States infantry were highly useful and duly appreciated by major Armistead. Lieutenant Newcomb of the navy, who commanded Fort Covington and lieutenant Webster of the flotilla, the city battery, performed their respective duties to the entire satisfaction of the commanding general.

To brigadier general Winder he tenders his thanks for his aid, co-operation and prompt pursuit of the enemy. To brigadier general Douglass with his brigade, and to colonel Taylor with his regiment of Virginia militia called into service for the defence of Washington, the commanding general also makes a tender of his acknowledgments. They have sustained privations with patience, and submitted to a soldier's life with a temper that does them credit. To the officers much praise is due for the discipline they have introduced, for their attention to their men, and prompt obedience to orders.

To brigadier general Striker and the 3d brigade of Maryland militia, every praise is due; the city being threatened, it became the duty of the citizens to be foremost in its defence. He claimed the honor, and the brave officers and men under his command hailed with delight the opportunity of meeting the enemy's first attack: he met the enemy and engaged him, and when compelled by superior numbers to retreat, he effected it in order, and rallied on his reserve, and from thence retired to the ground which had been assigned him near the lines. The particulars of the action and the just praise due to each officer, are given by the brigadier general in his report. He reports the 27th regiment under colonel Long, as having in a particular manner distinguished itself—he gives due praise to the 5th, under colonel Sterrett, and 39th under colonel Fowler. He reports that his reserve under colonel McDonald merited his approbation, and that the artillery under captain Montgomery highly distinguished itself. He applauds in terms which are flattering, the conduct of major Pinckney's battalion of riflemen, the command of which on this occasion having devolved on captain Dyer. He mentions in honorable terms the bravery and good conduct of major Heath of the 5th, who had two horses shot under him, and of captains Spangler and Metzgar commanding companies from Pennsylvania, and of captain Quantrell with a company from Hagerstown.

The Pennsylvania volunteers without commissions, repaired to the post of danger, chose officers and organized themselves into regiments, performed all the duties of soldiers and have recommended themselves in a particular manner to the attention of the commanding general. Much praise is also due to generals Stansbury and Forman. Their men came out principally en masse, and when assembled were to be organized, armed, equipped and disciplined. All this has been effected through their indefatigable exertions. To these gentlemen the commanding general tenders his sincere thanks. The enthusiasm shown by their men on the approach of the enemy, gave a full assurance that reliance might be placed on them.

The light corps under major Randall performed in a manner highly honorable the services assigned it, and the major's conduct evinced a firmness, bravery and talent for a military life.

The excellent discipline and order of the artillery under colonel Harris, and marine artillery under captain Stiles, affords a certainty of their good conduct. The regularity which prevails in those corps does them honor and affords an excellent example to others. Fatiguing as were the duties imposed on the United States cavalry under captain Bird, and the militia cavalry under lieutenant colonels Moore, Blays, Street and Tilghman, and captain Lee, they were performed with an alacrity and promptness highly honorable to the officers and men. To captain Thompson of the flying artillery and his company, the commanding general tenders his thanks for their unremitting personal attention as his guard, their readiness in carrying orders and the various separate duties assigned them, and to major Barney and captain Thompson with their corps of observation for the correct information received from them.

The guns at the Lazaretto were well served by lieutenant Rutter of the flotilla, whose conduct in the discharge of that, as well as the highly important duty of advanced night guards to the fort, has met the entire approbation of the commanding general. To the committee of vigilance and safety he feels himself under particular obligations to acknowledge the many advantages he derived from their exertions in providing the means necessary for defence.

Such was the determined zeal evinced on the part of every brigade and corps under his command, that the commanding general is impressed with a full conviction, that had the enemy made his attack it would have terminated in his discomfiture and defeat.

By order of major general S. Smith,

WM. BATES, assist. adj. gen. D. M. M.
DIVISION ORDERS.

Division Head-quarters, New-church street.

September 15th, 1864.

Brigadier general Winder congratulates the troops of his command upon the suspension of the severe duty to which they have been exposed for the last four days.

The garrison of fort M'Henry under the command of major Armistead, are entitled to, and receive, the warmest acknowledgments and praise from the brigadier general for their steady firm and intrepid deportment during an almost incessant bombardment for twenty-four hours, during which time they were exposed to an incessant shower of shells.

The militia artillery of the 3d brigade under captains Nicholson and Berry, and lieutenant Pennington vied with the regulars in a firmness and composure which would have honored veterans, and prove that they were worthy to co-operate with the regular artillery, infantry and sea fencibles in defence of that important post. Major Armistead receives also the warmest acknowledgments of the brigadier general commanding, for his able, vigilant and exact arrangements before and during this period of arduous duty, as well as for the uniform zeal, vigor and ability he has discovered in his preparations for the defence of the post immediately committed to his charge, as for the prompt and efficacious manner in which he has complied under great and perplexing difficulties with demands from all quarters for ammunition.

Lieutenant colonel Stewart and major Lane, neither of whom were required to expose themselves in this dangerous post, will please accept the brigadier general's warmest acknowledgments for the handsome and gallant manner in which they volunteered to take command of the regular infantry; who with their officers and men, have evinced the most resolute and steady intrepidity in the midst of imminent and long continued danger.

The squadron of United States Light Dragoons under captain Bird, have proved by the indefatigable and bold manner in which they have constantly kept upon the very lines of the enemy under the fire of his guards and the regular and exact intelligence which they have constantly given of his situation, that they want nothing but an opportunity to signalize themselves. The bold and intrepid charge which sergeant Keller, of captain Bird's company, made upon the rear guard of the retreating enemy with but three dragoons in which he dispersed a guard of 18 fusiliers, taking 6 of them prisoners in despite of their fire and that of a four pounder within half cannon distance which made three discharges at him deserves the highest approbation, and the skill and dexterity with which he accomplished this bold achievement proves he will be competent to a more considerable command to which the justice of his government will no doubt advance him.

Brigadier general Douglass with his entire brigade of Virginia militia have evinced during four days of the most active and arduous duties, under the severest privations of rest and refreshment, in constant exposure to the unusual inclemency of the weather for the season, a patience, obedience, and alacrity for the most dangerous duties which cannot be surpassed; and the prompt and eager pursuit in which they yesterday engaged, after the retreating enemy, in the midst of heavy and constant rain after such a series of suffering and fatigue, is the best evidence which can be given that the patriotism which so promptly led them to the field in defence of their country, was bottomed upon a courage which dangers and difficulty cannot subdue.

Lieutenant colonel Griffin Taylor with his regiment also of Virginia militia who was left in charge of the defences in part on the Ferry-branch, has proved by his judicious arrangements and the zealous manner in which he was supported by his men and officers, that he only wanted an occasion to prove himself and them the worthy coadjutors of their countrymen.

The enemy has retired from our city and it is to be hoped under such circumstances as will deter him from again attempting it. Those gallant Virginians will have the consolation of believing they have essentially contributed to its safety.

The enemy however has at present only taken refuge in his ships—he still remains in our vicinity and may and probably will return if he knows there is the least relaxation of vigilance or readiness. The commanding officers of corps and detachments will therefore exert themselves with unremitting diligence to repair the damages of the late fatigue and exposure—to refresh their troops and hold them in readiness for moving at a moment's warning.

By order.

ROBT. G. HITE,
assistant adjutant general.

The President's Message.

The following message was on Tuesday last transmitted from the president of the United States, by Mr. Edward Coles his secretary, to both houses of congress:

Fellow-citizens of the Senate and of the House of Representatives.

Notwithstanding the early day which had been fixed for your session of the present year, I was induced to call you together still sooner, as well that any inadequacy in the existing provisions for the wants of the treasury might be supplied, as that no delay might happen in providing for the result of the negotiations on foot with Great Britain, whether it should require arrangements adapted to a return of peace, or further and more effective provisions for prosecuting the war.

That result is not yet known. If, on one hand, the repeal of the orders in council, and the general pacification in Europe, which withdrew the occasion on which impressments from American vessels were practised, suggest expectations that peace and amity may be re-established; we are compelled, on the other hand, by the refusal of the British government to accept the offered mediation of the emperor of Russia; by the delays in giving effect to its own proposal of a direct negotiation; and above all, by the principles and manner in which the war is now avowedly carried on, to infer that a spirit of hostility is indulged more violent than ever, against the rights and prosperity of this country.

This increased violence is best explained by the two important circumstances, that the great contest in Europe, for an equilibrium guaranteeing all its states against the ambition of any, has been closed without any check on the overbearing power of Great Britain on the ocean; and that it has left in her hands disposable armaments, with which, forgetting the difficulties of a remote war against a free people; and yielding to the intoxication of success, with the example of a great victim to it before her eyes, she cherishes hopes of still further aggrandizing a power already formidable in its abuses to the tranquility of the civilized and commercial world.

But, whatever may have inspired the enemy with these more violent purposes, the public councils of a nation, more able to maintain than it was to acquire its independence, and with a devotion to it, rendered more ardent by the experience of its blessings, can never deliberate but on the means most effectual for defeating the extravagant views or unwarrantable passions, with which alone the war can now be pursued against us.

In the events of the present campaign, the enemy, with all his augmented means, and wanton use of them, has little ground for exultation, unless he can feel it in the success of his recent enterprizes against this Metropolis, and the neighboring town of Alexandria; from both of which his retreats were as precipitate, as his attempts were bold and fortunate. In his other incursions on our Atlantic frontier, his progress, often checked and chastised by the martial spirit of the neighboring citizens, has had more effect in distressing individuals, and in dishonoring his arms, than in promoting any object of legitimate warfare. And in the two instances mentioned, however deeply to be regretted on our part, he will find in his transient success, which interrupted for a moment only the ordinary public business at the seat of government, no compensation for the loss of character with the world, by his violations of private property, and by his destruction of public edifices, protected, as monuments of the arts, by the laws of civilized warfare.

On our side we can appeal to a series of achievements, which have given new lustre to the American arms. Besides the brilliant incidents in the minor operations of the campaign, the splendid victories gained on the Canadian side of the Niagara, by the American forces under major-general Brown, and brigadiers Scott and Gaines, have gained for these heroes and their emulating companions, the most unfading laurels; and having triumphantly tested the progressive discipline of the American soldiery, have taught the enemy that the longer he protracts his hostile efforts, the more certain and decisive will be his final discomfiture.

On our southern border victory has continued also to follow the American standard. The bold and skilful operations of major-general Jackson, conducting troops drawn from the militia of the states least distant, particularly of Tennessee, have subdued the principal tribes of hostile savages, and, by establishing a peace with them, preceded by recent and exemplary chastisement, has best guarded against the mischief of their co-operation with the British enterprises which may be planned against that quarter of our country. Important tribes of Indians on our north-western frontier, have also acceded to stipulations which bind them to the interests of the United States, and to consider our enemy as theirs also.

In the recent attempt of the enemy on the city of Baltimore, defended by militia and volunteers, aided by a small body of regulars and seamen, he was received with a spirit which produced a rapid retreat to his ships; whilst a concurrent attack by a large fleet was successfully resisted by the steady and well directed fire of the fort and batteries opposed to it.

In another recent attack by a powerful force on our troops at Plattsburg, of which regulars made a part only; the enemy, after a perseverance for many hours, was finally compelled to seek safety in a hasty retreat, with our gallant bands pressing upon him.

On the Lakes, so much contested throughout the war, the great exertions for the command made on our part have been well repaid. On lake Ontario, our squadron is now, and has been for some time, in a condition to confine that of the enemy to his own port, and favor the operations of our land forces on that frontier.

A part of the squadron on lake Erie has been extended into lake Huron, and has produced the advantage of displaying our command of that lake also. One object of the expedition was the reduction of Mackinaw, which failed with the loss of a few brave men, among whom was an officer justly distinguished for his gallant exploits. The expedition, ably conducted both by the land and the naval commanders, was otherwise highly valuable in its effects.

On lake Champlain, where superiority had for some time been indisputed, the British squadron lately came into action, with the American, commanded by capt. Macdonough. It issued in the capture of the whole of the enemy's ships. The best praise for this officer and his intrepid comrades, is in the likeness of his triumph to the illustrious victory, which immortalized another officer, and established, at a critical moment, our command of another lake.

On the ocean, the pride of our naval arms has been amply supported. A second frigate has indeed fallen into the hands of the enemy, but the loss is hidden in the blaze of heroism with which she was defended. Captain Porter, who commanded her, and whose previous career had been distinguished by daring enterprise and fertility of genius, maintained a sanguinary contest against two ships, one of them superior to his own, and under other severe disadvantages, till humanity tore down the colors which valor had nailed to the mast. This officer and his brave comrades have added much to the rising glory of the American flag, and have merited all the effusions of gratitude which their country is ever ready to bestow on the champions of its rights and of its safety.

Two smaller vessels of war have also become prizes to the enemy, but by a superiority of force, which sufficiently vindicates the reputation of their commanders; whilst two others, one commanded by captain Warrington, the other by captain Blakeley, have captured British ships of the same class, with a gallantry and good conduct, which entitle them, and their companions, to a just share in the praise of their country.

In spite of the naval force of the enemy accumulated on our coasts, our private cruisers also have not ceased to annoy his commerce, and to bring their rich prizes into our ports; contributing thus, with other proofs, to demonstrate the incompetency and illegality of a blockade, the proclamation of which is made the pretext for vexing and discouraging the commerce of neutral powers with the United States.

To meet the extended and diversified warfare adopted by the enemy, great bodies of militia have been taken into service for the public defence, and great expenses incurred. That the defence every where may be both more convenient and more economical, Congress will see the necessity of immediate measures for filling the ranks of the regular army, and of enlarging the provision for special corps, mounted and unmounted, to be engaged for longer periods of service than are due from the militia. Earnestly renew, at the same time, a recommendation of such changes in the system of the militia, as by classing, and disciplining for the most prompt and active service the portions most capable of it, will give to that great resource for the public safety, all the requisite energy and efficiency.

The monies received into the Treasury during the nine months ending on the 30th day of June last, amounted to 32 millions of dollars; of which near 11 millions were the proceeds of the public revenue, and the remainder derived from loans. The disbursements for public expenditures during the same period exceeded 34 millions of dollars, and left in the Treasury on the 1st day of July, near 5 millions of dollars. The demands during the remainder of the present year, already authorized by Congress, and the expences incident to an extension of the operations of the war, will render it necessary that large sums should be provided to meet them.

From this view of the national affairs, congress will be urged to take up, without delay, as well the subject of pecuniary supplies as that of military force, and on a scale commensurate with the extent and the character which the war has assumed. It is not to be disguised, that the situation of our country calls for its greatest efforts. Our enemy is powerful in men and money; on the land and on the water.—Availing himself of fortuitous advantages, he is aiming, with his undivided force, a deadly blow at our growing prosperity, perhaps at our national existence. He has avowed his purpose of trampling on the usages of civilized warfare, and given earnest of it, in the plunder and wanton destruction of private property. In his pride of maritime dominion and in his thirst of commercial monopoly, he strikes with peculiar animosity at the progress of our navigation and of our manufactures. His barbarous policy has not even spared those monuments of the arts and models of taste, with which our country had enriched and embellished its infant metropolis. From such an adversary, hostility in its greatest force and in its worst forms, may be looked for. The American people will face it with the undaunted spirit, which in our revolutionary struggle defeated his unrighteous projects. His threats and his barbarities, instead of dismay, will kindle in every bosom an indignation not to be extinguished but in the disaster and expulsion of such cruel invaders. In providing the means necessary, the national legislature will not distrust the heroic and enlightened patriotism of its constituents. They will cheerfully and proudly bear every burden of every kind, which the safety and honor of the nation demand. We have seen them every where paying their taxes, direct and indirect, with the greatest promptness and alacrity. We see them rushing with enthusiasm to the scenes where danger and duty call. In offering their blood, they give the surest pledge that no other tribute will be withheld.

Having forborne to declare war until to other aggressions had been added the capture of nearly a thousand American vessels, and the impressment of thousands of American sea-faring citizens, and until a final declaration had been made by the government of Great Britain, that her hostile orders against our commerce would not be revoked, but on conditions as impossible as unjust; whilst it was known that these orders would not otherwise cease, but with a war which had lasted nearly twenty years, and which, according to appearances at that time, might last as many more; having manifested on every occasion, and in every proper mode, a sincere desire to arrest the effusion of blood, and meet our enemy on the ground of justice and reconciliation, our beloved country, in still opposing to his persevering hostility all its energies, with an undiminished disposition towards peace and friendship on honorable terms, must carry with it the good wishes of the impartial world, and the best hopes of support from an Omnipotent and kind Providence.

JAMES MADISON.

Washington, Sept. 20th, 1814.

Copy of a letter from Com. McDonough to the Secretary of the Navy, dated U. States' ship Saratoga, off Plattsburg, Sept. 11.

SIR—The Almighty has been pleased to grant us a signal victory on Lake Champlain, in the capture of one frigate, one brig, and two sloops of war of the enemy.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, sir, your obedient servant,

T. MACDONOUGH, Com.

Hon. W. JONES, secretary of the Navy.

Copy of a letter from Gen. Macomb (just received) to the Secretary of War, dated Fort Moreau, September 12, 1814.

SIR—I have the honor to inform you that the British army, consisting of four brigades, a corps of artillery, a squadron of horse and a strong light corps, amounting in all to about fourteen thousand men, after investing this place on the north of the Saranac river since the 5th inst. broke up their camp and raised the siege this morning at 2 o'clock.

They are now retreating precipitately, leaving their sick and wounded behind.

The enemy opened his batteries yesterday morning, and continued the cannonading, bombarding and rocket firing until sunset; by this time, our batteries had completely silenced those of our opponents.

The light troops and militia are now in full pursuit of the enemy, making prisoners in all directions. Deserters are continually coming in, so that the loss of the British army in this enterprize will be considerable.

A more detailed report will be made of the siege, and circumstances attending it; as early as possible.

The officers and men have all done their duty.—The artillery and the engineers have performed their functions with a zeal and precision highly creditable to themselves and honorable to their country.

Our loss is trifling indeed, having only one officer and fifteen men killed; and one officer and thirty men wounded.

The militia of New York and the volunteers of Vermont, have been exceedingly serviceable, and have evinced a degree of patriotism and bravery worthy of themselves and the states to which they respectively belong.

The strength of the garrison is only fifteen hundred effective men rank and file.

I have the honor to be, with perfect respect, sir, your most obedient servant,

ALEX'R MACOMB.

The hon. the Secretary of War.

MISCELLANEOUS

A great mass of important matter with a notice of many interesting incidents, are excluded by the glorious details presented. In respect to Baltimore we have given a very copious account, and also what of the first importance of the affairs on Champlain and at Plattsburg which have reached us. If we have good luck another number of the REGISTER will be published by the middle of next week.

Never since I printed a paper, did I so heartily wish for a little more room, as at present!—But all human things are limited. Therefore, though unwilling, some details of Macdonough's & Macomb's victories, both in type, must lay over. Also an account of the enemy's expedition to the Penobscot, where they did great damage, and by paper claim, have conquered the whole country east of that river!!!

In the battle on Champlain the enemy had 93 guns—we 86—they 1750 men—we 820—they killed and wounded 194—we 116. We took one frigate, one brig, and two sloops. Some of the gun boats were sunk, and some made their escape.

PEACE RUMOR. A Burlington (Vt.) paper of the 16th has the following: On the evening of the night in which the British commenced their retreat [from Plattsburg] a British major sent for a son of general Moore's, who remained to protect his father's house near the British camp, and informed him that sir George Prevost had received intelligence by mail, on that day at noon, by way of Halifax, that preliminaries of peace between Great Britain and America, were signed in Europe. Whether this account was forged for the purpose of excusing their retreat, or to damp the war spirit of our militia, or whether confidence is to be placed in it, the public must judge.

ASSOCIATION.—A prize vessel has arrived at New Bedford from Halifax, which brings a report that a vessel had arrived at that place with sealed despatches from the prince regent to the American government, and that she sailed the next day for the Chesapeake.

Large bodies of the New-York militia, have joined general Brown at fort Erie. Others were pushing on. Izard has arrived at Sacketts Harbor, and an expedition seems about to take place. Great events may be expected. Drummond, we trust, is the object. Brown is in fine health and spirits.

CONGRESS met on Monday. The usual incipient proceedings have been had, and shall be noticed hereafter.

COMMODORE BARNEY has been exchanged. He is so far recovered that he resumed his command on Tuesday last, and was received with repeated acclamations by his brave fellows of the flotilla.

Copy of a letter from Captain Porter to the Secretary of the Navy, dated Washington, September 7, 1814.

SIR—Agreeable to your orders of the 31st ult. I proceeded with the detachment of sailors and marines under my command to the White House, on the west bank of the Potomac, there to erect batteries and attempt the destruction of the enemy's ships on their passage down the river. Captain Creighton, lieut. Clack, and several other navy officers, as well as Mr. Augustus Monroe, Mr. Ferdinand Fairfax, and several other citizens and officers of the militia and volunteer companies, hearing of my destination, volunteered their services on the occasion, and ably supported me through the arduous and fatiguing enterprise. By preceding my men, I arrived, in company with the honorable Secretary of State, and Generals Hungerford and Young, on the evening of the 1st inst. at the spot fixed on, where I found a few militia belonging to General Hungerford's army, clearing away the trees to make room for mounting our cannon, which had not yet arrived, but which had been seen on their way down, consisting of three long 18's and two 12's. Generals Hungerford and Young had received orders to co-operate with me, to detach men on my requisition, and make such disposition of their forces as would effectually protect me in the rear, in the event of the enemy's landing; the positions they were to occupy were also allotted to them by mutual agreement, when the enemy should attempt to pass, as it was believed that, concealed by the thick woods on the high bank, they would be enabled to clear the enemy's decks with their musquetry, and in a great measure divert his fire from our battery. At the moment of my arrival one of the enemy's vessels of war, a brig of 18 guns, was seen coming up. General Hungerford and his men took their position in the woods; and two small four pounders that instant arriving, I caused them to be planted on the edge of the bank, and on the enemy arriving abreast of us we opened a brisk fire on him; having a fine breeze he was enabled to pass us, but could fire only one broadside as he crossed the fire of our field pieces and musquetry; the militia continued following him up along the bank and greatly annoyed him by their well directed fire. In this affair we had only one man wounded, and we believed our elevated position rendered breast works useless, as it was remarked that none but the enemy's grape passed over us, his round shot went into the bank below. No men could have shown more zeal on the occasion than those composing the army, and if they committed any errors which gave rise to confusion, they proceeded from an over desire to injure the enemy. Of the conduct of the sailors and marines, I deem it unnecessary to say anything;—their conduct on all such occasions has ever been uniform. The evening of our arrival two 18-pounders reached our position, and next morning one of the enemy's bomb ships and two barges, one carrying a long two and thirty, the other a mortar, commenced their operations upon us, the first throwing shells in front, beyond the reach of our shot; the other flanking us on our right; several shells fell near and burst over our battery, and although the firing lasted all day, without intermission, it had no other effect than to accustom the militia to the danger. In the afternoon I took an 18-pounder to a more advanced point, about a mile distant, and commenced a fire on the bomb ship, which did so much execution as to draw on me the fire of all their vessels, including a schooner and an eighteen gun brig which had dropped down that day. On the 3d the enemy was reinforced from above by another bomb ship and a sloop of war fitted up as a rocket ship. The latter anchoring within reach of our battery, we were enabled to play on her with great effect, and compelled her to change her position. All this day and the succeeding night the enemy kept up a brisk fire on us of shot, shells and rockets. In the course of the day their prizes from Alexandria anchored above them, and out of the reach of our cannon. The work of our battery went on; five light field pieces, from four to six pounders, arrived and were planted, and we had every hope of soon receiving some long thirty-two pounders from Washington; we built a furnace for hot shot, and time only appeared necessary to make ourselves formidable. The whole of the 4th and 5th, an incessant fire was kept up by the enemy night and day. He had once attempted landing at night, it is supposed with an intention of spiking the guns of our battery, but was repulsed by the picket guard. My former plan of annoying him by advancing guns was adapted to better effect than before. The rocket ship lying close in shore, was much cut up by a twelve pounder and two sixes carried to a point; scarcely a shot missed his hull, and for one hour we drew to this point the fire of all the enemy's force. The cool indifference of my sailors to the danger to which they were exposed was very remarkable, and the intrepidity of captain Griffith, of the Alexandria artillery, his officers and men, merit the highest eulogiums. They fought their six pounders until their ammunition was expended, and coolly retired with their guns, when ordered to do so, under a shower of the enemy's shot.

We now, as if by mutual consent, ceased all hostilities. Some thirty-two pounders arrived. Carpenters were employed to make carriages. Two mortars, a large quantity of ammunition and an abundance of shot and shells reached us; two barges were equipped, and every thing promised that we should speedily be put in a proper state for annoying the enemy. In the evening two frigates anchored alone above us, making his whole force

Two frigates, carrying	96
Three bomb ships	30
One sloop of war fitted as a rocket ship	25
One brig	18
One schooner	1

The guns mounted in the battery were three 18 pounders, two 12 pounders, six 9 pounders and two fours. My two mortars were without carriages, as were all my thirty-two's; for notwithstanding every effort was made by the government at Washington to have them made there, and by myself on the spot, they could not be completed in time.

On the morning of the 6th the enemy shewed a disposition to move. I advised general Hungerford of the same, and prepared to meet them with hot shot. About twelve o'clock the two frigates got under way, with a fair wind and tide, and stood down for us. The rocket sloop, bomb vessels, brig, schooner and prizes following in succession, the gun boats endeavouring to flank us on our right. I immediately despatched an officer to general Hungerford, to request him to take the position agreed upon in the woods on the heights; but from the distance of his camp and the quick approach of the enemy, he was unable to march before the firing commenced, and, after that period, it was almost impossible, as I have understood, from the vast quantities of shot shells and rockets which were showered over the hills and fell among his troops.

As the enemy approached, a well directed fire was kept up from the battery with hot and cold shot, and my brave officers and men stood the broadsides of the ships with unparalleled firmness. I anxiously expected the militia would open their fire of musquetry, but was disappointed; the cause was not explained until after the firing ceased. Finding that the whole of the enemy's fire was directed at my force, and that in a few minutes all his force would be brought to bear on me, and (enter-taining no hopes of preventing his passing) as some of my men had already been killed and wounded, I determined not to make an useless sacrifice; and when the enemy was on the point of anchoring abreast the battery, after sustaining his fire one hour and a quarter, I directed the officers and men to retire behind a hill on our left, and be in readiness to charge the enemy, if he should land to spike our guns. The two frigates anchored abreast, the bombs, sloops and smaller vessels passed outside them, all pouring into the battery and neighboring woods a tremendous fire of every description of missile. In the woods on the left, a company of riflemen from Jefferson county, Virginia, under captain George W. Humphreys, greatly distinguished themselves by a well directed fire on the enemy's decks, as did a company of militia under the command of captain Gena, who was posted by me on the right. The first lost one man killed, and one sergeant and four privates wounded; the latter two privates killed. The company of artillery which so much distinguished itself on a former occasion, behaved with no less gallantry to-day; and it affords me much pleasure to observe, that the militia who came under my immediate notice, and were attached to my command, voluntarily or otherwise, conducted themselves in a manner which reflects on them and their country the highest honor. Many before the battle requested to be posted near me; and there was no instance where one offered to retire until I gave the order to retire—and it was not necessary to repeat the order to rally. Captain Grayson of the marines is a brave and zealous officer—he had volunteered to come with his detachment under me at Baltimore. Those veterans who so much distinguished themselves under their gallant though unfortunate commander at Bladensburg, were all willing to try another battle—they have been again unsuccessful, but no less courageous: two of them have fallen.

Captain Spencer of the United States' artillery, late second in command at fort Washington, and now in command of the officers and men stationed there, were attached to my command by the war department—they have given the most unquestionable proof that it was not want of courage on their part which caused the destruction of that fort. Captain Spencer, his officers and men merit the attention of their country, and have incurred my esteem—three of them were killed. The remnant of the crew of the Essex behaved as usual. Lieutenant Barnwall received on this day his third wound. Doctor Hoffman was also wounded in the head. To particularise the good conduct of each individual placed under my orders would swell too much the bulk of this letter. Several lieutenants and midshipmen of the navy, as well as many young gentlemen of the neighborhood, volunteered to serve under my order and near my person—they all conducted themselves with great courage, and made themselves of great utility before and during the battle, and I shall take an opportunity of making you more particularly acquainted with their names and merits. After the bombs, gun vessels and prizes had all passed, the frigate proceeded down and anchored abreast Indian Head, where a constant firing was kept up until after sunset; but I am fearful with little success on our part.

The number we have had killed and wounded on this occasion I cannot ascertain exactly. I am induced to believe, however it does not exceed thirty, and when we consider the constant fire which has been kept up by the enemy for the four days preceding their passage by the fort, we should esteem ourselves very fortunate. His damage can never be known by us. Some of his ships were much crippled, and I should suppose his loss considerable.

I have understood, that in order to bring their guns to bear on our battery, they cut away the upper part of their ports and took the inner trucks from their gun carriages. When they had passed down, I sent a torpedo after them—it was heard to explode about nine at night, but I have not learnt the effect it produced.

I have the honor to be, with much respect, your obedient and humble servant,

D. PORTER.

Honorable William Jones, secretary of the navy.

Copy of a letter from captain Perry to the secretary of the navy, dated Georgetown, September 9, 1814.

SIR—The battery under my direction at the Indian Head was of too small a calibre to make much impression on the enemy, as they descended the P. tomac on the 5th instant. A single eighteen pounder, which arrived only thirty minutes before the firing began, ill supplied with ammunition, was the only gun that could be of much service.

The field pieces (six pounders) under the direction of that excellent officer major Peter, of the Georgetown, and captain Birch of the Washington volunteers, and captain Lewis, of general Stewart's brigade, kept up a very spirited fire. These officers, together with captains Stull and Davidson, and their brave men, behaved in the handsomest manner, and rendered all the assistance their limited means afforded.

The ammunition of the eighteen pounder, and of several of the sixes, being expended, and the fire of the enemy from two frigates, two sloops of war, two bombs, one rocket ship, and several smaller vessels, being very heavy, it was thought advisable by general

Stewart, major Peter and myself to retire a short distance in the rear. This was done in good order, after sustaining their fire for more than an hour. General Stewart and colonel Beall were much exposed during the whole time of the cannonading. It would be presumption in me to speak in commendation of these veterans—I cannot, however, avoid expressing my admiration of their conduct. The few seamen (of the Guerricre) under the immediate command of lieutenant Read, of the Java, exhibited their usual bravery. Indeed, in the whole of this affair, every officer and man did his duty. Major Stewart of the 36th regiment of infantry was constantly with and rendered all the assistance in his power.

The advantageous situations we occupied prevented the enemy from doing us much injury. Only one man was wounded.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

O. H. PERRY.

Honorable William Jones, secretary of the navy.

Copy of a letter from Commodore Porter to the Secretary of the Navy, dated

WASHINGTON, SEPT. 9.

The enclosed note was sent to me by col. Parker, and I beg that you will publish it along with my report.

I have the honor to be, with great respect, your obedient servant,

D. PORTER.

Hon. Wm. Jones, Secretary of the Navy.

THE NOTE ENCLOSED.

The very moment information was received by col. Green and myself of the enemy's intention to come down, the regiments were paraded, mine being in front, and commenced their march. Fearing that unless the ground was previously marked out, there would be some difficulty in forming them in the midst of so heavy a fire, I rode forward myself; went to the ground on the right of the battery which was to have been my station, found it occupied by some riflemen, &c.; then went to the left, ordered capt. Janway's company to take their position, and waited myself for the regiment to come up. After some time the fire becoming excessively heavy, I found that the sailors and marines were retreating from the fort, and seeing commodore Porter among the last, I ran to him and asked if he had ordered it. He replied that he found it impossible to maintain the fort longer against so disproportioned a force.

I could myself proceed very little farther, and found it not only more dangerous to retreat than remain, but quite impossible to rejoin the troops, who had, as I understand, continued to advance to within 200 yards of the battery, until gen. Hungerford ordered a retreat.

The 11th regiment was a second time ordered to advance obliquely to the right to cover the battery, and did so advance until they came within view of the shipping and were again retreated.

The brigade of gen. Young were in col. Green's and my rear.

R. E. PARKER,
Lieut. Col. Com'g. 11th Regt.

Copy of a letter from Commodore Rodgers to the Secretary of the Navy, dated,

BALTIMORE, SEPT. 9, 1814.

SIR—In pursuance of your instructions, I have to inform you, that on the 3d inst. I proceeded down the Potomac with three small fire-vessels under the protection of four barges or cutters, manned with about sixty seamen, armed with muskets, destined against two of the enemy's frigates and a bomb-ship, which lay about 2 1-2 miles below Alexandria.

At 9 A. M. in advance of the fire vessels in my gig, finding no colors displayed at Alexandria, but a Swedish ensign on board a schooner—being near the wharves, I hailed and ordered the American flag to be hoisted; after seeing the flag hoisted, I directed the fire-vessels (which were conducted by lieut. Newcomb, lieut. Forrest, and sailing master Ramage) to proceed on to the objects of attack, and I have no doubt, would have succeeded in destroying two at least of the enemy's ships, had not the wind failed them some time before, and particularly after they had reached the uppermost ship, within the range of musket shot. At this time perceiving the whole of the enemy's barges in motion, I directed lieut. Newcomb, who commanded the van vessel, after giving her a proper direction, to set fire to her—and after Mr. Ramage came up, gave him the same orders; the vessel under charge of lieut. Forrest was fired by the pilot without orders, some distance above the others.

Of the enemy's boats, some were employed in towing off the fire-vessels, and the rest in pursuit of our four cutters, my own gig, and a small boat with three oars without a rudder; they did not, however, venture to come within musket shot, although their force and numbers were more than treble ours, but continued at a distance, firing their great guns for 30 or 35 minutes, and then retired to their ships again.

On the 4th inst. I had another fire vessel prepared, but it being calm, I ordered lieut. Newcomb and the four cutters, to proceed with one of the remaining lighters of the yard, having an 18 pounder in her, to attack the bomb-ship, which in the anxiety of the enemy to get below the temporary forts erecting by my gallant associates—captains Porter and Perry, had been left exposed to attack. At sun set, just as I was about to give orders to attack the bomb, I discovered one of the enemy's frigates behind the point forming the entrance of Washington's reach, which necessarily obliged me to relinquish this determination, and give orders to proceed across to the Virginia shore, to haul up the boats and place the lighter in a situation to be defended against the enemy's barges.

Having reconnoitered the enemy, on returning to the lighter at 9 P. M. I seized a man under suspicious circumstances, on the Beach near to a small boat, about a mile above the enemy's uppermost ship, that again induced me to change my position to the opposite side of the river, where, after getting the cutters hauled up, placing the lighter in an advantageous position, and my musket men upon the top of a cliff overlooking the river. I was at 11 P. M. attacked by all the enemy's barges, but which, by the cool intrepidity of lieut. Newcomb, having charge of the lighter, assisted by lieut. Forrest, S. Master Ramage, M. Mate Stockton and Midshipman Whitlock and 45 seamen with muskets, the enemy was not only repulsed, but in less than 20 minutes thrown into the utmost confusion and driven back to his ships, and I have sufficient reason to believe with great loss, although the only injury sustained on our part was one man wounded on board the lighter.

The enemy thus repulsed, and no prospect of doing him further injury in this way, as his rearmost ship was not more than a mile distant, I had the lighter shifted further up, and at 7 A. M. a fire vessel brought down for the purpose of assailing him in conjunction with the battery at the White House, under the command of captain Porter—but in this I was again disappointed, as that excellent officer, after using every possible exertion, was not able in so short a time as had been afforded him, to erect a work sufficiently strong, to check the enemy any length of time; otherwise, I conceived I should have found no difficulty in effecting his destruction.

At the time the enemy silenced the battery, the fire-ship, under full sail was about a mile above his uppermost vessel, when I found myself under the necessity of ordering her to be set on fire, and at the same time, our boats to retire to prevent their being taken possession of by his numerous barges.

Although I did not succeed in the destruction of any of the enemy's vessels, I am nevertheless convinced, that the expedition was in many points of view attended with good effect, consequently I feel it a duty to recommend to your notice the officers and seamen engaged in the same; as, in two of the fire-vessels, Lieut. Newcomb and S. Master Ramage manifested so much zeal, as to continue on board, steering them, until they were enveloped in the flames, and obliged to jump overboard to avoid sharing the fate of the vessels themselves. I am also indebted to the exertions of lieut. Forrest, who volunteered his services, and although very much indisposed at the time, afforded all the assistance in his power.

Permit me at the same time to recommend to your attention Mr. Stockton, masters mate, who not only rendered me essential service as acting aid-de camp, but in every other situation manifested a zeal and intrepidity not to be shaken: also, midshipman Whitlock, whose conduct in every part of the service I highly approve. Mr. Thomas Herbert, a young gentleman of Alexandria, and Mr. Porry, pilot, who volunteered their services, also deserve well of their country.

The conduct of the seamen for energy and patriotism, was not even excelled by that of their officers.

At the time I took possession of Alexandria, there were 1500 pounds of fresh beef lying on the wharfs ready to be delivered to the boats of the enemy's ships, which were then only 2 1/2 or 3 miles below the town, and I mention this to shew the state that place was in at the time.

In justice to maj. Kemper, commanding a detachment of the militia of gen. Hungerford's brigade, it is but proper I mention, that on taking possession of Alexandria he immediately marched his detachment to my assistance and which at once secured the town against any force the enemy could send back.

The quantity of flour the enemy was enabled to take from Alexandria, I found on enquiry to be not more than between 14 and 16,000 barrels.

As respects the manner of my reception by the citizens of Alexandria, when I landed and took possession of that place, I shall inform you hereafter in a separate communication.

With great respect, I have the honor to be, sir, your obedient servant,

JOHN RODGERS.

The Hon. W. Jones, Secretary of the Navy.

Copy of a letter from Commodore Chauncey to the Secretary of the Navy, dated U. S. S. Superior, off Kingston, Aug. 10, 1814.

SIR—Great anxiety of mind and severe bodily exertions, have at length broken down the best constitution and subjected me to a violent fever that confined me for eighteen days. This misfortune was no more to be foreseen than prevented, but was particularly severe at the moment it happened, as it induced a delay of five or six days in the sailing of the fleet.

In the early part of July, I expected the fleet would be made ready for sailing by the 10th or 15th; but many of the mechanics were taken sick, and amongst them the block-makers and blacksmiths, so that the Mohawk could not be furnished with blocks and iron work for her gun and spar decks before the 24th or 25th ult. when she was reported ready by captain Jones. As considerable anxiety had been manifested by the public to have the fleet on the lake, I should have asked captain Jones to take charge of it and go out, but I was then recovering my health, and was confident I should be able in three or four days to go on board myself. There was an additional reason for submitting to this delay in the difficulty I found in making the changes of commanders, neither of them being willing to be separated from his officers and men; and a change of crews through the fleet being inadmissible.

In the afternoon of the 31st July, I was taken on board, but it was calm, and I did not sail before the next morning. To satisfy at once whatever expectations the public had been led to entertain of the sufficiency of this squadron to take and maintain the ascendancy on this lake, and at the same time to expose the futility of promises, the fulfilment of which had been rested on our appearance at the head of the lake, I got under way at 4 o'clock in the morning of the 1st inst. and steered for the mouth of the Niagara. Owing to light winds, I did not arrive off there before the 5th. There we intercepted one of the enemy's brigs running over from York to Niagara with troops, and ran her on shore about six miles to the westward of Fort George. I ordered the Sylph in, to anchor as near to the enemy as she could with safety, and to destroy her. Captain Elliot ran in in a very gallant manner to within from 300 to 500 yards of her and was about anchoring, when the enemy set fire to her and she soon after blew up.—This vessel was a schooner the last year and called the Beresford—since they altered her to a brig they changed her name, and I have not been able to ascertain it. She mounted 14 guns, twelve 24 pound carronades and two long 9 pounders.

Finding the enemy had two other brigs and a schooner in the Niagara river, I determined to leave a force to watch them, and selected the Jefferson, Sylph and Oneida for that purpose, and placed the whole under the orders of capt. Ridgely. Having looked into York without discovering any vessel of the enemy, I left Niagara with the remainder of the squadron on the evening of the 7th, and arrived here the 9th. We found one of the enemy's ships in the offing, and chased her into Kingston.

My anxiety to return to this end of the lake was increased by the knowledge I had of the weakness of Sackett's Harbor, and the apprehension that the enemy might receive large reinforcements at Kingston, and, embarking some of the troops on board his fleet, make a dash at the Harbor and burn it with all my stores during our absence.—When I left the Harbor there were but about 700 regular troops fit for duty. It is true a few militia had been called in, but little could be expected of them should an attack be made. My apprehension, it seems, was groundless, the enemy having contented himself with annoying in some trifling degree the coasters between Oswego and the Harbor, in his boats.

I cannot forbear expressing the regret I feel that so much sensation has been excited in the public mind, because this squadron did not sail so soon as the wise-heads that conduct our newspapers have presumed to think I ought. I need not suggest to one of your experience, that a man of war may appear to the eye of a landsman perfectly ready for sea, when she is deficient in many of the most essential points of her armament, nor how unworthy I should have proved myself of the high trust reposed in me, had I ventured to set in the face of an enemy of equal force, without being ready to meet him in one hour after my anchor was weighed.

It ought in justice to be recollected, that the building and equipment of vessels on the Atlantic are unattended by any of the great difficulties which we have to encounter on this lake; there every department abounds with facilities. A commander makes a requisition, and articles of every description are furnished in twelve hours; but this fleet has been built and fitted in the wilderness, where there are no agents and chandlers' shops and foundries, &c. &c. to supply our wants, but every thing is to be created; and yet I shall not decline a comparison of what has been done here, with any thing done on the Atlantic, in the building or equipment of vessels. The Guerriere, for instance, has been building and fitting upwards of twelve months in the city of Philadelphia, and is not yet ready. The President frigate went into the Navy Yard at New York for some partial repairs, a few days after the keel of the Superior was laid; since then two frigates of a large class, and two sloops of war of the largest class, have been built and fitted here, and have sailed before the President is ready for sea, although every article of their armament and rigging has been transported from New York in despite of obstacles almost insurmountable. I will go farther, sir, for it is due to the unremitted and unsurpassed exertions of those who have served the public under my command, and will challenge the world to produce a parallel instance, in which the same number of vessels of such dimensions have been built and fitted in the same time by the same number of workmen.

I confess that I am mortified in not having succeeded in satisfying the expectations of the public, but it would be infinitely more painful, could I find any want of zeal or exertion in my endeavors to serve them, to which I could in any degree impute their disappointment.

I have the honor to be, sir, with the utmost respect, your most obedient and very humble servant,
ISAAC CHAUNCEY.

Hon. WM. JONES, Secretary of the Navy.

Copy of a letter from major-general Brown to commodore Chauncey.

Head-quarters, Queenstown, July 13th, 1814.

MY DEAR SIR,—I arrived at this place on the 10th, as I assured you, that with the blessing of God I would. All accounts agree that the force of the enemy in Kingston is very light—meet me on the lake shore, north of Fort George with your fleet, and we will be able, I have no doubt, to settle a plan of operation that will break the power of the enemy in Upper Canada, and that in the course of a short time. At all events, let me hear from you; I have looked for your fleet with the greatest anxiety since the 10th. I do not doubt my ability to meet the enemy in the field, and to march in any direction over his country; your fleet carrying for me the necessary supplies. We can threaten forts George and Niagara, and carry Burlington Heights and York, and proceed direct to Kingston and carry that place. For God's sake let me see you; sir James will not fight, two of his vessels are now in Niagara river.

If you conclude to meet me at the head of the lake, and that immediately, have the goodness to bring the guns and troops that I have ordered from the Harbor; at all events have the politeness to let me know what aid I am to expect from the fleet of lake Ontario.

There is not a doubt resting in my mind but we have between us the command of sufficient means to conquer Upper Canada within two months, if there is a prompt and zealous co-operation and a vigorous application of these means; now is our time before the enemy can be greatly reinforced. Yours truly, (Signed) JACOB BROWN.

Commodore CHAUNCEY.

Copy of a letter from com. Chauncey to major-gen. Brown, dated

U. S. ship Superior, off Kingston, 2 August 10, 1814.

SIR,—Your letter of the 13th ult. was received by me on a sick bed, hardly able to hear it read, and entirely unfitted to reply to it. I, however, requested gen. Gaines to acquaint you with my situation, the probable time of the fleet's sailing, and my views of the extent of its co-operation with the army.

From the tenor of your letter, it would appear that you had calculated much upon the co-operation of the fleet. You cannot surely have forgotten the conversation we held on this subject at Sackett's Harbor, previous to your departure for Niagara. I then professed to feel it my duty as well as inclination, to afford every assistance in my power to the army, and to co-operate with it whenever it could be done without losing sight of this great object, for the attainment of which this fleet had been created, to wit: the capture or destruction of the enemy's fleet; but I then distinctly stated to you, that this was a primary object, and would be first attempted; and that you must not expect the fleet at the head of the lake, unless that of the enemy should induce us to follow him there.

I will not suffer myself to believe that this conversation was misunderstood or has since been forgotten. How then shall I account for the intimation thrown out to the publick in your despatch to the secretary of war, that you expected the fleet to co-operate with you? Was it friendly, or just or honorable, not only to furnish an opening for the publick, but thus to assist them, to infer that I had pledged myself to meet you on a particular day, at the head of the lake, for the purpose of co-operation? and in case of disaster to your army, thus to turn their resentment from you, who are alone responsible, upon me, who could not by any possibility have prevented or retarded even your discomfiture. You well know, sir, that the fleet could not have rendered you the least service during your late incursion upon Upper Canada. You have not been able to approach lake Ontario on any point nearer than Queenstown, and the enemy were then in possession of all the country between that place and the shore of Ontario; and that I could not even communicate with you, without making a circuit of 70 or 80 miles. I would ask, of what possible use the fleet would have been to you, either in threatening or investing Fort George, when the shallowness of the water alone would prevent an approach with these ships within two miles of that fort or Niagara? To pretend that the fleet could render the least assistance in your projected capture of Burlington Heights on your route to Kingston, is still more romantic, for it is well known the fleet could not approach within 9 miles of those Heights.

That you might find the fleet somewhat of a convenience in the transportation of provisions and stores for the use of the army, and an agreeable appendage to attend its marches and counter-marches, I am ready to believe; but, sir, the Secretary of the Navy has honored us with a higher destiny—we are intended to seek and to fight the enemy's fleet. This is the great purpose of the government in creating this fleet; and I shall not be diverted in my efforts to effectuate it by any sinister attempt to render us subordinate to, or an appendage of, the army.

We have one common object in the annoyance, defeat and destruction of the enemy; and I shall always cheerfully unite with any military commander in the promotion of that object.

I am, sir, with great consideration and respect, your most obedient servant,

I. CHAUNCEY.

Major-general JACOB BROWN.

Extract of a letter from James Underwick, Surgeon of the late U. States brig Argus, to the Secretary of the Navy, dated Boston, September 5, 1814.

"Having been appointed by commodore Decatur as acting surgeon on board the late U. States' brig Argus, a short time previous to her departure from New-York and having served in that capacity until the unfortunate termination of her cruise; I was, with her surviving officers, detained as a prisoner of war, on parole, in England. I have now, sir, however, the honor of reporting to you my arrival on the 3d inst. at this port, in the cartel ship Saratoga, having at length obtained my release and passport as a non-combatant.

As lieutenant Watson, our surviving commanding officer, has been unable, under parole restrictions, to transmit any official documents relative to the action and capture of the Argus, I have the honor to enclose, for your information, a report of the casualties attending that event. I regret that I have not yet been able to furnish the wounded with the regular certificates; it was impossible, without personal communication with them, to obtain the information necessary to the filling up of the blanks, with the precision enjoined in the orders of your honorable department."

Return of killed and wounded on board the late U. S. brig Argus, Wm. H. ALLEN, esq. late commander, in action, with H. B. M. sloop Pelican, on the 4th August, 1813.

KILLED—Mr. William Edwards, midshipman; Mr. Richard Delphy, do.; Joshua Jones, seaman; George Gardner, do. John Findley, do. William Moulton, do. WOUNDED—William H. Allen, esq. commander, severely—died August 18th, 1813; Wm. H. Watson, 1st lieutenant, do.—cured; Collin McLeod, boatswain, do. discharged Nov. 22d, 1813, from Mill Prison Hospital, and sent to Dartmore Depot; James White, carpenter, do.—died Aug. 17, at Mill Prison; Joseph Jordan, boatswain's mate, do.—died Aug. 16, at sea; John Young, jr. master, do.—remaining in hospital March 1st, 1814; Francis Egger, seaman, do.—died Aug. 30th, at Mill Prison; John Nugent, seaman, do.—remaining in hospital on the 1st of March, 1814; Charles Baxter, seaman, do.—died Sept. 2d, at Mill Prison; James Kellam, or. seamen, slightly—discharged Oct. 24th, at Dartmore Depot; Wm. Hovington, seaman, severely—discharged from hospital to Dartmore Depot, Sept. 11th; James Hall, seaman, slightly—discharged to Depot, Aug. 28th.

The following who were on board the Pelican immediately after the action, have been ascertained to be among the number wounded.

George Starbuck, seaman; John Saffin, carpenter's mate; John Scott, the 1st seaman; John Hadden; Joseph Allen.

Several others whose names have not been ascertained, were taken on board the enemy's vessel. I have the honor to be, sir, your obedient servant,

JAMES UNDERWICK,

Acting Surgeon of the late U. S. brig Argus.
Hon. Wm. Jones, secretary of the navy.

Copy of a letter from Lieut. colonel Armistead, to the secretary of war, dated Fort M'Henry, September 24th, 1814.

A severe indisposition, the effect of great fatigue and exposure, has prevented me heretofore from presenting you with an account of the attack on this post. On the night of Saturday the 10th inst. the British fleet, consisting of ships of the line, heavy frigates, and bomb vessels, amounting in the whole to 30 sail, appeared at the mouth of the river Patapsco, with every indication of an attempt on the city of Baltimore. My own force consisted of one company of United States artillery, under capt. Evans, and two companies of sea fencibles, under captains Bunbury and Addison. Of these three companies, 35 men were unfortunately on the sick list, and unfit for duty. I had been furnished with two companies of volunteer artillery from the city of Baltimore, under capt. Berry and lieut. commandant Pennington. To these I must add another very fine company of volunteer artillerists, under judge Nicholson, who had proffered their services to aid in the defence of this post whenever an attack might be apprehended; and also a detachment from commodore Barney's flotilla, under lieut. Rodman. Brig. general Winder had also furnished me with about six hundred infantry, under the command of lieut. col. Stuart and major Lane, consisting of detachments from the 12th, 14th, 36th and 38th regts. of United States troops—the total amounting to about 1000 effective men.

On Monday morning very early, it was perceived that the enemy was landing troops on the east side of the Patapsco, distant about ten miles. During that day and the ensuing night, he had brought sixteen ships (including five bomb ships) within about two miles and an half of this Fort. I had arranged my force as follows: The regular artillerists under capt. Evans, and the volunteers under capt. Nicholson, manned the bastions in the Star Fort. Captains Bunbury's, Addison's, Rodman's, Berry's, and lieut. commandant Pennington's commands were stationed on the lower works, and the infantry under lieut. col. Stuart and major Lane were in the outer ditch, to meet the enemy at his landing, should he attempt one.

On Tuesday morning about sunrise, the enemy commenced the attack from his five bomb vessels, at the distance of about two miles, when, finding that his shells reached us, he anchored, and kept up an incessant and well-directed bombardment.—We immediately opened our batteries, and kept a brisk fire from our guns and mortars, but unfortunately our shot and shells all fell considerably short of him. This was to me a most distressing circumstance; as it left us exposed to a constant and tremendous shower of shells, without the most remote possibility of our doing him the slightest injury. It affords me the highest gratification to state, that although we were left thus exposed, and thus inactive, not a man shrunk from the conflict.

About 2 o'clock, P. M. one of the 24 pounders on the south west bastion, under the immediate command of captain Nicholson, was dismounted by a shell, the explosion from which killed his second lieut. and wounded several of his men; the bustle necessarily produced in removing the wounded and remounting the gun probably induced the enemy to suspect that we were in a state of confusion, as he brought in three of his bomb ships to what I believed to be good striking distance. I immediately ordered a fire to be opened, which was obeyed with alacrity through the whole garrison, and in half an hour those intruders again sheltered themselves by withdrawing beyond our reach. We gave three cheers, and again ceased firing. The enemy continued throwing shells, with one or two slight intermissions, till 1 o'clock in the morning of Wednesday, when it was discovered that he had availed himself of the darkness of the night, and had thrown a considerable force above to our right; they had approached very near to fort Covington, when they began to throw rockets; intended, I presume, to give them an opportunity of examining the shores; as I have since understood, they had detached 1250 picked men, with scaling ladders, for the purpose of storming this fort. We once more had an opportunity of opening our batteries, and kept up a continued blaze for nearly two hours, which had the effect again to drive them off.

In justice to lieut. Newcomb, of the U. States navy, who commanded at fort Covington with a detachment of sailors, and lieut. Webster, of the flotilla, who commanded the six gun battery near that fort, I ought to state, that during this time they kept up an animated, and I believe a very destructive fire, to which I am persuaded we are much indebted in repulsing the enemy. One of his sunken barges has since been found with two dead men in it—others have been seen floating in the river. The only means we had of directing our guns, was by the blaze of their rockets, and the flashes of their guns. Had they ventured to the same situation in the day time, not a man would have escaped.

The bombardment continued on the part of the enemy until 7 o'clock on Wednesday morning, when it ceased: and about nine, their ships got under weigh, and stood down the river. During the bombardment, which lasted 25 hours. (with two slight intermissions) from the best calculation I can make, from fifteen to eighteen hundred shells were thrown by the enemy. A few of these fell short. A large proportion burst over us, throwing their fragments among us, and threatening destruction. Many passed over, and about four hundred fell within the works. Two of the public buildings are materially injured—the others but slightly. I am happy to inform you (wonderful as it may appear) that our loss amounts only to four men killed, and 24 wounded. The latter will all recover. Among the killed, I have to lament the loss of lieut. Clagget, and sergeant Clemm, both of captain Nicholson's volunteers; two men whose fate is to be deplored, not only for their personal bravery, but for their high standing, amiable demeanor, and spotless integrity in private life. Lieut. Russel, of the company under lieutenant Pennington, received, early in the attack, a severe contusion in the heel; notwithstanding which he remained at his post during the whole bombardment.

Were I to name any individual who signalled themselves, it would be doing injustice to others. Suffice it to say, that every officer and soldier under my command did their duty to my entire satisfaction.

I have the honor to remain, respectfully, your obedient servant.

G. ARMISTEAD,

lt. col. U. S. Artillery.

Hon. James Monroe, secretary of war.

Copy of a letter from capt. Campbell to the secretary of the navy, dated

St. Mary's, 12th September, 1814.

SIR—I beg leave to report the British privateer schooner Fortune of War, captured on the 9th inst. off Sappelo Bar, by gun vessels No. 160, and 151 in company commanded by Thomas M. Pendleton; mounts 2 six pounders with a crew consisting of 35 in number, three weeks from Bermuda, without having made any captures.

She surrendered after receiving two shot from the gun vessel, and having one man killed. Previous to the capture of the privateer, the gun vessels had taken one of her boats and 13 men that had landed on Sappelo.

I have the honor to be, with great respect, sir, your obedient servant,
H. G. CAMPBELL.
The hon. Wm. Jones, secretary of the navy.

Copy of a letter from a staff officer to the editors of the National Intelligencer.

Washington, Sept. 14th, 1814.

Gentlemen—In commodore Porter's statement of the defence of the battery at the White House, he has, by mistake, informed that lieutenant Spencer of the corps of artillery was second in command at Fort Warburton when that place was abandoned. I deem it my duty to inform you that lieutenant Spencer was not attached to the command at Fort Warburton, but was at the time of its abandonment in Baltimore; having reached this on the 28th, and volunteering his services, he was, on the arrest of captain Dyson, put in command of his company, which was then on Mason's island, and with it proceeded down the river and acted under commodore Porter to his entire satisfaction.

Copy of a letter from commodore Barney to captain Sevier, of the marine corps, dated

Sir—It was not until three days after my report was made to the secretary of navy, that major Stuart called at my house and informed, that in the retreat after the battle of the 2d ult. he overtook you, wounded in the neck, and that he lent you his horse. My situation prevented me from obtaining a knowledge of the situation of many of my brave companions. I only mentioned those I saw, except in the case of acting sailing master Martin—he was reported to me as dead. I since learn he is only badly wounded. Your not being mentioned in my report will not diminish the glory yourself and the other officers of the marine corps acquired. You fought, I may say, under the eyes of all America, and fame will do you justice. Receive, sir, my wishes for your speedy recovery, and present my respects to lieutenants Richardson, Nicoll, Lord and Brooke, who so ably assisted on that memorable day. I am, sir, with respect, your obedient servant,
JOSHUA BARNEY.

Captain A. Sevier, Marine Corps, Washington.

MACDONOUGH'S VICTORY.

Copies of letters from commodore Macdonough to the secretary of the navy, dated

U. S. ship Saratoga, at anchor off Plattsburgh, Sept. 13, 1814.

Sir—By lieutenant commandant Cassin I have the honor to convey to you the flags of his Britannic majesty's late squadron, captured on the 11th inst. by the United States' squadron, under my command. Also my despatches relating to that occurrence, which should have been in your possession at an earlier period, but for the difficulty in arranging the different statements.

The squadron under my command now lies at Plattsburgh—it will bear of considerable diminution, and leave a force sufficient to repel any attempt of the enemy in this quarter. I shall wait your order what to do with the whole or any part thereof.

I have the honor to be &c.

T. MACDONOUGH.

Honorable William Jones secretary of the navy.

Copy of a letter from lieutenant Cassin, to commodore Macdonough.

U. S. schooner Ticonderoga, Plattsburgh bay, Sept. 12th 1814.

Sir—It is a pleasure I state, that every officer and man, under my command did their duty yesterday.

Yours respectfully,
STEPHEN CASSIN,
lieutenant commanding.

Commodore Thomas Macdonough.

Copy of a letter from lieutenant Henley, to commodore Macdonough.

U. S. Brig Eagle, Plattsburgh Sept. 12th, 1814

Sir—I am happy to inform you that all my officers and men acted bravely, and did their duty in the battle of yesterday with the enemy.

I shall have the pleasure of making a more particular representation of the respective merits of my gallant officers to the honorable the secretary of the navy.

I have the honor to be, respectfully, sir, your most obedient servant, RO. HENLEY.

P. S. We had thirty-nine round shot in our hull (mostly 24 pounders)—four in our lower masts—and we were well peppered with grape. I enclose my boatswain's report.

R. H.

Copy of a letter from George Beale, junr. to commodore Macdonough, dated

U. S. ship Saratoga, September 13, 1814.

Sir—I have the honor to enclose you a list of the killed and wounded on board the different vessels of the squadron under your command in the action of the 11th inst.

It is impossible to ascertain correctly the loss of the enemy. From the best information received from the British officers, from my own observations, and from various lists found on board the Confidence, I calculate the number of men on board that ship at the commencement of the action at 270 of whom at least 180 were killed and wounded, and on board the other captured vessels at least 80 more, making in the whole, killed and wounded, 260. This is doubtless short of the real number, as many were thrown overboard from the Confidence during the engagement.

The muster books must have been thrown overboard, or otherwise disposed of, as they are not to be found.

I am sir, very respectfully your obedient servant,
GEO. BEALE, jun. purser.

Thomas Macdonough, esq. commanding U. S. squadron, on lake Champlain.

Copy of a letter from commodore Macdonough to the secretary of the navy, dated

U. S. ship Saratoga, Plattsburgh bay, September 13, 1814.

Sir—I have the honor to give you the particulars of the action which took place on the 11th inst. on this lake.

For several days the enemy were on their way to Plattsburgh by land and water, and it being well understood that an attack would be made at the same time by their land and naval forces, I determined to await at anchor the approach of the latter.

At 8 A. M. the look-out boat announced the approach of the enemy. At 9, he anchored in a line ahead, at about 300 yards distance from my line; his ship opposed to the Saratoga, his brig to the Eagle, captain Robert Henley, his galleys, thirteen in number, to the schooner, sloop, and a division of our galleys; one of his sloops assisting their ship and brig, the other assisting their galleys. Our remaining galleys with the Saratoga and Eagle.

In this situation the whole force on both sides became engaged, the Saratoga suffering much from the heavy fire of the Confidence. I could perceive at the same time, however, that our fire was very destructive to her. The Ticonderoga, lieutenant commanding Cassin, gallantly sustained her full share of the action. At half past 10 o'clock the Eagle, not being able to bring her guns to bear, cut her cable and anchored in a more eligible position, between my ship and the Ticonderoga, where she very much annoyed the enemy, but unfortunately leaving me exposed to a galling fire from the enemy's brig. Our guns on the starboard side being nearly all dismounted, or not manageable, a stern anchor was let go, the bower cable cut, and the ship winded with a fresh broadside on the enemy's ship, which soon after surrendered. Our broadside was then sprung to bear on the brig, which surrendered in about 15 minutes after.

The sloop that was opposed to the Eagle, had struck some time before and drifted down the line; the sloop which was with their galleys having struck also. Three of their galleys are said to be sunk, the others pulled off. Our galleys were about obeying with alacrity the signal to follow them, when all the vessels were reported to me to be in a sinking state; it then became necessary to annul the signal to the galleys, and order their men to the pumps.

I could only look at the enemy's galleys going off in a shattered condition, for there was not a mast in either squadron that could stand to make sail on; the lower rigging being nearly all shot away, hung down as though it had been just placed over the mast-heads.

The Saratoga had fifty-five round shot in her hull; the Confiance one hundred and five. The enemy's shot passed principally just over our heads, as there were not 20 whole hammocks in the nettings at the close of the action, which lasted without intermission two hours and twenty minutes.

The absence and sickness of lieutenant Raymond Perry, left me without the services of that excellent officer; much ought fairly to be attributed to him for his great care and attention in disciplining the ship's crew, as her first lieutenant. His place was filled by a gallant young officer, lieutenant Peter Gamble, who, I regret to inform you, was killed early in the action. Acting lieutenant Vallette worked the 1st and 2d divisions of guns, with able effect.—Sailing-master Brum's attention to the springs, and in the execution of the order to wind the ship, and occasionally at the guns, meets with my entire approbation; also captain Young's commanding the acting marines, who took his men to the guns. Mr. Beale, purser, was of great service at the guns, and in carrying my orders throughout the ship, with midshipman Montgomery. Master's mate Joshua Justin, had command of the 3d division; his conduct during the action was that of a brave and correct officer. Midshipmen Monteath, Graham, Williamson, Platt, Thwing, and acting midshipman Baldwin, all behaved well, and gave evidence of their making valuable officers.

The Saratoga was twice set on fire by hot shot from the enemy's ship.

I close, sir, this communication with feelings of gratitude for the able support I received from every officer and man attached to the squadron which I have the honor to command.

I have the honor to be, with great respect, sir, your most obedient servant.

T. MACDONOUGH.

INTERESTING SCRAPS.

Com. Macdonough is the son of Dr. Macdonough, late of New Castle county, state of Delaware. He was a midshipman under Decatur, at Tripoli, and one of the gallant band that destroyed the Philadelphia, &c. He is about 28 years of age.

A comparative statement of the guns of the two fleets is given in the commodore's letter—a like statement of the men, and the loss sustained, is given below from the Burlington Centinel—in every thing, but courage and good conduct, were the enemy our superiors. We much question if even a "British official" will dare to brazen us out of the glory of this victory in the eyes of the world. It is very certain that the British ships were manned with picked men; ours with the "common run" of our sailors, who are better than the best of the British. Ecce Signum!

The battle was exceedingly obstinate; the enemy fought gallantly; but the superiority of our gunnery was irresistible. We fired much oftener than they did. All the vessels are much wrecked.

The killed, on both sides, have a very unusual proportion to the wounded—on ours 52 to 58! This is, perhaps, unprecedented. It may serve to shew the warmth and closeness of the action.

It is stated, that in the hottest of the action, a cock in the commodore's ship flew into the shrouds, and crowed three times! The crew seized the happy omen, and shouted victory! This little incident must have had a powerful effect on the seamen.

Salutes and illuminations, in all parts of the United States yet heard from, have celebrated Macdonough's glorious victory, and Macomb's gallant repulse of the imperious foe.

A part of the prisoners taken by com. Macdonough, have arrived at Greenbush, viz. 1 captain, 8 lieuts. 1 sailing master, 2 sailing-masters mates, 2 surgeons, 2 pursers, 1 captain's clerk, 5 midshipmen, 1 boatswain, 2 gunners, 1 carpenter, 1 assistant-surgeon, and 340 seamen.

Extract of a letter to a gentleman in Boston, dated Burlington, September 15.

"Com. Macdonough is a religious man as well as a hero, and prayed with his brave men on the morning of the victory. He was asked how he escaped amid such carnage? and replied, pointing to Heaven, there was a power above which determined the fate of man.

"He had repeatedly to work his own guns when his men at them were shot; and three times he was driven across the deck by splinters, &c.

"The steward's wife of the British ship was on board, and unfortunately killed in the battle.

"It is said, but I think an exaggeration, that Macdonough took more prisoners than he had men.

"At one time, during the battle, Macdonough had all his guns on one side but two dismounted, when he wore his ship. The enemy endeavoring to take the same, failed, and gave us an opportunity to take him.

"Our superior gunnery is again proved as the enemy had two, to one of ours, killed or wounded; and they had locks on their guns, which we had not.

"The galleys did but little; and the enemy's galleys, which were distant spectators, pulled off when they saw their fleet was beaten.

"It is said our commodore intends to go to the Isle-au-Motte, to see sir George's batteries there.

"A rooster was on the shrouds of the Saratoga, and repeatedly crowed; which animated the sailors, as they considered it a good omen.

"Gov. Prevost has made a precipitate retreat.—Some think it a ruse to draw our men across the Rubicon: but I think not.

"The Saranac has been a fine place for our militia, for on the banks was nearly all the execution done. The enemy repeatedly attempted to ford it, but were repulsed every time but the last, when a few officers and men got over, but afterwards straggled into the woods and surrendered to our men, sir George retreating without calling them in. Four lieuts. are here (Baker's) on parole. They speak in terms of admiration of the kindness of Macomb, but are very severe in their remarks on their Sir G. They say, had Wellington, or even Brisbane (whom they term a fire-eater) commanded, they would have had Plattsburg forts. They say they have beaten the cleverest soldiers in the world, and now have been taken by a rabble.

"Their capt. Purchess, they say, was killed by the militia, while holding up his white jacket as a flag.

"The Vermont militia are returning, but the New York militia are still flocking into Plattsburg, as there are but regulars enough to man the forts.—Many deserters came in yesterday, and many more are in the woods. Brooks has greatly distinguished himself at Plattsburg."

From the Burlington Centinel, Sept. 16.—The following account of the force and loss, on board the British and American fleets, was received by a gentleman in this place, directly from com. M'Donough, and put on paper on the spot, and may be relied on as correct, so far as his indefatigable attention to the wounded and the burial of the dead, and the fidelity of the British officers, have enabled him to ascertain the facts.

The British officers killed, were commodore Downie and 3 lieutenants, etc. The American officers killed were lieutenants Gamble and Stansbury, the latter of whom was knocked overboard, and not found, and sailing-master Carter.

The British officers taken are captain Pring, and 6 or 8 lieutenants. The wounded have been paroled and sent by a flag vessel, to the Isle aux Noix.

The British large ship is a fine vessel of her class, having two gun decks in her bow and stern, and mounting among her guns, 28 long 24 pounders, a battery which few frigates of the British navy can boast. This account and remark was from a British officer, who was taken.

MACOMB'S VICTORY.

Head-quarters Plattsburg, Sept. 14, 1814.

GENERAL ORDERS.—The governor-general of the Canadas and commander in chief of the British forces in North America, having invaded the territories of the United States, with the avowed purpose of conquering the country as far as Crown Point and Ticonderoga, there to winter his forces with a view to further conquest, brought with him a powerful army and flotilla—an army amounting to fourteen thousand men completely equipped, and accompanied by a numerous train of artillery and all the engines of war—men, who had conquered in France, Spain, Portugal, the Indies, and in various other parts of the globe, and led by the most experienced generals of the British army. A flotilla also, superior to ours in vessels, men and guns, had determined at once to crush us both by land and water.

The governor-general, after boasting of what he would do, and endeavoring to dissuade the loyal inhabitants of the United States from their allegiance by threats and promises, as set forth in his proclamations and orders, fixed his head-quarters at the village of Champlain, to organize his army and settle the government of his intended conquests. On the 2d day of the month, he marched from Champlain, and on the 5th, appeared before the village of Plattsburg, with his whole army; and the 11th, the day fixed for the general attack, the flotilla arrived.

The enemy's flotilla at 8 in the morning passed Cumberland head, and at 9 engaged our flotilla at anchor in the bay off the town, fully confident of crushing in an instant the whole of our naval force: but the gallant commodore Macdonough, in the short space of two hours, obliged the large vessels to strike their colors, whilst the galleys saved themselves by flight. This glorious achievement was in full view of the several forts, and the American forces had the satisfaction of witnessing the victory. The British army was also so posted on the surrounding heights, that it could not but behold the interesting struggle for dominion on the lake. At the same hour the fleets engaged, the enemy opened his batteries on our forts, throwing hundreds of shells, balls and rockets, and attempted at the same time to cross the Saranack at three different points to assault the works. At the upper ford he was met by the militia and volunteers, and after repeated attempts was driven back with considerable loss in killed, wounded and prisoners. At the bridge near the village, he was repulsed by the pickets and the brave riflemen under captain Grovener and lieuts. Hamilton and Riley, and at the bridge in the town, he was foiled by the guards, block houses, and the artillery of the forts, served by captain Alexander Brooks, captains Richards and Smith, and lieuts. Mountford, Smyth and Cromwell. The enemy's fire was returned with effect from our batteries and by sun set we had the satisfaction to silence seven batteries which had been erected, and to see his column retiring to their camps, beyond the reach of our guns.

Thus beaten by land and water the governor-general, withdrew his artillery and raised the siege, at 9 at night sent off his heavy baggage and under cover of the darkness retreated with his whole army towards Canada, leaving his wounded on the field, and a vast quantity of bread, flour and beef which he had not time to destroy, besides a quantity of bombshells, shot, flints and ammunition of all kinds which remain at the batteries and lie concealed in the ponds and rivers. As soon as his retreat was discovered the light troops volunteers and militia, were in pursuit, and followed as far as Chazy, capturing several dragoons and soldiers, besides covering the escape of hundreds of deserters, who continue still to be coming in. A violent storm and continual fall of rain prevented the brave volunteers and militia from further pursuit.

Thus have the attempts of the invader been frustrated by a regular force of only fifteen hundred men, a brave and active body of militia of the state of New-York under general Moores, and volunteers of the respectable and patriotic citizens of Vermont, led by general Strong and other gentlemen of distinction. The whole not exceeding two thousand five hundred men.

The British forces being now either expelled or captured, the services of the volunteers and militia may be dispensed with.

General Macomb cannot however permit the militia of New-York and the volunteers of Vermont, to depart without carrying with them the high sense he entertains for their merits. The zeal with which they came forward in defence of their country, when the signal of danger was given by the general, reflects the highest lustre on their patriotism and spirit. Their conduct in the field has corresponded with the landable motives which led them into it. They have deserved the esteem of their fellow citizens and the warm approbation of their commanders. They have exemplified how speedily American citizens can be prepared to meet the enemies of their country. In testifying his sense of the merits of the troops, the general cannot but express his sorrow and regret, for the loss of some brave and virtuous citizens, and for those who have been wounded. The loss no doubt will be keenly felt by their friends and countrymen, but at the same time will be borne with that fortitude and resignation which become good citizens and good christians.

The affection of the general will accompany his brave associates in arms, wheresoever they may go, nor will any thing give him more pleasure than opportunities of testifying to them individually, by actions as well as by words, the high regard he cherishes for them.

The general, in the name of the United States, thanks the volunteers and the militia for their distinguished services, and wishes them a happy return to their families and friends. ALEX. MACOMB.

THE NORTHERN FRONTIER.—On entering the United States, sir George Prevost issued the following modest proclamation:

By his excellency lieutenant general sir George Prevost, baronet, captain general and governor in chief of his majesty's North American Provinces, and commander of the forces.

A PROCLAMATION.

The commander of his Britannic majesty's forces which have entered the State of New-York, makes known to its peaceable and unoffending inhabitants, that they have no cause for alarm from this invasion of their country, for the safety of themselves and families, or for the security of their property. He explicitly assures them, that as long as they continue to demean themselves peaceably, they shall be protected in the quiet possession of their homes and permitted freely to pursue their usual occupations.

It is against the government of the United States, by whom this unjust and unprovoked war has been declared, and against those who support it, either openly or secretly, that the arms of his majesty are directed. The quiet and unoffending inhabitants, not found in arms or otherways not aiding in hostility, shall meet with kind usage and generous treatment; and all just complaints against any of his majesty's subjects, offering violence to them, to their families, or to their possessions, shall be immediately redressed.

Those, therefore, who may have been induced to retire at the approach of his majesty's troops, from any mistaken apprehension respecting their object and their views, are hereby invited to return to their farms and habitations as the best means of securing them.

The magistrates and other civil authorities, who in the faithful discharge of the duties of their respective stations, shall continue to exercise their ordinary jurisdiction, for the punishment and apprehension of crimes, and the support of good order, shall not fail to receive countenance and protection.

Given under my hand and seal, at Champlain town, the 2d day of September, 1814.

GEORGE PREVOST.

By command of his excellency,

F. L. COONE, major and aid-de-camp

The following brief detail furnished for the National Advocate, is very interesting.

"On Tuesday the 6th of September, the British were met in Batismantown, about 6 miles from Plattsburgh, by about 700 militia, under the command of lieutenant colonel Miller, and about 300 regulars, under major Wool. The militia annoyed the enemy very much from the woods with their rifles. Captain Leonard, of the artillery, met the enemy about three miles from the village with two pieces of artillery, which were masked by the regulars under major Wool, and as the enemy approached he opened upon them a smart fire, which killed lieutenant colonel Wellington, and wounded many others—the British acknowledge a loss on that day of upwards of 100 killed and wounded of the left division, which advanced by the road through Batismantown. The British on their advance, treated the citizens with attention, and protected those who were not in arms. On Sunday, the day of the action on the lake, they were confident of success; and as their ships appeared the staff officers at the quarters of the left division gave three cheers, and boasted of soon having the Yankee fleet; and made preparations at the same time to attack the fort by land—but alas! when their fleet struck their colors, they were so mortified, that they were ashamed to show their faces—but began immediately to prepare for their retreat. Colonel Murray, the officer who last year burnt the public property at Plattsburgh, was heard to say, "This is a proud day for America—the proudest day she ever saw." On their retreat they plundered the citizens stole horses, oxen, waggons and harness, and every thing they could find. A party of three men and an officer, with pistols, went into a house, and robbed the man of 7 dollars 60 cents and a silver watch. There was on board of the British fleet 3000 stand of arms, with which they calculated to arm such as they supposed would join them; so confident were they of success. They were all Lord Wellington's veterans. After the action deserters were coming in, and when our informant left there, about 500 had arrived: they state that the British were hanging their deserters at Champlain by scores, and had sent their Indians out to scour the woods—either to shoot them or bring them in."

The report that 4 or 500 Germans had deserted in a body, is not true.

Further. The number of the enemy killed by Madomb is not stated, but about 300 wounded were left on the field, and some prisoners were made.—The whole loss of the enemy, by land and water, amounts to at least 2,000 men. Sir George effected his retreat in great confusion, leaving "a number of tents, several pieces of cannon, great quantities of ammunition, bombs, cannon balls, grape shot, fixed cartridges, shovels, spades, axes, pick axes, bread, flour, beef, &c. &c. in our possession, besides their sick and wounded to our mercy!" In their flight they destroyed the bridges, and obstructed the road by trees, baggage, &c. They were pursued as far as Chazy, but made one of the Duke of York's "retrograde movements" in such full gallop that the militia could not catch many of them. They were completely panic struck.

Thus has terminated one of the most formidable expeditions ever fitted out in America. If one disgrace can be balanced by another, Hu's surrender of Detroit is blotted from the catalogue, and the great commander in chief, Sir George Prevost, with Wellington's "invincibles," has carried the mark of dishonor from that miserable old man.

Congress of the United States.

On Monday the 19th, both houses of congress met at Washington city, according to proclamation of the president, and each formed a quorum, Mr. Gailard president of the senate pro tem.

On Tuesday the president's message was received and read, &c.

Wednesday, September 21. The following resolutions were offered by Mr. Fisk, of N. Y.

1. Resolved, That so much of the message of the president of the United States as relates to the subject of foreign affairs, be referred to a select committee.
2. Resolved, That so much as relates to our military establishment be referred to a select committee.
3. Resolved, That so much as relates to our naval establishment be referred to a select committee.
4. Resolved, That so much as relates to our revenue be referred to a select committee.
5. Resolved, That so much as relates to the classing and disciplining of the militia be referred to a select committee.

These resolutions having been severally concurred in,

The committee of the whole rose and reported the resolutions to the house.

Mr. Bradley, of Vt. offered the following amendment to the standing rules and orders of the house, assigning as a reason the distinctness and importance of the two subjects now confided to one committee.

"That, instead of the committee of commerce and manufactures, there shall be appointed two standing committees, the one to be stiled the committee of commerce, and the other the committee of manufactures, to consist of seven members each."

This motion lies on the table of course until the morrow.

The house adjourned.

SENATE.

Thursday, Sept. 22. Mr. Giles offered for consideration the following resolution, which lies on the table till to-morrow.

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to enquire into the state of the preparations for the defence of the city of Washington, and whether any further provisions by law be necessary for that object, with leave to report by bill or otherwise.

Friday, Sept. 23. Mr. Brent presented the petitions of the Washington Potomac Bridge Company, and of the Eastern Branch Bridge Company, praying remuneration for the losses sustained by them in the partial destruction of the same by order of the officers of the government during the late invasion of the city. Referred to Messrs. Brent, Giles and Tait.

The resolution yesterday offered by Mr. Giles relative to the defence of the district, was taken up and referred to the committee of military affairs.

So much of the message of the president as relates to our naval affairs, was referred to Messrs. Tait, Howell, Daggett, Fromentin and Morrow.

Mr. Giles laid upon the table the following resolution:

Resolved, That the president of the United be requested to cause to be laid before the senate such information in his possession, respecting the existing state of the relations between the United States and the continental powers of Europe, as he may deem not improper to be communicated.

Monday, Sept. 26. Mr. Roberts, of Pa. presented sundry resolutions of the burgesses and inhabitants of the borough of Lancaster, in the state of Pennsylvania, pledging themselves that suitable accommodations should be provided for the president and both houses of congress, and for other public offices, in case a removal thereof should be deemed expedient; and the resolutions were read.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

On motion of Mr. Fisk of Vt. it was resolved, that the committee on the judiciary be instructed to enquire into the expediency of making further provision by law for aiding and protecting the officers of the customs in the execution of their duty, and for preventing intercourse with the enemy.

Mr. Johnson of Ky. laid before the house a resolution to cause an enquiry into the capture of the city, &c. which was laid over until next day.

Friday, Sept. 23.—Mr. Johnson's resolution being called up, was, after some amendments and remarks adopted as follows:

"Resolved, That a committee be appointed to enquire into the causes of the success of the enemy in his recent enterprizes against the Metropolis, and the neighboring town of Alexandria, and into the manner in which the public buildings and property were destroyed, and the amount thereof, and that they have power to send for persons and papers.

After three ballots the rev. Obadiah Brown was appointed chaplain. Adj. until Monday.

Monday, Sept. 26. Mr. Fisk of N. Y. after some remarks on the necessity of having a safe and convenient place for the seat of government, &c. offered the following resolution—

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to enquire into the expediency of removing the seat of government during the present session of congress, to a place of greater security, and less inconvenience than the city of Washington; with leave to report by bill or otherwise.

The question on taking this resolution into consideration was decided as follows, by yeas and nays:

For consideration 79

Against it 37

The house having agreed to consider the resolution, a considerable debate ensued. The result was, that the resolution was agreed to as follows.

YEAS.—Messrs. Alexander, Alston, Anderson, Archer, Avery, Baylies of Mass. Bay, Bradbury, Bradley, Brigham, Brown, Caldwell, Champion, Clark, Comstock, Condit, Conard, Cox, Crawford, Crighton, Crouch, Dana, Davenport, Davis of Penn. Denoyelles, Desha, Duvall, Ely, Findley, Fisk of N. Y. Geddes, Gourdin, Grosvenor, Harris, Harburt, Ingersoll, Ingham, Irwin, Johnson of Ky. Kent of N. Y. King of Mass. L. Harris, Lovett, Lyle, M. L. an, Miller, Moffitt, Mosley, Murfree, Markat, Oakley, Piper, Post, John Reed, Rea, of Penn. Rich, Ruggles, Seybert, Sharp, Sherwood, Skinner, Stanford, Stockton, Sturges, Tannehill, Udree, Vos, Ward of Mass. Ward of N. J. Wharton, Wilcox, Winter—72.

NAYS.—Messrs. Barbour, Bayly of Va. Bowen, Burwell, Chappell, Culpepper, Cuthbert, Earle, Eppes, Farrow, Fisk of Vt. Forney, Forsyth, Franklin, Gaston, Gholson, Goodwyn, Griffin, Hall, Hanson, Hayes, Hawkins, Humphreys, Jackson of Virg. Kent of Md. Kent, Kershaw, King of N. C. Lewis, Lowndes, Macon, McCoy, McKim, Montgomery, Newton, Pearson, Pickens, Pleasants, Rhea of Tenn. Roa, of Va. Sage, Sevier, Smith of Virg. Strong, Stuart, Telfair, Troup, White, Wilson of Penn. Wright, Yancey—51.

A committee was accordingly ordered to be appointed.

The house adjourned a little after 3 o'clock.

Wednesday, Sept. 28.—Mr. Fisk, of Vt. after a few remarks, offered the following resolution:

Resolved That the committee on the public lands be instructed to enquire into the expediency of giving to each deserter from the British army during the present war, one hundred acres of the public lands, such deserter actually settling the same; and that the committee have leave to report by bill or otherwise.

The question on consideration was decided by yeas and nays—yeas 82, nays 45. It was afterwards amended so as to refer it to the military committee.

On the yeas and nays being ordered on the passage of the resolution an interesting debate occurred. Messrs. Oakley and Grosvenor of N. Y. opposing, and Messrs. Fisk of Vt. and Sharp of Ky. supporting the resolution. The former gentlemen considered it an unusual and dangerous precedent; but the latter gentlemen supported it in practice and referred to Wellington's conduct in Spain, in offering twelve crowns to deserters from the French, &c. It was passed 80 to 55.

Mr. Hawkins, of Ky. with some observations to the point, offered the following:

Resolved, That the thanks of the United States States in congress assembled, be presented to generals Brown, Scott and Gaines, and their companions in fame.

Resolved, That general Brown be requested to communicate to the other officers and soldiers under his command the thanks of the United States in congress, and the high sense of gratitude entertained for victories so splendid achieved in contests so unequal.

Laid over until Monday next.

MISCELLANEOUS.

ADM. COCHRANE'S LAST LETTER.—A message was received from the president of the United States by both houses of congress Sept. 26, transmitting the letter of adm. Cochrane and Mr. Monroe's reply, which we have already published, (see Register page 17) and also the following letter, concluding the correspondence, which has not before been published. These papers were ordered to be printed.

Vice-admiral Cochrane to the secretary of state.

His B. M. ship Tonnant, in the Chesapeake, Sept. 19, 1814.

SIR—I had the honor to receive your letter of the 6th inst. this morning, in reply to the one which I addressed to you from the Patuxent.

As I have no authority from my government to enter upon any kind of discussion relative to the points contained in your letter, I have only to regret that there does not appear to be any hope that I shall be authorised to recal my general order; which has been further sanctioned by a subsequent request from lieutenant-general sir George Prevost.

A copy of your letter will this day be forwarded by me to England, and until I receive instructions from my government the measures which I have adopted must be persisted in; unless remuneration be made to the inhabitants of the Canadas for the injuries they have sustained from the outrages committed by the troops of the United States.

I have the honor to be, &c.

ALEX. COCHRANE,

Vice-adm. and commander in chief, &c. &c.

Hon. James Monroe, secretary of state.

FROM THE SOUTH. A letter received at Philadelphia from New Orleans, dated August 22, says—An express has just arrived to capt. Patterson, informing that the British had arrived at and taken possession of Mobile. It has excited great alarm here.

And the National Intelligencer, of Saturday last, observes—We learn that information reached Nashville, by express, on the 9th inst. that the enemy had landed a body of troops, said to consist of 6000 men, at Pensacola in East Florida. The troops under the command of gen. Jackson were expected to march in that direction.

FROM NASHVILLE WHIG, EXTRA, September 9.

An express arrived here this morning from general Jackson, with the following important information.

Head-quarters, 7th military district, Mobile, August 27, 1814.

SIR—By an express sent from Pensacola as well as from Antonio Callina, a citizen of that place who left there yesterday at 12 o'clock, bringing with him the pass of colonel Nicholas, the British officer commanding there, for his protection, I have received information, which may be implicitly relied on, that three British vessels, the Hermes, Orpheus and Carolan, arrived at Pensacola on the 25th inst. and on yesterday disembarked an immense quantity of arms, ammunition, munitions of war, and provisions—and marched into the Spanish fort between two and three hundred troops. That thirteen sail of the line with a large number of transports are daily expected at that place, with ten thousand troops.

The Havana papers received there state, that fourteen sail of the line had arrived at Bermuda. It is currently reported in Pensacola, that the emperor of Russia has ordered his Britannic majesty 50,000 of his best troops for the conquest of Louisiana, and that this territory will fall a prey to the enemy before the expiration of one month. Sir J. Fatbridge and captain Pigot, are the naval commanders. Spain is said by a secret treaty to have ceded Pensacola to Great Britain.

You will immediately perceive the necessity of being on the alert, and taking time by the forelock. I have, therefore to request that you, without delay, cause to be organized, equipped and brought into the field, the whole of the quota of the militia of your state, agreeable to the requisition of the war department of the 4th of July last.

Colonel Robert Butler, my adjutant-general, is now in your state, and has been instructed to make the necessary arrangements for transporting provisioning and bringing to head-quarters these troops, as well as to prescribe their route. You will have them furnished with all the arms within your reach.

Those who cannot be furnished by you, will receive them here; but reliance must not be had on that if to be avoided.

I am, respectfully,

ANDREW JACKSON.

His excellency Willie Blount, governor of Tennessee.

THE NIAGARA FRONTIER. Scraps.—Several thousand (say three to five) militia had crossed or were about to cross at Buffalo [volunteers] to assist general Brown in some great enterprise. Some of them went over as early as the 11th September. Desertions are frequent from the enemy's camp—Drummond appears in a "bad way." Some troops have lately reinforced our army from Erie, Penn. in the United States' brig Niagara, &c. and more were expected. Lieut. col. Wilecks, of the Canadian volunteers, was killed in one of the late skirmishes near fort Erie, which happened almost every day, until Brown's gallant attack on the enemy's works. In a skirmish on the 14th, the British lost thirty men, we none; and under cover of the enemy's fire twenty more deserted—during that week sixty deserters had come in. The enemy appears greatly disheartened by the difficulties that encompass him.

General Izard was embarking at Sackett's harbor, on the 18th, supposed for the head of the lake. Great gusts of wind had retarded the expedition for some few days. Chauncey had left the blockade of Kingston to aid this purpose. It is expected the whole may have sailed on the 20th. Our brigs had also arrived from the head of the lake, in consequence of the gale. They suffered no loss, except that the Jefferson, captain Ridgeley, was compelled to throw a few guns overboard. The enemy's new ship at Kingston is launched, and had her masts in, but cannot be ready for some considerable time. Chauncey had been in Kingston harbor, and greatly alarmed sir James. We may daily expect important tidings.

BROWN'S THIRD EXPLOIT!

Extract of a letter from general Brown to general Gaines, dated Head-quarters, Fort Erie, Sept. 18th, 1814.

"My dear general—The sortie which had been meditated was ordered yesterday. It succeeded. We carried the enemy's batteries; destroyed his battering cannon; and blew up a strong new work.

which he had erected, with a view of demolishing fort Erie. He resisted manfully, but was promptly overpowered. We have about four hundred prisoners. The enemy's loss cannot be less than eight hundred men.

Again, we have to lament the loss of many gallant officers. Our loss is not very numerous, and our strength is but little impaired. General Ripley is badly wounded. Colonel Gibson and colonel Wood are killed; colonel Aspinwall has lost an arm.

Another letter states the capture of a number of British officers, and that 39 deserters from the enemy came in on the night of the 17th inst.

Copy of a letter from major general Brown to the secretary of war, dated Head-quarters, Fort Erie, September 18th, 1814.

SIR—I have the satisfaction to announce to you a brilliant achievement yesterday, effected by the forces under my command. A sortie was made upon the enemy batteries. These were carried—we blew up his principal work, destroying his battering pieces, and captured 400 prisoners. The enemy resisted our assault with firmness, but suffered greatly. His total loss cannot be less than 800 men.

In such a business we could not but expect to lose many valuable lives; they were offered up a voluntary sacrifice to the safety and honor of this army and the nation.

I will forward to you the particulars of this splendid affair, with a return of the killed and wounded, in the course of a few days.

Very respectfully, your humble servant,
JACOB BROWN.

Honorable secretary of war.

FURTHER PARTICULARS.

Copy of a letter from J. B. Varnum, juny. esq. to his friend in Washington city, dated Buffalo, September 19, 1814.

DEAR SIR—We have had another battle on this frontier. The greater part of our forces sallied out from their works, at fort Erie, on the afternoon of the 17th inst. for the purpose of destroying the enemy's batteries, that were nearly ready to open a deadly fire upon our works and army. Two out of three of the most important batteries were carried, after a severe conflict of more than two hours. The guns and carriages were destroyed, besides a large quantity of ammunition—near four hundred prisoners were taken; and among them twelve officers.

The enemy's total loss must have exceeded eight hundred men—while ours was comparatively small, except in officers. We have to lament the loss of several valuable officers. Colonel Gibson, lieutenant colonel Wood, captain Hale and captain Armistead of the regular army, killed. General Ripley, colonel Aspinwall, major Trimble, and several other officers wounded. General Davis of the militia killed, general Porter and several other officers wounded. The enemy's loss will probably induce him to raise the siege. Six pieces of battering artillery were destroyed; among them was a sixty eight pound carronade. The sortie was very brilliant, and succeeded much better than could have been anticipated.

I am yours, &c. J. B. VARNUM.

A. Bradley, Jun. esq.

P. S. I was over at the fort during the action, and was not able to come over to this place until late last evening, owing to the roughness of the lake. The prisoners have not yet come over. Major Vilette, who was formerly a prisoner, and a major De Winter, are among them.

Colonel Fisher, a lieutenant colonel, and a major of the British army, are all ascertained to have been killed. J. B. V.

NEGOCIATION. We have nothing certain from Europe as to what is doing towards negotiation. We incline to believe that the British will not yet attend the conference proposed by themselves! They are crazy with their successes in Europe; and must let blood to reduce the fever of their ambition.—News, however, may soon be expected from Europe. In the mean time, let us prepare for every thing that the great power of an unprincipled enemy can do.

TREASURY REPORT. We exceedingly regret the necessity that forbids the insertion of Mr. Secretary Campbell's report. But it must lay over for our next. He states a deficit of 11 millions, and proposes new sources of revenue. It is interesting, and very important. "With a great price purchased I this freedom," (of Rome) said the captain to Paul—with a great price did we purchase independence; and with a great price must it be preserved.

The Fox of Portsmouth, has captured, and sent into Salem, the transport ship Stranger, from England for Quebec, laden with 66 pieces of cannon (44 32's, and 22 24's) 300 boxes ammunition, and a great quantity of blankets, &c. intended to supply the enemy's fleet on Ontario. If the guns are for the large ship, as is expected, it may delay her sailing this season. We are happy, very happy, in an acquaintance with this very valuable Stranger.

☞ The Stranger was separated from her convoy in a storm. In the fleet were four ordnance ships, and two of them founded—one is our's.

THE ENEMY IN THE CHESAPEAKE.

Since his repulse at Baltimore the enemy has impatiently laid about the Patuxent, without doing any thing to give us an idea of his intentions. From Norfolk, of the date of the 23d inst. we have the following:—"Last evening, at 5 o'clock, of the enemy's ships there went to sea, one 74, one frigate and two brigs; one 74 went out in the morning—remain in Lynhaven this morning, a raze and two tenders."

☞ We learn from Head-Quarters "That the two last ships of the enemy left the Patuxent on Thursday last and stood down the bay."

☞ We were able only a little to anticipate the regular time of publication—musterings and guard duties taking off our hands. We aim to publish another number next Wednesday. A very formidable quantity of important matter, of almost every description, lies over. At this time we had rather publish supplements than be in arrears, but cannot. Among the articles postponed, some that relate to Baltimore have much local and general interest. We have also a great prize list for the month.

CHRONICLE.

As in every other department, we have a great body of matter belonging to this, lying over. The strangest feature in our European intelligence is the elopement of the Princess Charlotte of Wales (heir apparent to the British throne) with a young nobleman, the earl of Arran, to France, where they have been married. If this be true, and we hope it is, it will produce a precious uproar in England. The principle, "that the king can do no wrong," we believe, applies to this wonton girl, as the heir apparent! "Legitimate sovereigns !!!"—What stuff is royalty!—How debased the Guelphs!—Such a family is not to be found on the face of the earth for stupidity and vice.

GEORGE WASHINGTON CAMPBELL, in consequence of long and increasing indisposition, produced by a severe and incessant devotion to official duties, has resigned the office of secretary of the treasury.

JAMES MONROE, late secretary of state, is appointed by the President, with the concurrence of the Senate, secretary for the department of war.

Destruction of the Navy Yard.

COMMODORE TINGEY'S REPORT

Extracts of a letter from commodore Tinge to the secretary of the navy, dated

Navy-yard, Washington, 27th August 1814.

SIR—After receiving your orders of the 24th, directing the public shipping, stores, &c. at this establishment, to be destroyed in case of the success of the enemy over our army; no time was lost in making the necessary arrangements for firing the whole, and preparing boats for departing from the yard, as you had suggested.

About 4 P. M. I received a message by an officer from the secretary of war, with information that he "could protect me no longer." Soon after this, I was informed that the conflagration of the Eastern branch bridge had commenced—and, in a few minutes, the explosion announced the blowing up of that part, near the "draw," as had been arranged in the morning.

The intended fate of the yard had before been publicly announced to the neighbours, in order that they might take every possible precaution for the safety of themselves, families and property.

Immediately several individuals came in succession, endeavoring to prevail on me to deviate from my instructions—which they were invariably informed was unavailing, unless they could bring me your instructions in writing, countermanding those previously given.

A deputation also of the most respectable women came on the same errand—when I found myself painfully necessitated to inform them, that any farther importunities would cause the matches to be instantly applied to the trains—with assurance however that, if left at peace, I would delay the execution of the orders so long as I could feel the least shadow of justification. Captain Creighton's arrival at the yard, with the men who had been with him at the bridge (probably about 5 o'clock) would have justified me in instant operation—but he also was strenuous in the desire to obviate the intended destruction; and volunteered to ride out, and gain me positive information as to the position of the enemy, under the hope that our army might have rallied and repulsed them. I was myself indeed desirous of delay, for the reason that the wind was then blowing fresh from the S. S. W. which would most probable have caused the destruction of all the private property north and east of the yard, in its neighbourhood, being of opinion also, that the close of the evening would bring with it a calm, in which happily we were not disappointed. Other gentlemen, well mounted, volunteered, as captain Creighton had done, to go out and bring me posilive intelligence of the enemy's situation, if possible to obtain it.

The evening came, and I waited with much anxiety the return of captain Creighton having almost continual information, that the enemy were in the neighbourhood of the marine barracks—at the Capitol-hill—and that their "advance" was near Georgetown; I therefore determined to wait only until half past 8 o'clock, to commence the execution of my orders becoming apprehensive that captain Creighton had, from his long stay, fallen into the hands of the enemy. During this delay, I ordered a few marines and other persons who were then near me, to go off in one of the small galleys, which was done, and that boat is saved. Colonel Wharton had been furnished with a light boat, with which he left the yard, probably between 7 and 8 o'clock.

At twenty minutes past eight, captain Creighton returned; he was still extremely averse to the destruction of the property, but having informed him that your orders to me were imperative, the proper disposition of the boats being made, the matches were applied, and in a few moments the whole was in a state of irretrievable conflagration.

When about leaving the wharf, I observed the fire had also commenced at the works at Greenleaf's Point, and in the way out of the Branch we observed the Capitol on fire.

It had been my intention, not to leave the vicinity of the yard with my boat, during the night, but having capt. Creighton and other gentlemen with me, she was too much incumbered and over-laden, to render that determination proper. We therefore proceeded to Alexandria, in the vicinity of which I rested till the morning of the 25th, when we left Alexandria at half-past 7 o'clock, and proceeded again up to the yard, where I landed unmolested about a quarter before nine.

The schooner Lynx had laid alongside the burning wharf, still unhurt—hoping therefore to save her, we hauled her to the quarter of the hulk of the New York which had also escaped the ravages of the flames.

The detail issuing store of the navy store keeper, had remained safe from the fire during the night, which the enemy (being in force in the yard) about eight o'clock set fire to, and it was speedily consumed. It appeared that they had left the yard about half an hour when we arrived.

From the number and movements of the enemy, it would have appeared rash temerity, to have attempted returning again that day, though my inclination strongly urged it; therefore, reconnoitering their motions, as well as could be effected at a convenient distance in the gig, until evening, I again proceeded to Alexandria for the night.

Yesterday morning the 26th, it was impossible to form (from the various and contradictory reports at Alexandria) any sort of probable conjecture, either of the proceedings and situation of our army, or that of the enemy. Determining, therefore, to have a positive knowledge of some part thereof, from ocular demonstration, I again embarked in the gig, proceeding with due caution to the yard, where I learned with chagrin, devastation and pillage had commenced; and found also to my surprise that the old gun-boat, which had been loaded with provisions and had grounded in endeavoring to get out of the Branch, on the evening of the 24th was nearly discharged of her cargo, by a number of our people, without connexion with each other.

If, having landed in the yard, I soon ascertained that the enemy had left the city, excepting only a sergeant's guard, for the security of the sick and wounded. Finding it impracticable to stop the scene of plunder that had commenced, I determined instantly on repossessing the yard with all the force at my command; repairing therefore immediately to Alexandria, lieutenant Haraden, the ordinary men and the few marines there were ordered directly up, following myself, and got full possession again at evening.

I am now collecting the scattered purloined provisions, ready for your orders presuming they will now become very scarce indeed;—the quantity saved you shall be informed of when known to me.

The Lynx is safe, except her foremast being carried away in the storm of the 25th, about 4 P. M. We have also another of the gun-boats with about 100 barrels of powder; and one of the large yard-cutters, nearly full with the filled cylinders, for our different guns previously mounted. The powder of these however is probably much wetted by the storm.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, sir, your obedient servant,

T. TINGEY.

Honorable William Jones, secretary of the navy.

Enemy in the Chesapeake.

In the greater events which have latterly transpired, and the more extensive desolations that have happened since the following articles were in type, a considerable part of their present interest is lost, yet the contain many facts that ought to be known and preserved.

On the Patuxent.—The following articles are copied from the Federal Republican of the 26th and 27th Aug. They present a tolerably distinct account of the late proceedings of the enemy in the Patuxent. We have omitted only some political remarks:

"On Saturday admiral Cockburn, with 1200 marines, and about 400 sailors, landed on the farm of John Kilgour, esq. at the mouth of St. Clement's bay. Mr. Kilgour had repaired to camp, leaving a young infant with his sisters, (Mrs. Kilgour is lately dead.) Anxious about the fate of his sisters and children, he obtained a furlough and hurried home. In a few minutes after his arrival, the enemy debarked at his landing, treated him with respect, declaring that they must have stock. They took from him 20 head of cattle, 21 sheep, much poultry, and some vegetables. During their stay, admiral Cockburn remarked that he should respect private buildings, unless fired on by the militia from them; that he should take no citizen unless found in arms; that reinforcements had arrived that morning; and that he should immediately pay Washington a visit. He left in the room occupied by the officers, $305 in silver. Mr. Kilgour immediately informed general Stuart of these occurrences. Mr. Kilgour asked permission to count the marines. It was granted him."

"On last Wednesday week a detachment from the enemy's shipping in the Patuxent, in pursuit of stock, landed at Mr. Benedict Heard's in St. Mary's. Lieutenant-colonel Ashton immediately detached in pursuit of them captain Blackstone's rifle corps and captain Brown's company of infantry. The enemy discovered them and retreated with great precipitation to their barges. On the next day they burnt every house on the land, all of which had been recently repaired—his loss is estimated at upwards of four thousand dollars. On Saturday the Severn, a new ship, built last year of fir, carrying 56 guns, commanded by captain Nourse, the Bruin, a troop ship, with 350 marines, carrying 16 guns, a bomb-ship, carrying 10 guns, with four small captured sloops, ascending the Patuxent as high as Sheudan's Point, about eight miles below Benedict. On Sunday they ascended as high as God's Grace, the property of the late George Mackall, when they debarked nearly 500 men, and demanded about 20 hogsheads of tobacco, belonging to Mr. Billingsly, the late tenant, and which they carried off, except three hogsheads, which they gave to an overseer or tenant of doctor Bell's. From thence they marched about 350 marines to Huntington, nearly seven miles, where they burnt the warehouse. Upon their return, some of their men were so much exhausted as to render it necessary for them to be moved in ox carts.

"On Tuesday they landed a very considerable force and marched to Calvert Court House, which, with the gaol, they destroyed. On Monday the shipping (except the detachment in the Patuxent) disappeared from the mouth of the Patuxent, and a heavy force appeared off Britton's Bay on Monday night. On Tuesday morning they landed, near Newtown, a heavy force, which marched to the right of Leonardtown, another to the left, and a third, commanded by admiral Cockburn, landed at the warehouse, and took possession of Leonardtown. The two flank parties, it is stated, reached the rear of the town a few minutes after the barges reached the landing. Their whole force in this expedition was estimated at about 1500 men. During their stay in the village, which was till about 2 o'clock, they behaved with great politeness to the ladies, respected private property wherever the proprietors remained at home, destroyed about 100 bbls. of supplies belonging to colonel Carberry's regiment, the whole of Mr. Haislip's store, and the furniture, clothing and bedding of captains Forrest and Millard, all of whom had left town. They got possession of some muskets belonging to the state, which they broke to pieces, saying they were only fit to stick frogs with. Mrs. Thomson and Miss Eliza Key were very instrumental in saving the court-house, stating that it was sometimes a place for divine worship. On Thursday a detachment of about 500, exclusive of sailors, landed from the Patuxent shipping near Trent Hall. The sailors were armed with boarding pikes and cutlasses (for the cavalry.) They ascended into the country in quest of a quantity of tobacco, and other property belonging to Mr. W. Kilgour, which he had removed about three miles to a Mr. Alvey's, as a place of safety. The property was in a barn and covered with Alvey's wheat, this they deliberately removed for some time; they at length became tired and rolled out four hogsheads of tobacco, which they gave Alvey as an equivalent for the remaining wheat and a saddle they took from him—the barn was then burnt with all the tobacco. They then under the direction of a negro of Mr. Kilgour's, who had gone to them, patiently selected the bacon and other things belonging to him, and denied to Mrs. Kilgour, who was there, even a small portion of necessaries for her immediate use, saying that they had determined to destroy every thing which they should find, which had been removed by the proprietors; that they would act otherwise where they remained at home. They found eight hogsheads of tobacco concealed in the woods near the water, which they carried off with a great deal of stock. Mr. Kilgour's loss is ruinous. As soon as general Stuart received intelligence that the enemy were landing, he moved with his whole force in pursuit of them. He arrived at High Hill where he saw the enemy's barges prepared to cover the retreat of the men over the plain, and a frigate with her broadside ready for the same object. He could not receive any intelligence of the course they had taken till it was disclosed by the smoke ascending from Alvey's barn. To get between them and their shipping he must necessarily have exposed his force to a galling fire from their shipping, and give their infantry the advantage of a high commanding situation; to get in their front, so as to annoy them in their retreat, he must have taken a circuitous route of seven miles. Independent of all this, his force was much inferior to that of their's; he therefore returned to his encampment; he has ordered out all of his brigade. On Friday the enemy's vessels left their station at Benedict. A deserter states their object to be Annapolis; that admiral Cochrane has arrived; that they have neither barges nor vessels; that at present Barney's force is too formidable for them; that the Severn only draws thirteen feet of water, was built for the American station; that a very heavy land force is expected—that the bomb vessel only draws ten feet. No part of St. Mary's county is deemed secure; the inhabitants are removing their cattle and negroes to the interior; their crops are abandoned."

Extract to the editor, dated Wicomico river, St. Mary's county, Aug. 14.

"The British landed at Leonard Town, in this county, the 19th of last month; and, out of curiosity, I visited the town next day. Every housekeeper was plundered except one—to the court-house they did great injury; not a sash or pane of glass but what they destroyed; much of the inside work cut to pieces; all the tobacco, about 70 hds. carried off, and property belonging to individuals and the United States, to the amount of 4,000 dollars. Although admiral Cockburn gave to some of the inhabitants a guard, yet his men plundered almost within reach of the guards' muskets. The admiral and his officers, I hear, conducted themselves politely to a Mr. Key and his daughter, and to most of the inhabitants; in this way they were honorably remunerated for the loss and destruction of their property—no houses were burnt. On the 30th, the same worthy body of men landed at Chaptico, in this county—(except a few that the Virginia militia killed and wounded when they landed near Namony on the 20th and 21st) In this little village they got about 30 hds. of tobacco and no other plunder; the inhabitants having removed all their property out of their grasp. Yet here they made a most furious attack on every window, door, and pane of glass in the village; not one was left in the whole; the place was given up to the fury of their men, and if the prince regent had commanded in person, the victory and destruction could not have been more complete. They picked their stolen geese in the church—dashed the pipes of the church-organ on the pavement; opened a family vault in the church-yard, broke open the coffins, stirred the bones about with their hands in search of hidden treasure—all this in the presence of their worthy admiral. During all this havoc, not a man was in arms within fifteen miles of them, and they worked until ten o'clock at night, before they got the tobacco on board their vessels, owing to the shallowness of the creek that leads up to Chaptico warehouse, they rolled more than half the tobacco one mile. General Stuart was encamped with the militia near sixteen miles from these free-booters: I presume he is waiting for a regular field action with the British. He has no confidence in our trees and bushes, as our militia had in the revolutionary war."

[American.]

From the Alexandria Herald, July 24.—It is ascertained that admiral Cockburn was at Leonardtown in person, and sanctioned every species of plunder—such articles as were not carried off were destroyed—the doors and windows of the houses were broken, &c. After doing all the damage they could, short of burning, they went to the Virginia shore, burnt the dwellings of five widows and several others on the shore; burnt every building at Namony Ferry, and plundering the country round of every kind of provisions, and carried off a great many negroes. The militia of Spottsylvania had marched en masse to the relief of their fellow-citizens below.

The Eastern Coast.

On the 1st of September, ultimo, the depredators, under admiral Giffith and the governor of Nova Scotia, sir John Sherbrooke, having under him general Robinson, with about 40 sail of vessels and several thousand troops, (reported from 3 to 7,000) entered the Penobscot. The small garrison in the fort at Castine discharged their guns, blew up the fort and retired. The enemy then took possession without opposition. They next sent 600 men to Belfast, which submitted. The following day they proceeded up the river to Hampden, where the Adams frigate laid, distant 35 miles. Capt. Morris prepared himself to receive them as well as he could, by landing his guns and erecting batteries. A considerable militia force had by this time assembled;—but they disgracefully fled on the approach of the enemy.—He therefore, after a few fires, spiked his guns, burnt his stores and prize goods, and blew up the ship.—He and his crew escaped. If the militia had stood, he would have beat off the enemy. They evacuated Belfast, &c. on the 7th ult. with the avowed design of proceeding against Portland and Portsmouth, &c. It seems their fixed intention to destroy particularly our shipping. Chagrined beyond measure at the triumphs of our navy, they vainly strive to prevent future disgrace by capturing empty hulks. It is estimated that they took 120 vessels in the Penobscot, of all descriptions. Captain Morris had arrived at Boston.—His crew are chiefly at Portsmouth. He was the last man on board of his vessel, and is said to have made his escape, after firing the train, by swimming.

It is stated that at Castine there were 24 thirty-two pounders; 14 of which were designed for the new fort erecting at Portland. The British troops that landed had belonged to Wellington's army; having each a medal in evidence of serving under him. The militia in great numbers were pushing to the sea-board. 8,000 were collected at Portland, and the other towns on the coast were filling with them. But the enemy expresses the utmost contempt for them, and expects to possess himself of all the Massachusetts and Maine ports in six weeks to destroy the shipping. The fleet consists of 3 74's, 3 frigates, 3 sloops of war and a schooner, besides the transport vessels; and they talk of reinforcements. Many of their troops appear to be Germans, probably the better to secure themselves against desertion. They plundered many houses, and threatened to burn the several little towns, such as Frankfort and Bangor, if provisions were not liberally supplied. At the latter place were some vessels on the stocks; the firing of these might have destroyed the village; so the people conditioned to launch and deliver them at Castine!—They took what they pleased, and done what they liked; and left the Penobscot about the 8th inst. going westward. The river was covered with burning vessels.

By the following proclamations it will be seen that all the towns east of the Penobscot are declared British colonies. All persons passing east or west from below Belfast must report themselves or be stopped.

A PROCLAMATION,

By lieutenant general sir John Coape Sherbrooke, K. B. commanding a body of his Britannic majesty's land forces, and Edward Griffith, esq. rear admiral of the White, commanding a squadron of his majesty's ships, now arrived in the Penobscot.

Whereas it is the intention of the British commanders to take possession of the country lying between the Penobscot river and Passamaquoddy bay, the peaceable inhabitants of that district are hereby informed, that if they remain quietly at their respective homes, and carry on their usual occupations, every protection will be afforded therein, so long as they shall comply with such regulations as may be established for their conduct and guidance by the authority of the commanders.

All persons taken in arms employed in conveying intelligence to the enemy, or in assisting him in any way shall be treated accordingly.

Such of the inhabitants as may wish to avail themselves of the terms offered in the preceding part of the Proclamation, will be required to give up their arms, and to demean themselves in a quiet peaceable manner; and those who may be willing to supply the British force, with provisions, &c. will be regularly paid for the articles furnished, and shall receive every encouragement and protection in so doing.

By command, CHARLES MARTYR, naval secretary.
J. F. ADDISON, military secretary

PROCLAMATION.

By lieutenant general sir John Coape Sherbrooke, K. B. Commanding a body of his Britannic majesty's forces, and Edward Griffith, esq. rear admiral of the White, commanding a squadron of his majesty's ships now arrived in the Penobscot.

This is to certify unto all persons whom it may concern that the municipal laws as established by the American government for the maintenance of peace and tranquility in that part of the district of Maine lying between the Penobscot river and Passamaquoddy bay will continue in force until further orders, and the civil magistrates are permitted to execute the laws as heretofore, and shall be supported in so doing.

By command, T. F. ADDISON, military secretary.
CHARLES MARTYR, naval secretary.

On these proclamations the Boston Palladium has this article:

INCREASE OF APPETITE.

When the war commenced the enemy promised to respect Eastport; but they took it, and then declared they meant to trouble no place to the westward of it. They have however now taken Castine, and claim all from Passamaquoddy to Penobscot, but utter assurances that they mean to molest no other part of Maine; and these assurances will probably be found as sincere as former ones.

The territory between Penobscot and Passamaquoddy, which the governor and admiral from Nova Scotia have, by proclamation, declared their intention to take possession of, and have commenced by occupying Castine, includes about forty towns belonging to the state of Massachusetts. Among these towns are Addison, with about 400 inhabitants, Calais 400, Cherryfield 200, Columbia 500, Harrington 500, Jonesborough 600, Michias 1600, Stuben 600, Lubec, Robinson, Bluehill 700, Buckstown 1500, Castine 1100, Deerisle 1600, Eden 700, Frankfort 1500, Gorrington 1400, Sadgwick 1400, Islesborough 600, M. Desert 1100, Trenton 600, Sullivan 800, Goldsborough 600, Penobscot 1400, &c.

Acushan and some other towns have also been taken, but have not yet received particulars.

Eastport is under military law. The following was posted there about the 25th ult.

Province of New-Brunswick in council, 13th August 1814.—His honor the president having submitted to the consideration of the council the present state of the inhabitants of Moose Island, [Eastport] under the articles of capitulation, and the subsequent proclamations issued here by sir Thomas Hardy and colonel Pilkington, dated 14th July, 1814; and the expediency of extending to those inhabitants all the rights and privileges of British subjects.

It is the opinion of this council, that it is not expedient at present to extend to them all the rights and privileges of British subjects: but that they should be left under the control of the military authority, pursuant to the articles of capitulation and the proclamation above mentioned, until further instructions on this subject are received from his majesty's ministers.

(Signed) J. ODELL,
Secretary of the Province of New-Brunswick.

Salem, Sept. 21.—The British ship Leander, sir Geo. Collier, appeared off Gallops Folly, yesterday forenoon, and sent three barges full of men into the Cove, who were repelled by about 50 men who had assembled from the vicinity, with muskets and one six pounder and the barges returned to the ship after exchanging several fires. A barge with a flag was then sent from the ship with a letter, of which the following is a copy:—

"Leander, Tuesday, 1 o'clock, P. M.

"Sir George Collier, believes the boat on shore a fisherman. He desires to examine her without recourse to arms, and if objected to he will land and destroy every house within two miles of the cove.—This the inhabitants may rely upon.

G. COLLIER."

Lieut. col. Appleton, who had by this time assembled the Cape Ann regiment, and had about 600 men under arms, received the note and returned the following answer:

"Tuesday, half past 2 o'clock.

"Sir Geo. Collier, sir—You have permission to examine the boat now lying at the wharf in this cove. This is permitted without reference to the threat connected with your request, which is such as was not to be expected from a British commander.

"J. APPLETON, Lieut. Col."

The boat was accordingly examined but nothing found in her, and the barges returned to the ship.

The enemy's threatening Boston. They who are in the bay talk of a force of 15,000 men to effect a landing at Cape Cod or Cape Ann. They have destroyed many small vessels. The following recapitulation of their infamous proceedings is from a Boston paper of the 20th Sept.

"A very respectable gentleman from Sandwich, Cape Cod, has brought information that on Thursday last the British ships Spencer, commodore Raggett, Leander, Sir George Collier, and Nymph anchored off Wellfleet and sent a flag on shore with a demand of $2000 as a ransom for their fishing vessels, and that in case it was not paid they should be destroyed.

A demand was sent to East am for the bedding, &c. which had been before demanded, taken on board the tender of the Leander cast away some time ago.

A committee on behalf of the town was sent on board the Leander, with information that the articles demanded were in the keeping of the deputy marshal at Barnstable, and that it was not in their power to restore them. They were told nevertheless that if every article found on board the tender, and $10 cash for each seaman for having been obliged to lie without their bedding, and $1200 as a ransom the salt works were not delivered at Provincetown in the course of this month, the town and the salt works should be destroyed.

A committee of the town of Brewster was likewise despatched on board the commodore's ship, of whom a ransom of $4000 was demanded for the salt works—an answer to be given on Monday. A town meeting was called, and it was voted that the ransom should be paid.

The commander of the Nymph threatened to destroy Burstable, in consequence of the insult which he said was offered to his lieutenant who was lately sent on shore to demand the effects taken in the tender. He also declared that all works of public utility in the cape towns must be ransomed or they would be destroyed. There were on board the ships 500 marines, and seven cannon mounted on travelling carriages.

An agent has been despatched to this town by the inhabitants of Eastham, with a petition to the district judge, that he may order the seized articles to be restored.

A flag was seen going into Orleans on Sunday, probably with a similar message to the preceding, to that town.

Letter from Sir George R. Collier.

H. B. M. ship Leander, Sept. 21.

"GENTLEMEN—I have to inform you that all the fishing on the banks is prohibited, every vessel curing fish or having salt on board for that purpose will be destroyed.

"Small vessels with fresh fish only will in future be permitted to proceed into the harbors of this coast.

"You are required to give this publicity, as I shall destroy all vessels I meet with curing fish, or vessels exceeding 30 tons in or near the offing.

"I am sir your obedient servant,

"GEO. R. COLLIER captain.

"To the selectmen of Portsmouth and vicinity."

Sir John Sherbooke has returned to Halifax. The eastern people, touched to the quick by the outrages of the enemy, begin to have a "notion" that an invasion of New-Brunswick might have a good effect in checking the incursions of the foe. This would be sound policy in every respect—and if the thing were taken up heartily, the British might soon be routed from the whole country, "Wellington's invincibles" to the contrary notwithstanding; who seem likely to have enough to do with Brown, Izard and Macomb. It would not be straining probability to say that one third of all the British reinforcements that have arrived in the present year, are already lost to the enemy's strength. They are mere mortals—the heroes of Niagara have proved it, if proof were wanting.

On the 21 ult. the greater part of the enemy's force collected at Castine, embarked for some new expedition—their land troops are stated at 1200; they have taken on board a number of horses.

Recently omitted Scraps.

Copy of a letter from colonel Hawkins, agent for Indian affairs, to his excellency the governor of Georgia, dated "Creek Agency, August 23, 1814.

"Gen. Jackson terminated his negotiations with the Creeks on the 9th. The line of limits drawn for them is Crossa river, with a reserve of two miles square for Fort Williams, to the falls seven miles above Fort Jackson, thence eastward to a point two miles north of Gakfuskee (a large creek three miles below Autucose on the east side of Tlapoosa) thence across Tlapoosa to the mouth of the creek, and up the same ten miles in a direct line. Thence to Chattohoche and across it at the mouth of Sammochee, the first large creek below Okefetyocoonie (about 68 miles north of the confluence of Chattohoche) thence east to Georgia, with an eventual reserve to accommodate the Kinnards.

"We continue to receive daily rumours of hostile appearances at Appalatchicola. Ten British armed vessels off that coast; have manœuvred dexterously by landing and re-embarking their crews, to deceive the Indians in that neighborhood. They furnished considerable munitions of war, and some clothing, and are training the Indians and some  for purposes hostile to us.

"We have from a credible Indian source the following from a British naval officer, to the hostile chiefs:

"The British and other powers had conquered France and seven powers were now united against AMERICA. A little before white frost, you will hear of smoke all around the United States in the sea ports, and the burning of powder. The War is just beginning.—There will be several armies landing in different places. His king, George, said the seven powers would be able, and were determined to CONQUER AMERICA, and the British would be masters of it. They need not expect to be deceived; the British would fulfil their promises, and NEVER LEAVE THIS LAND A MIN.

"The Indians who recently committed a violent outrage below Hartford, were from the banditti assembling under British influence; there were four of them. As I have some confidential people among them, one of whom will probably be here in a week, I expect some interesting details to our present stock, which I shall communicate to you.

I am, respectfully, sir, your obedient servant,

BENJN. HAWKINS.

Governor EARLY.

From other sources that appear worthy of entire credit, it appears that the Spaniards at Pensacola are more than passive instruments in the hands of the merciless British, to raise the tomahawk in the south. There are many Indians at that place, dressed in British uniforms, and exercised by British officers, &c. Much bloodshed must be expected in that quarter. If the truce and treaty that Jackson has lately made with the Creeks, is broken, we shall not probably ever hear of another. How cruel is it in Englishmen to bring about the extermination of this race; for exterminated they certainly will be, if they do not cease their murders. They were a happy and contented people, cultivating their farms and manufacturing, until the British, like he devil in Eden, tempted them to evil. They have already paid a dreadful penalty for their folly and weakness—but the end is not yet. They still listen to the deceiver. Inhuman Englishmen! let the poor savage have peace. Wretched murderers! permit us in safety to spare the remnant of the Creeks! Monsters, let them return to that progressive state of civilization we fostered with so much charity, justice, and good faith. One lesson of practical christianity, is worth all your regiments of canting "Bible Societies," headed by such men as George or Frederick Guelf.

THE ENEMY. Gen. Jackson's letter (page 47) reports that the British said they expected 50,000 Russians, to assist in conquering the United States. A person who was captured by the Wolverine sloop of war, on a voyage from Charleston to New York, was informed by the captain that the British government would demand Louisiana, the Floridas, and a part of Maine—and that if the war should continue, Russia was under obligations to furnish two hundred thousand men to coerce them.

Another report says, that a reinforcement of 10,000 British had actually arrived at Bermuda.—The "season of lying" seems just beginning!! There is no reason to believe or suppose either of those.

PRISONERS. There are cause to expect that it is the design of the Goths to send all the prisoners they take to England, even non-combatants and passengers! Alas! how rapidly is Great Britain sliding into finished barbarism.

HIS FORCE.—We believe that the full force of the enemy is now in his colonies and on our coasts, and that other reinforcements may not be expected this season from Europe, some ships to relieve others excepted. To fit out the Penobscot expedition, they hardly left troops enough at Halifax to guard the town. The men employed in that expedition are a mixture of Spaniards, Portuguese, Germans and British. The Halifax papers, however, still talk of Lord HILP's expected arrival.

CHARLESTON. The Goths talk of laying Charleston in ashes this winter; and expect soon to commence the siege of New York—as they say.

BALTIMORE. The gentle souls at Montreal, Halifax, &c. had heard of the capture of Washington City, but deferred their public rejoicings until the "poor Baltimoreans" were suitably chastised—which they looked upon as a certainty. They were also "out of their reckoning" as to Plattsburg, and will have as much cause for mourning as for rejoicing, at least!

New York.—25,500 men, we are told, can be brought in one place, in three hours, for the defence of the city of New York.

BOSTON.—The hills round Boston are covered with troops, and works of defence are erecting with great industry. The same remarks apply to other towns on the coast of Massachusetts. A town meeting was lately held at Boston, (present 3 to 4000 persons) at which measures of defence were resolved upon with great spirit.

THE MILITIA. The general orders of the governors of the several states, respecting the militia, &c. would occupy too much room for present insertion; but they may be recorded. The following brief notices will shew that all is activity. The governor of New Hampshire has ordered that the whole force of the state shall hold itself ready to march at a moment's warning; he also invites the exempts to prepare for the defence, and detaches a certain body of men for the protection of the seaboard, on account of "the recent depredations of the enemy." The governor of Massachusetts has issued a like order, and directs that the whole militia of the state shall march "as the laws of the United States or of that state shall require," in "consequence of the violations of our territory," &c. He also detaches a considerable force, and urges, very pointedly, vigilance to all. Connecticut, New York, New Jersey, and Pennsylvania, particularly the three last, are making great exertions to present a respectable force at every "assailable" point (see Cockrane's letter, page 17); Ohio and Kentucky are sending men to the north—in Maryland, Virginia, North and South Carolina and Georgia, all is on the alert; and Tennessee holds herself ready to meet the allies in the Creek country under her favorite Jackson. Vermont poured forth her strength on the Champlain frontier. In short, the whole nation seems roused to arms. The people of Virginia have come forward in such multitudes that the governor has dismissed thousands of them as unnecessary.

THE PATRIOTIC SPIRIT of the people of the United States, in all parts, is reaching the standard of '76. However pressed, there are no fears for the republic. All will be well. Instances of magnanimous exaction shall be noticed hereafter to the honor of both parties of our citizens.

THE FISHERIES. The British treaty with France was discussed in the British house of commons, June 29. Mr. Canning said, the interest of France was small in the Newfoundland Fisheries; but he wished the government to give those fisheries due consideration as to America. In our treaty of peace with that power, we gave away more than we ought—and we never now heard of that treaty, but as a trophy of victory on one hand, or the monument of degradation and shame on the other. We ought to recur in questions with America, to the state in which we now stand, rather than that in which we once stood.

Lord Castlereagh said he was fully aware of the importance of the Newfoundland fisheries.

MASSACHUSETTS. The legislature of this state was to convene at Boston on the 5th instant; called by the governor on account of events of a public and alarming nature that have recently occurred.

A SCOUNDREL CAUGHT. A letter from Stonington, dated Sept. 18, says—Yesterday afternoon the people of Mystic fitted out their captured barge, and hoisted British colors, for the purpose of decoying a sloop which was suspected to be aiding the enemy. They boarded her without exciting any suspicion, and the following dialogue ensued between the two captains:

"Barge—What are you doing?"

"Sloop—I have been supplying your commodore.

"Barge—With what?"

"Sloop—Soap, candles, onions, &c.

"Barge—Have you a pass?"

"Sloop—Yes; and produced it.

"Barge—This is a good pass to go into Mystic with. Make sail immediately!"

The captain of the sloop offered the barge a bill of sale of the sloop, and a present of 500 dollars; but they were rejected, and the vessel brought in. She is about 35 tons burthen, and belongs to the westward.

Mer. Adv.

VANDALISM.—About 300 negroes from the Chesapeake, arrived at Halifax on the 2nd ult. in an emaciated condition—30 had died on the passage, and four expired on the quay, at landing them. Among them were many women and children, one man 70 years old and blind. Nine hundred more were expected. Those able to work had been sent to the work-house. The people were dissatisfied with the incumbrance.

The master of a vessel arrived with a very valuable cargo at Philadelphia from St. Barts, reports that the negroes stolen in the Chesapeake had been sold in the West Indies from 150 to 200 dollars higher than the island negroes. The cargo of the "Defender of the Faith's" ship Dragon, of 74 guns, was particularly esteemed. While these things occur, the British at home are ready to quarrel with France for not abolishing the slave trade. The righteous prince regent is patron of the Bible societies.

PROCLAMATION. By the governor of Virginia.—Whereas, in consequence of a proclamation heretofore issued, apprising the good people of this commonwealth of the instant danger of an invasion, and calling upon them to rally round the standard of their country to defend and protect it from disgrace and desolation, such numbers of volunteers, animated with zeal and patriotism, have already reported themselves, as, in addition to the requisition of militia, render the army now assembled amply sufficient for every purpose, so that the services of any other volunteers are unnecessary: I have therefore thought proper to issue this my proclamation to assemble the public of the state of the force already assembled, and require all volunteers who have not yet arrived at Richmond, to return home, their aid being no longer wanting for the defence and security of their country.

Done at Richmond, this 9th September, in the [L S] year 1814, and the 39th year of the commonwealth. JS. BARBOUR.

LIGHTS.—A Boston paper says that orders have been given for extinguishing all the lights and dismantling all the light houses on our coast; and grumbles that the same is not advertised in the papers—for the information of the enemy. On whose account—he, probably, has noticed it.

THE PORTUGUESE.—It is stated that the Portuguese government has refused to clear out vessels for the United States—in obedience to the British paper blockade.

THE KNIGHTS, sir George Prevost and sir Alexander Cochrane are playing a curious game. The first tells the people, that peaceable citizens shall not be molested; that private property taken shall be restored, &c. and that it is only against the government that he will carry on the war. See his proclamation, page 44. Now the other knight, sir Alexander, says in his letter to Mr. Monroe, (page 17) that he is specially enjoined by the said sir George "to destroy and lay waste all such towns and districts on the coast as may be found available." These men must be very great fools, or suppose the people of the United States to be so; else they would have had more method in their business. They are however alike in one thing—they were both shamefully disappointed and unexpressibly chagrined—the one in attempting to save Plattsburg, the other in his design to destroy Baltimore. But sir George, with all his canting, compelled the people of the Isle au Motte to take the oath of allegiance to his Britannic majesty. Query—Will Macdonough "swear them back again?"

BRASS GUNS.—Portsmouth, Sept. 24.—The two elegant brass field pieces captured by the privateer Harpey from a British Packet and brought into this port, were purchased by the town at a late sale, for $1524. They belonged to the post-office department, and bore its initials.

JUST REMARK.—The most extraordinary event in the military history of this country, (says the Democratic Press) is the precipitate flight of 14,000 British troops, under five lieutenant and major-generals, from before the American fort at Plattsburg, manned by 1500 sick, convalescent and healthy men, and 2,500 New York and Vermont militia and volunteers, on the 12th of September, 1814. A vast quantity of military stores and provisions, and even their wounded on the field, were left as evidences of their hurry and panic.

ROCKET BATTERY.—From the Boston Gazette.—A correspondent would beg leave to suggest to the committee of defence the utility of erecting a rocket battery on either forts Warren or Independence.—By means of a recent invention, rockets from one to thirty-two pounds, or larger if necessary, may be fired with as much accuracy as ordnance; and possessing a quality equally destructive as shells, they may be made a powerful weapon of annoyance to the enemy's vessels, should they attempt to come within their reach—and it is said they can be thrown two miles and upwards. We understand Mr. Beath has expressed a willingness, not only to superintend the making of these rockets, of which it is believed he has a perfect knowledge, but also to be stationed at the battery, in case of attack.

MORE ALLIES.—The old friends of England, the

"Algerine patriots," have fitted out a squadron of vessels to assist in "restoring" the United States "to the arms of their legitimate sovereign." But they have yet only captured Dutch, Swedish and Spanish vessels.

CHARLESTON, S. C.—The works for the defence of this important city, are going on with all the activity and zeal that distinguished New York, &c. The Seventy-six Association—the Cincinnati and Revolution societies take the lead in directing the labors of the people, and the direction cannot be in better hands.

THE STRANGER.—The cargo of this valuable prize is advertised for sale at Salem. It consists of 66 guns, 24 pounders, on Congreve's principle, with their carriages, and every thing that belongs to their immediate use, for actual service. The other munitions of war with which she is laden, are really "too tedious to mention" at present. They consist of 2 or 300 different and important articles, among which are muskets, pistols and blue lights! with great quantities of clothing. The inventory is curious and shall be preserved. She is a fortune to her captors and of no small national importance, not only for the convenience of many of those things to be immediately transferred to the Independence 74, at Boston, but for her value to the enemy. For the "Boston Palladium" says—"It is certain that the guns taken on board the Stranger were intended for and necessary to the new British ship at Kingston, it follows that we shall continue masters of lake Ontario through this season, unless some accident befalls our squadron." The loss of this vessel, with that of the two other ordnance ships that sailed in company, foundered at sea, may, and probably will, have no little effect on the events of the present campaign, as well in Canada as on the sea board.

EASTERN COAST.—A small force remains at Castine—only about 100 men, and a frigate and a brig. The rest of the troops, &c. were said to have returned to Halifax. Some say they will be sent to Canada, others to the Chesapeake; the latter we think the most probable—for Cochrane has certainly gone for reinforcements, and the report is that he expects to meet lord Hill at Halifax.

COM. MACDONOUGH.—The common council of New York, have unanimously resolved to present the freedom of the city in a gold box to commodore Macdonough, the hero of lake Champlain, and their thanks to his officers and crews; and to request his portrait for the picture gallery.

PUBLIC DINNERS have been given to Macdonough and Maccomb and their officers at Burlington and Plattsburg. At the former gov. Chittenden and gen. Strong of the Vt. volunteers, were invited guests.

MILITARY.

PROMOTIONS. The President has conferred the following brevet commissions for distinguished and meritorious services in the army of the U States:

Brig. gen. Gaines, August 15, major-general.

Capt. D. Ketchum, 15th infantry, July 25th, major.

2d Lieut. E. B. Randolph, 20th infantry, July 25, 1st lieut.

Capt. T. Biddle, junior corps of artillery, August 15, major.

Capt. A. C. W. Fanning, corps of artillery, Aug. 15, major.

Capt. B. Birdsall, 4th rifle, Aug. 15, major.

1st Lieut. M. N. Hall, 21st infantry, assistant inspector-general, Aug. 15, captain.

Capt. R. Desha, 24th infantry, August 4, major.

Brig. gen. Dearborn, son of major-gen. Dearborn, of the U. S. A. has been appointed to the command of the forts in Boston harbor.

Brig. gen. Peter B. Porter, of the New-York valunteers, for his gallant conduct on the Niagara frontier, has been brevetted a major-general of the militia of New-York, by governor Tompkins.

Major George Armistead, for his gallant defence of fort M'Henry, has been promoted to lieutenant-colonel of artillery, by the president of the United States.

THE UPPER LAKES.—Though the expedition under lieut. col. Croghan, and captain Kennedy has failed of its primary object, the enemy has suffered immensely by their exertions. Supplies of provisions of the first necessity, and of clothing and munitions of war for the garrison and post of Michilimackinac, &c. of great value, with a large collection of furs, &c. belonging to the N. W. company, have all been captured or destroyed. Before our squadron entered lake Huron, flour was $100 per barrel, salt $3 per lb. &c. Capt. Sinclair's account of his cruise is exceedingly interesting. It gives us a clear detail of his proceedings and furnishes many important geographical facts.

GENERAL ARMSTRONG.—From the National Intelligencer—Many of our readers will be pleased to learn that general Armstrong, was misinformed as to the fact, stated in his letter, that "Alexander C. Hanson, editor of the Federal Republican," was one of the deputation which he states to have waited on the President of the United States from Georgetown, on the morning of the 29th Aug.—and, indeed, as to the fact that any deputation waited on the President from Georgetown, on that occasion.

Brig. gen. Cidwallader has taken command of the Pennsylvania volunteers and militia, encamped at Kennet Square, for the defence of the upper shores of the Delaware—7,500 men are collected at York. A camp is forming at Marcus Hook.

New-Orleans.—Considerable preparations are making for the defence of this city and its neighbourhood. A force of 10,000 men is expected to be stationed here.

NAVAL.

The cargo of the India ship Countess of Harcourt, a prize of the Sabine, of Baltimore, has been sold at an average price of 11s the pound sterling, by invoice. Some articles sold as high as $18.

A large Russia ship with a very valuable cargo, lately sent into St. Mary's by one of our gun boats, has been released, and is disposing of her goods—woolens and crockery.

Scotch prize. "His majesty's" brig Moselle, of Carthagen, lately fell in with one of our privateers, in a calm, which she took for a merchantman, and manned five barges to take possession. They were permitted to come close aboard when a tremendous fire was opened upon them; they had the master and two midshipmen and 18 men killed and wounded—the rest got away, and the privateer being to windward escaped.

Boston, Sept. 17. An English ship of 370 tons, full cargo pepper, a prize to the letter of marque ship Hyder-Ali, Thorndike, arrived in Mount Desert harbour a few days since—finding that part of the country in possession of the British, she stood out again with a pilot on board—at night was becalmed, when she was discovered by a frigate at anchor near the land—the capt. 2d lieut. and sailing master of the frigate came in 3 barges full of men, two on one side and one on the other—as the capt. of the frigate came over the side, capt. Oxnard, prize-master, and the pilot jumped over the other side into the pilot's boat; one of the barges fired on the boat, killed the pilot, and slightly wounded capt. Oxnard, but he escaped, and arrived safely at Portland on Tuesday. The barges' crews which boarded the ship on different sides, mistook each other for the enemy, and an engagement ensued between them, in which the capt. was shot through the shoulder, and 4 men badly wounded. The prize left the coast of Sumatra 12th May. [The cargo of this vessel is said to have been worth 100,000 sterling.]

The U. States sloop Peacock lately watered at the isle of Flores—two British sloops of war had sailed in quest of her from Fyral. She had burnt the brig Stranger, from Buenos Ayres for Liverpool.

The Pike, privateer of Baltimore, was lately run on shore to avoid the British cruisers on the southern coast, and went entirely to pieces: She had taken 25 prizes, and had goods on board worth $50,000. A part of her crew were made prisoners.

Gun boat No. 140, by some accident was blown up at Occorcock, on the 23d ult.—nine persons lost their lives by the disaster.

By a prize to the Chasseur, of Baltimore, arrived at New-York, we learn that a fine American ship, laden with seal skins, which had been gone 2 years, came into Buenos Ayres, and was taken possession of by the British frigate Nevius, by whom she was sent to Rio Janeiro. The ship had a British licence, and the capt with part of his crew were left on shore at Buenos Ayres.

Several Portuguese and other vessels have been lately captured off our coast, and sent to Halifax on a suspicion of desiring to violate the blockade.

The London Gazette of June 21, officially announces the capture of the American privateers Hawk and Polly, by two frigates.

The southern coast is much infested by the enemy's cruisers; yet there are some valuable arrivals of prizes, and merchant vessels. Those from foreign voyages are chiefly Baltimore schooners.

The cartel Analostan has sailed from Savannah for Halifax, with 110 British prisoners—among them the officers late of the Epervier.

The news of the capture of the Essex frigate gave great joy in England; but they did not fire the tower guns for the glorious victory.

The Wasp sloop of war, has arrived at Bayonne, where she was repairing damages.

The David Porter, privateer, arrived at New-York, was chased nine hundred and forty miles, by a frigate and two sloops of war.

Governor Strong, has loaned commodore Bainbridge, 632 pounders of the State artillery for the defence of the Independence 74. We are happy to see that governor Strong, and the people at large, seem now to feel the necessity of defending their Independence.

A New-York paper says—The secretary of the navy has appointed commodore Porter to command the Steam-battery constructed by Mr. Fulton.

The Mammoth privateer of Baltimore is dealing destruction to the enemy, off the coasts of Newfoundland. In imitation of the enemy, she has ordered the fishermen off the Banks! She had a hard fight with a large transport ship, with 500 or 400 troops, in which she did not succeed, and had one man wounded.

The York of Baltimore, has arrived at Boston, filled with the richest spoils of several vessels; among them, the East India ship Coromandel, of 500 tons.

The Surprise of Baltimore, has arrived at Salem, after a wonderful cruise of one month—in which she took 20 prizes; some of them of great value—nine or ten of which she burnt. She is full of dry goods. Particulars in prize list.

An American sloop has been sent as prize into "his majesty's" new port of EASTPORT.

It is ascertained that the enemy launched his ship to carry 110 guns, at Kingston, on the 10th of September, on which occasion a royal salute was fired.

The Treasury Report.

Treasury Department, September 23, 1814.

Sir—I have the honor to transmit a report prepared in obedience to the "Act supplementary to the act, entitled an act to establish the Treasury Department."

I have the honor to be, with the highest respect, sir, your most obedient,

G. W. CAMPBELL.

To the honorable the president of the senate, &c.

The secretary of the treasury, in obedience to the act "supplementary to the act, entitled an act to establish the treasury department," has the honor respectfully to submit to congress the following report and estimates.

The sums authorised by congress to be expended during the year 1814, and for which appropriations have been made, are as follows:

1. For civil, diplomatic and miscellaneous expenses

To this sum is to be added the amount which may be payable on the following accounts, viz. 1. The amount of fines, penalties and forfeitures actually received into the treasury, which is appropriated for defraying the expenses of courts of the United States. 2. The sums received by the collectors of the customs for the Marine Hospital fund, and privateer pension fund, which are paid into the treasury with the other monies derived from the customs, but are exclusively applicable to the two objects here mentioned respectively. 3. The monies received into the treasury for the United States' moiety of prizes captured by public vessels, which belong exclusively to the navy pension fund. These items are contingent and uncertain, until the accounts for the year are made up, and their amount ascertained. As they appear among the receipts into the treasury, they must be also placed among its expenditures. They may be estimated for the year 1814, at

2,452,905

3. Naval expenses, including the indian department, and the permanent appropriation of 200,000 dollars annually, for arming and equipping the whole body of the militia of the United States

8,169,910 87

4. For the public debt, such sum as the public engagements may require, and which during the year 1814 may be estimated as follows:

Interest on the public debt existing previously to the present war 1,980,000
Interest on the debt contracted during the present war, including the loans of the present year, and treasury notes 2,950,000
Reimbursement of principal, consisting of the annual redimbursement of the old six per cent. and deferred stocks, temporary loans payable during this year, and treasury notes reimbursable during the same 7,572,000

But for these purposes there had been advanced from the treasury during the year 1813, to sundry commissioners of loans, beyond the demands upon them for the year 1813, and to the treasurer of the United States as agent for the commissioners of the sinking fund, about

Leaving payable during the year 1814 47,270,172 46

The means by which this sum was to be provided were the following:

1. Monies receivable on account of the public revenue, and which were estimated as follows:
From the customs 6,500,000
Sales of public lands 600,000
Direct tax and internal duties 3,306,000
Postage and incidental expenses 50,000

2. Monies receivable for the proceeds of loans and for treasury notes, to be issued as follows:

Amount payable into the treasury during the year 1814, of the loan of seven and a half millions, made under the act of Aug. 2, 1813 3,592,665

Amount authorised to be borrowed by the act of March 25, 1814, 25,000,000

Amount authorised by the act of March 4, 1814, to be issued in treasury notes 5,000,000

33,592,665

And it was estimated, that out of the balance of cash remaining in the treasury on the 1st day of Jan. 1814, which amounted to 5,196,482 dollars, there might be applied a sum sufficient to cover the whole amount of the authorised expenditures, and which would be

47,270,172 46

The accounts of the treasury have as yet been made up only for the two first quarters of the year 1814, or to the 30th of June of that year. The annexed statement marked A shows the receipts and expenditures at the treasury, for the fourth quarter of the year 1813, which have not before been communicated to congress, and, separately, those of the two first quarters of the year 1814.

By this statement it appears that the payments from the treasury during the first half of the present year, have been, for civil, diplomatic and miscellaneous expenses

Military expenses 11,210,238
Naval do. 4,012,899 90
Public debt 2,026,593 77

19,693,781 27

And would leave payable during the remainder of the year, on those several accounts, the following sum:

For civil, diplomatic and miscellaneous expenses 1,001,292 99
Military expenses 13,292,663
Naval do. 4,157,010 97
Public debt 9,125,419 23

27,576,391 19

47,270,172 46

The receipts into the treasury during the first half of the present year, have been as follows:

For the proceeds of the customs 4,182,083 25
Public lands (including those in the Mississippi territory, the proceeds of which are now payable to the state of Georgia) 540,065 68
Internal duties and direct tax 2,189,272 46
Postage and incidental receipts 106,744

7,017,170 33

Loan of 7 1-2 millions, under the act of August 2d, 1813 3,592,665

Loan of 10 millions (part of 25 millions) under the act of March 24, 1814, 6,087,011

Treasury notes issued under the act of Feb. 23, 1813, 1,070,000

Treasury notes issued under the act of March 4, 1814, 1,392,100

12,219,946 38

And there remained cash in the treasury on the 1st of July, 1814, 4,725,639 32

Dolls. 23,947,585 65

To make up the sum, therefore, which will be wanted to meet the expenditures as above estimated, there must be obtained during the third and fourth quarters of the present year,

23,327,586 81

Dolls. 47,270,172 46

And the further sum of 1,500,000 dollars, which is the least that ought at any time during a state of war to be left in the treasury, making

$24,627,586 81

Of this amount it is estimated that there will be derived from the various sources of existing revenue, the following sums viz.:

From the customs 2,830,000

It has not been practicable to prepare the statement of this and of the other branches of the revenue, in the usual official form, to be communicated to congress at this time. Some of the statements have been heretofore regularly given for periods terminating on the 31st of Sept. and to preserve the series unimpaired, the preparation is postponed until they can be made out terminating with that day. They will hereafter be laid before congress in the proper form. The amount of the custom house duties which accrued during the year 1813 was 7,070,000 dollars. During the two first quarters of the present year they amounted to about 3,000,000 dollars; but during the two last quarters will not probably exceed one million.

The amount receivable into the treasury during the year 1814, from bonds outstanding at the commencement of the year, and from the duties accruing and which will become payable during that year, is estimated mated at 7,000,000 dollars, which is 500,000 dollars more than was heretofore estimated. Of this sum, 4,840,083 dollars and 55 cents, was paid during the first half of the year, and will leave payable during the remainder of the year the sums here stated.

Sales of Public Lands. The proceeds of the public lands sold in the Mississippi territory, which are now payable to the state of Georgia, are brought into the treasury in the same manner as the monies derived from the sales of other public lands. As the amount when paid out of the Treasury to the state of Georgia appears among the public expenditures, it is proper that these monies should be placed among the receipts of the Treasury. Including the proceeds of the lands in the Mississippi territory, the receipts during the year 1814 are estimated at 900,000 dollars, of which 540,968 dollars and 68 cents, having been received during the two first quarters of the year, there will be receivable during the two last quarters

Internal Duties and Direct Tax. The receipts into the Treasury from these sources during the present year, will fully equal the estimate heretofore made. These taxes are paid readily and cheerfully. The direct tax is in collection in more than three fourths of the districts, and will shortly be in the same state in all the districts, except two or three, where the difficulty of obtaining competent persons to act as assessors has produced some delay. In several of the districts the collection is already nearly completed. The amount estimated as receivable from these two sources was 3,800,000 dollars. Of this sum there was received prior to the 1st of July last 2,189,372 dollars and 40 cents, and leaves to be received during the remainder of the year

Postage and Incidental Receipts. These were estimated for the whole year, at 50,000 dollars. Including repayments, prize money and the arrears of the former direct tax and internal duties, there was received, on these accounts, during the first half of the year 166,744 dollars. These receipts are so casual and uncertain that it is difficult to make any estimate of their amount. During the remainder of the year, they may, perhaps be expected to produce

50,000

E Total amount receivable for revenue

Dolls. 4,840,000

Under the act of the 24th of March, 1814, by which the president was authorised to borrow twenty-five millions of dollars, a loan was opened on the 2d of May, for ten millions of dollars in part of that sum. A loan for ten millions of dollars was considered as more likely to prove successful, than if an attempt were made to obtain the whole amount of twenty-five millions at once. The sums offered for this loan amounted to 11,900,806 dollars, of which 2,671,750 dollars were at rates less than 88 per cent. and 1,183,400 dollars at rates less than 85 per cent. Of the sum of 9,229,056 dollars, which were offered at 88 per cent. or at rates more favorable to the United States, five millions were offered with the condition annexed that if terms more favorable to the lenders should be allowed for any part of the twenty-five millions authorized to be borrowed the present year, the same terms should be extended to those holding the stock of the ten million loan.—Taking into consideration the expectation then entertained of an early return of peace, and the importance of maintaining unimpaired the public credit, by sustaining the price of stock in the meantime: and also considering the measure was sanctioned by precedent, it was agreed to accept the loan with that condition. Had the sum to which the condition was annexed been rejected, the consequence would have been to reduce the amount obtained to less than five millions, a sum altogether inadequate to the public demands; or, by depressing the stock to 85 per cent. to have obtained only a little more than six millions, which would still have been insufficient to answer the purposes of government.—Offers were subsequently made to this loan, of sums amounting to 566,000 dollars, which were accepted on the same terms as the original offers, and augmented the amount of the loan which was taken to 9,795,056 dollars.

The papers annexed under the letter B. exhibit the particulars relating to this loan.

There was paid into the treasury on account of the loan of ten millions, prior to the 1st of July, $6,087,011, leaving to be paid after that day, $3,708,045. Of this sum, a failure of payment on the days fixed by terms of the loan, of about 1,900,000 dollars has taken place; and it is doubtful whether the payment will be effected. No more, therefore, can be relied on towards the supply necessary for the third and fourth quarters of the year 1814, than what has been already paid and amounting to about $1,800,000.

Proposals were again invited on the 22d of August, for a loan of six millions of dollars, in further execution of the power contained in the act of the 24th of March, for borrowing twenty-five millions. The whole amount offered was only 2,823,300 dollars, of which 100,000 dollars were at rates less than 80 per cent, and 2,213,000 dollars were at the rate of 80 dollars in money for 100 dollars of six per cent stock. The remaining sum of 510,300 dollars was offered at various rates from 80 to 88. Notwithstanding the reduced rate at which the greater part of the above sum was proposed, yet as the market price of stock hardly exceeded 80 per cent: as there was no prospect of obtaining the money on better terms, and as it was indispensable for the public service, it was deemed advisable to accept the sums offered at that rate. Including the sums offered at rates more favorable to the United States than that here stated, the whole amount of the proposals accepted, was 2,723,300 dollars; and a further sum of 207,000 dollars has been since accepted at the same rate; making the whole amount taken of this loan, 2,930,300 dollars.

The annexed papers under the letter C. relate to this loan.

Some of the persons who originally made proposals for this loan, which were accepted, have since given notice that they could not carry their proposals into execution. The sums in relation to which this failure has taken place, amount to 410,000 dollars, and there can, therefore, be relied on for the proceeds of this loan, only $2,520,300.

Monies having been heretofore obtained by the United States on loan in Europe, upon favorable terms; and the punctuality and fidelity with which they were repaid, having established their credit there, on a firm and respectable footing, it was determined, in consequence of the difficulties experienced in obtaining at home the sums requisite for the public service, to try the market in that quarter. To effect this purpose the requisite powers and instructions have been given for negotiating a loan for six millions of dollars, as a further part of the loan of twenty-five millions authorised by the act of the 24th of March last; and in order to facilitate this object, six per cent. stock to that amount has been constituted and transmitted, with directions for its sale, if that shall be found the most advantageous mode for obtaining the money. The result, however, of this experiment is not certain; and the proceeds, in case it should be successful, will not probably come into the treasury in the course of the present year. They cannot, therefore, be placed among the resources of this year; but as this sum forms a part of that which was authorised to be borrowed, and which will be necessary for the service of the present year, further authority will be required from congress for obtaining this sum by loan or otherwise; in which case the proceeds of the negotiation undertaken in Europe will be applicable to the service of the ensuing year.

With a view to avoid the inconvenient increase of stock in the market, and its consequent depreciation, an effort was made to obtain temporary loans from the banks by special contracts; but the attempt was not attended with success.

The amount of treasury notes issued prior to the 1st of July last, under the act of the 4th of March, 1814, was $1,392,100. Those since issued, amount to $1,512,300. The annexed statement marked E. shows the particulars relating to these notes; and in the paper marked D. an account is given of those treasury notes issued under the act of the 25th of February, 1813, which have not been heretofore reported to congress.

There are now in circulation near 8,000,000 of dollars in treasury notes; of which, during the fourth quarter of the present year, notes for more than four millions of dollars will become reimbursable. A part of them may perhaps be replaced by new notes; but it is not believed that, upon their present footing, more than two millions and a half of dollars can thus be replaced. This would still leave more than six millions of dollars of notes in circulation, which the experience of two years has shown to be nearly as large a sum, while the other circulating paper medium of the country remained unembarrassed, and maintained itself in the public confidence, as can in their present shape be freely and easily circulated. Notes of a smaller denomination than those heretofore issued, have been prepared, and will probably, by passing into a more numerous and extensive class of the money transactions of individuals, carry a greater quantity into circulation.—There having been already issued since the 1st of July, treasury notes amounting to 1,500,000 dollars, & it being estimated that a further sum of 2,500,000 dollars may be put in circulation previously to the end of the present year, the amount estimated to be derived from this source during the third and fourth quarters of the year will be $4,000,000.

The means then, for meeting the demands upon the treasury during the last half of the present year, as now ascertained, are estimated as follows:

From the Revenue,	4,840,000
Loans under the 5 million act, viz.
Loan of 10 millions	1,800,000
Loan of 6 millions	2,500,000
	4,300,000
Treasury Notes	9,160,000
	4,000,000
And leave still to be obtained	13,160,000

The difficulties already experienced in obtaining loans, and the terms on which it has been found necessary to accept them, sufficiently show the propriety of congress adopting effective measures for procuring the sums still required for the service of the residue of the present, as well as for that of the ensuing year.

The suspension of payments in specie by many of the most considerable banks in the United States, and of those most important in the money operations of the treasury, has produced, and will continue to cause difficulties and embarrassments, in those operations. The circulating medium of the country, which has consisted principally of bank notes, is placed upon a new and uncertain footing; and those difficulties and embarrassments will extend in a greater or less degree into the pecuniary operations of the citizens in general. The powers of congress, so far as they extend, will be required to be exerted in providing a remedy for these evils, and in placing, if practicable, the currency of the country on a more uniform, certain and stable footing.

If further reliance must be had on loans, it is respectfully suggested, that additional inducements should be offered to capitalists to advance their money, by affording an ample and unequivocal security for the regular payment of the interest, and reimbursement of the principal of such loans as may be obtained. This may be effected by establishing an adequate revenue, and pledging the same specifically for that purpose.

It is also submitted for the consideration of congress, whether treasury notes might not, by augmenting the rate of interest they now bear, and securing its payment as well as their eventual reimbursement, by an adequate revenue pledged for that purpose, be placed on a footing better calculated than at present, to sustain their credit, encourage their circulation, and answer with more certainty the purposes of government.

The estimates for the service of the year 1815 have not yet been prepared. It is certain, however, if the war continues, that a sum will be required, at least equal to that demanded for the present year; and under the head of public debt, an additional sum sufficient for the payment of the interest on the loans made in the meantime.

By the plan of finance which was adopted at the commencement of the present war, this additional sum would be all that would be required to be raised by new taxes during the year 1815, except what might be necessary to make good a deficiency in any of the existing revenues. According to that plan of finance, the expenditures to be covered by the revenue during the year 1815, would be as follows:

Expence of the peace establishment	7,000,000
Interest on the debt exhibiting prior to the war	1,900,000
Interest on the debt contracted since the war, including treasury notes, and including the interest which will become payable during the year 1815, on debt contracted within that year	4,600,000
	5,500,000
	13,500,000
The revenues as now established, are estimated to produce during the year 1815, the following sums, viz.:
Customs. While the whole navy of the enemy is disposable for the interruption of our trade, this source of revenue cannot be very productive. From bonds which will be outstanding at the commencement of the year 1815, and from the duties which will accrue during that year, it is estimated that there will be received into the treasury	4,000,000
Sales of Public Lands	800,000
Internal Duties. These will all bring their full amounts into the treasury during the year 1815, and will, it is believed, produce a net sum of	2,700,000
Arrears of direct tax of 1814, which will be received in 1815,	600,000
Postage and other incidental receipts	100,000
Total amount	8,700,000
And leaving to be provided	5,300,000
	13,500,000

Towards making up this sum of 5,300,000 dollars, a continuance of the direct tax will it is believed, be necessary; but at its present rate, it will not produce net to the treasury more than two 2,600,000 dollars.

In order to provide the remaining sum of 2,700,000 dollars, as well as such other sums as may be deemed requisite for the objects herein before suggested, it will be for congress to consider how far it would be expedient to increase this tax as well as the present internal duties; and also, what new objects of taxation may for that purpose be most advantageously resorted to.

But the plan of finance above referred to, assumed as one of the grounds upon which it depended, that loans might be annually obtained during the continuance of the war for the amount of the extraordinary expenditures occasioned by it. The experience of the present year furnishes ground to doubt whether this be practicable, at least in the shape in which loans have been hitherto attempted. Nor is it even certain that the establishing and pledging of revenues adequate to the punctual payment of the interest and eventual reimbursement of the principal of the sums which will be required for the service of the year 1815, would enable the treasury to obtain them through the medium of loans effected in the ordinary way.

With this view of the subject, it is respectfully submitted whether it should not be expedient to extend the provisions to be made for the service of the ensuing year, beyond those contemplated in this plan of finance, hitherto pursued for carrying on the war; so as to provide by means other than loans for at least a portion of the extraordinary expenditures occasioned thereby. This would have a tendency to ensure public confidence and preserve and confirm public credit.

The present state of the country, growing out of the unjust policy of the enemy, as well as the unusual manner in which he prosecutes the war, calls for new and extraordinary exertions on the part of the nation, and the means requisite to meet the expenditures which these may occasion ought to be provided.

The resources of the nation are not exhausted; they are ample, and the occasion requires they should be brought into full activity.

The very expenditures which render necessary the imposition of additional taxes will themselves have increased in the community the ability to discharge them.

The promptitude and cheerfulness with which the present taxes are paid, afford the best pledges of the spirit with which the people will meet such demands as the interest and safety of the country may require.

A people who have not only tasted, but enjoyed in their full extent, the blessings of liberty and independence for more than thirty years, cannot consider any sacrifices too great which are found indispensable to preserve them inviolate.

Those sacrifices, however, which may be demanded by the present crisis in our affairs will be of a temporary nature only; for while we may fairly calculate that with the termination of the present contest, the duration of which will be shortened in proportion to the vigor and unanimity with which it is sustained on our part, will cease the expenditures consequent on a state of war, and render no longer necessary a continuance of those extraordinary revenues established to provide the supplies requisite for that object, we may with equal confidence rely that the growing revenue arising from the commerce of a few prosperous years of peace, will be found sufficient to redeem the pledges which have been made to the public creditors, and thus relieve the people from those burdens, which times of danger and difficulties rendered indispensable.

All of which is respectfully submitted.

G. W. CAMPBELL.

Macomb's victory.

Copy of a letter from brig. gen Macomb, to the secretary of war, dated Head-quarters, Plattsburgh, September 15th, 1814.

SIR—I have the honor to communicate, for the information of the war department, the particulars of the advance of the enemy into the territory of the United States, the circumstances attending the siege of the posts entrusted to my charge.

The governor general of the Canadas, sir George Prevost, having collected all the disposable force in lower Canada, with a view of conquering the country as far as Crown Point and Ticonderoga, entered the territories of the United States on the first of the month, and occupied the village of Champlain; there avowed his intentions, and issued orders and proclamations tending to dissuade the people from their allegiance, and inviting them to furnish his army with provisions. He immediately began to impress the waggons and teams in the vicinity, and loaded them with his heavy baggage and stores.—From this I was persuaded he intended to attack this place. I had but just returned from the lines, where I had commanded a fine brigade, which was broken up to form the division under maj. gen. Izard, ordered to the westward. Being senior officer, he left me in command; and, except the four companies of the 6th regiment, I had not an organized battalion among those remaining. The garrison was composed of convalescents and recruits of the new regiments—all in the greatest confusion, as well as the ordnance and stores, and the works in no state of defence.

To create an emulation and zeal among the officers and men in completing the works, I divided them into detachments, and placed them near the several forts; declaring in orders, that each detachment was the garrison of its own work, and bound to defend it to the last extremity.

The enemy advanced cautiously and by short marches, and our soldiers worked day and night; so that by the time he made his appearance before the place, we were prepared to receive him.

General Izard named the principal work fort Mooreau, and to remind the troops of the actions of their brave countrymen, I called the redoubt on the right fort Brown, and that on the left fort Scott. Besides these three works, we have two block houses strongly fortified.

Finding, on examining the returns of the garrison, that our force did not exceed fifteen hundred effective men for duty, and well informed that the enemy had as many thousands, I called on general Mooers, of the New-York militia, and arranged with him plans for bringing forth the militia en masse. The inhabitants of the village fled with their families and effects, except a few worthy citizens and some boys, who formed themselves into a party, received rifles, and were exceedingly useful. By the fourth of the month, general Mooers collected about seven hundred militia, and advanced seven miles on the Beckman town road, to watch the motions of the enemy, and to skirmish with him as he advanced; also to obstruct the road with fallen trees, and to break up the bridges.

On the lake road at Dead creek bridge, I posted two hundred men under captain Sproul of the 13th regiment with orders to abbatis the woods, to place obstructions in the road, and to fortify himself; to this party I added two field pieces. In advance of that position, was lieutenant colonel Appling, with 110 riflemen, watching the movements of the enemy, and procuring intelligence. It was ascertained, that before day-light on the sixth, the enemy would advance in two columns, on the two roads before mentioned, dividing at Sampson's, a little below Chazy village. The column on the Beckman Town road proceeded most rapidly; the militia skirmished with his advanced parties, and, except a few brave men, fell back most precipitately in the greatest disorder, notwithstanding the British troops did not deign to fire on them, except by their flankers and advanced patrols. The night previous, I ordered major Wool to advance with a detachment of 250 men to support the militia, and set them an example of firmness.—Also, Capt. Leonard of the light artillery was directed to proceed with two pieces to be on the ground before day; yet he did not make his appearance until 8 o'clock, when the enemy had approached within two miles of the village. With his conduct, therefore, I am not well pleased. Major Wool, with his party, disputed the road with great obstinacy, but the militia could not be prevailed on to stand, notwithstanding the exertions of their general and staff officers; although the fields were divided by strong stone walls, and they were told that the enemy could not possibly cut them off. The state dragoons of New-York wear red coats, and they being on the heights to watch the enemy, gave constant alarm to the militia, who mistook them for the enemy, and feared his getting in their rear. Finding the enemy's columns had penetrated within a mile of Plattsburgh, I dispatched my aide de camp, lieutenant Root, to bring off the detachment at Dead Creek, and to inform lieutenant-colonel Appling that I wished him to fall on the enemy's right flank. The colonel fortunately arrived just in time to save his retreat and to fall in with the head of a column debouching from the woods. Here he poured in a destructive fire from his riflemen at rest, and continued to annoy the column until he found a junction with major Wool. The field pieces did considerable execution among the enemy's columns. So undaunted, however, was the enemy, that he never deployed in his whole march, always pressing on in column. Finding that every road was full of troops crowding on us on all sides, I ordered the field pieces to retire across the bridge and form a battery for its protection, and to cover the retreat of the infantry, which was accordingly done, and the parties of Appling, and Wool, as well as that of Sproul, retired alternately, keeping up a brisk fire until they got under cover of the works. The enemy's light troops occupied the houses near the bridge, and kept up a constant firing from the windows and balconies, and annoyed us much. I ordered them to be driven out with hot shot, which soon put the houses in flames, and obliged these sharp shooters to retire. The whole day, until it was too late to see, the enemy's light troops endeavored to drive our guards from the bridge, but they suffered dearly for their perseverance. An attempt was also made to cross the upper bridge where the militia handsomely drove them.

The column which marched by the lake road was much impeded by the obstructions, and the removal of the bridge at Dead Creek, and as it passed the creek and beach, the galleys kept up a lively and gallant fire.

Our troops being now all on the south side of the Saranac, I directed the planks to be taken off the bridges and piled up in the form of breastworks to cover our parties intended for disputing the passage, which afterwards enabled us to hold the bridges against very superior numbers.

From the 7th to the 11th, the enemy was employed in getting on his battering train, and erecting his batteries and approaches, and constantly skirmishing at the bridges and fords. By this time the militia of New-York, and the volunteers of Vermont were pouring in from all quarters. I advised general Moores to keep his force along the Saranac to prevent the enemy's crossing the river, and to send a strong body in his rear to harass him day and night, and keep him in continual alarm.

The militia behaved with great spirit after the first day, and the volunteers of Vermont were exceedingly serviceable. Our regular troops, notwithstanding the constant skirmishing, and repeated endeavors of the enemy to cross the river, kept at their work day and night strengthening the defences, and evinced a determination to hold out to the last extremity.

It was reported that the enemy only waited the arrival of his flotilla to make a general attack.—About eight in the evening of the 11th, as was expected, the flotilla appeared in sight round Cumberland Head, and at nine bore down and engaged our flotilla at anchor in the Bay off the town. At the same instant the batteries were opened upon us, and continued throwing bomb-shells, shrapnells, balls and Congreve rockets until sunset, when the bombardment ceased, every battery of the enemy being silenced by the superiority of our fire. The naval engagement lasted but two hours in full view of both armies. Three efforts were made by the enemy to pass the river at the commencement of the cannonade and bombardment, with a view of assaulting the works, and had prepared for that purpose an immense number of scaling ladders. One attempt to cross was made at the village bridge, another at the upper bridge, and a third at a ford about three miles from the works. At the two first he was repulsed by the regulars—and at the ford by the brave volunteers and militia, where he suffered severely in killed, wounded, and prisoners; a considerable body crossed the stream, but were either killed, taken or driven back. The woods at this place were very favorable to the operations of the militia. A whole company of the 76th regiment was here destroyed, the three lieutenants and 27 men prisoners, the captain and the rest killed.

I cannot forego the pleasure of here stating the gallant conduct of captain McGlassin of the 15th regiment, who was ordered to ford the river, and attack a party constructing a battery on the right of the enemy's line, within five hundred yards of Fort Brown, which he handsomely executed at midnight with 50 men; drove off the working party, consisting of one hundred and fifty, and defeated a covering party of the same number—killing one officer and six men in the charge and wounding many.

At dusk the enemy withdrew his artillery from the batteries, and raised the siege; and at nine, under cover of the night, sent off, in a great hurry, all the baggage he could find transport for, and also his artillery. At two the next morning the whole army precipitately retreated, leaving the sick and wounded to our generosity—and the governor left a note with a surgeon, requesting the humane attention of the commanding general.

Vast quantities of provision were left behind and destroyed, also an immense quantity of bomb-shells, cannon balls, grape shot, ammunition, flints, &c. &c. intrenching tools of all sorts, also tents and marquees. A great deal has been found concealed in the ponds and creeks, and buried in the ground, and a vast quantity carried off by the inhabitants. Such was the precipitance of his retreat, that he arrived at Chazy, a distance of eight miles before we discovered that he had gone. The light troops, volunteers and militia pursued immediately on learning of his flight; and some of the mounted men made prisoners five dragoons of the 19th regiment and several others of the rear guard. A continual fall of rain and a violent storm prevented further pursuit. Upwards of three hundred deserters have come in, and many are hourly arriving.

We have buried the British officers of the army and navy, with the honors of war, and shewn every attention and kindness to those who have fallen into our hands.

The conduct of the officers, non-commissioned officers, and soldiers of my command, during this trying occasion cannot be represented in too high terms, and I feel it my duty to recommend to the particular notice of government, lieutenant-colonel Appling of the 1st rifle corps, major Wool of the 20th, mafor Totten of the corps of engineers, captain Brooks of the artillery, captain McGlessin of the 15th, lieutenants de Russy and Trescott of the corps of engineers, lieutenants Smyth, Mountford and Cromwell of the artillery, also my aid-de-camp, Lt. Root, who have all distinguished themselves by their uncommon zeal and activity, and have been greatly instrumental in producing the happy and glorious result of the siege.

I have the honor to be, with sentiments of profound respect, sir, your obedient humble servant,

ALEX. MACOMB

Loss of the Adams frigate.

Copy of a letter from captain C. Morris to the secretary of the navy, dated* Portland, Sept. 8, 1814.

SIR—It is with regret that I inform you we were compelled to destroy the Adams at Hampden, on the morning of the 3d inst. to prevent her falling into the hands of the enemy.

All the officers effected their escape, and I believe the crew, with the exception of very few, who were unable to travel. Their precise number cannot yet be ascertained, as we were obliged to pursue different routes, for the purpose of obtaining provisions through the woods between the Penobscot and Kennebeck.

I am now engaged collecting and forwarding the men with the utmost dispatch to Portsmouth, from which place I hope soon to forward a detailed account of our proceedings.

In the mean time, I request you to believe that the officers and crew of the ship neglected no means in their power for her defence.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant.

C. MORRIS.

The honorable Wm. Jones, secretary of the navy.

*The letters of captain Morris to the secretary of the navy, giving an account of the cruise of the Adams, and of her arrival at Hampden, are among the documents that lie over for future insertion.

Copy of a letter from captain Morris to the secretary of the navy.

Boston, September 30, 1814.

SIR—I have the honor to have forwarded a detailed report of the circumstances attending the destruction of the United States' ship Adams at Hampden on the 31 instant.

On the first instant at noon, I received intelligence by express that the enemy with a force of sixteen sail were off the harbor of Castine thirty miles below us. This intelligence was immediately forwarded to brigadier general Blake, with a request, that he would direct such force as could be collected to repair immediately to Hampden. As our ship prepared for heaving down was in no situation to receive her armament, our attention was immediately directed to the occupation of such positions on shore as would best enable us to protect her. By great and unremitting exertions, and the prompt assistance of all the inhabitants in our immediate vicinity, during the 1st and 2d insts. nine pieces were transported to a commanding eminence near the ship, one to the place selected by general Blake for his line of battle, fourteen upon a wharf commanding the river below, and one on a point covering the communication between our hill and wharf batteries; temporary platforms of loose plank were laid, and such other arrangements made as would enable us to dispute the passage of a naval force. Want of time prevented our improving all the advantages of our position and we were compelled to leave our rear and flanks to the defence of the militia in case of attack by land troops. Favored by a fresh breeze, the enemy had advanced to within three miles of our position at sunset on the 2nd with the Sylph mounting 22, and Peruvian 18 guns, and one transport, one tender and ten barges manned with seamen from the Bulwark and Dragon, under command of commodore Barrie. Troops were landed under command of colonel John, opposite their shipping without any opposition, their numbers unknown, but supposed to be about 350. To oppose these troops about 370 militia were then collected, assisted by lieutenant Lewis of the United States artillery, who by a forced march had arrived from Castine with his detachment of 28 men. Many of the militia were without arms and most of them without any ammunition, and as our numbers were barely sufficient to man our batteries, I ordered the ship's muskets to be distributed among the militia, and further ordered them to be supplied with ammunition. Our sick were sent across a creek with orders for such as were able, to secure themselves in the woods in case of our defeat. These arrangements were not concluded until late on the evening of the 2nd. As the wind was fair for the enemy's approach and the night dark, rainy and favorable for his attempting a surprise, our men were compelled, notwithstanding previous fatigue to remain at their batteries. At day-light on the 3d, I received intelligence from general Blake, that he had been reinforced by three companies, and that the enemy were then advancing upon him. A thick fog concealed their early movements, and their advance of barges and rocket boats was not discovered until about 7 o'clock. Believing from their movements that they intended a simultaneous attack by land and water, I placed the hill battery under the direction of my first lieutenant Wadsworth, assisted by lieutenant Madison and Mr. Rogers, the purser, and directed lieutenant Watson to place his small detachment of twenty marines in a position to watch the movements of the enemy's main body, assist in covering our flank, and finally to cover our retreat in case that became necessary. I had but just joined the wharf battery under the direction of lieutenants Parker and Beatty, and sailing-master McCulloch, when the enemy's infantry commenced their attack upon the militia. The launches still held their position beyond the reach of our fire, ready to improve any advantage their troops might obtain. A few minutes only had elapsed when lieutenant Wadsworth informed me that our troops were retreating, and immediately after that they were dispersed and flying in great confusion. We had now no alternative but precipitate retreat or captivity. Our rear and flanks entirely exposed, without other means of defence on that side than our pikes and cutlasses. The only bridge across the creek above us nearer the enemy than ourselves, and the creek only fordable at low water, with the tide then rising. I therefore ordered lieutenant Wadsworth to spike his guns and retire across the bridge, which was done in perfect order, the marines under lieutenant Watson covering their rear. Orders were given at the same time to fire the ship, spike the guns of the lower battery and join our companions across the creek. Before these orders were fully executed the enemy appeared on the hill from which our men just retired and were exposed to their fire for a short time while completing them. Retreating in front of them for about five hundred yards, we discovered it impossible to gain the bridge, forded the creek, ascended the opposite bank, and gained our companions without receiving the slightest injury from the ill-directed fire of the enemy. We continued our retreat towards Bangor when we found and retired upon a road leading to the Kennebec by a circuitous route of 65 miles. Perceiving it impossible to subsist our men in a body through a country almost destitute of inhabitants, they were ordered to repair to Portland as speedily as they might be able. The entire loss of all personal effects rendered us dependent on the generosity of the inhabitants between the Penobscot and Kennebec for subsistence—who most cheerfully and liberally supplied our wants to the utmost extent of their limited means. Our warmest thanks are also due to the inhabitants of Waterville, Augusta and Hallowell for their liberality and attention. Our loss was but one marine and one seaman made prisoners. That of the enemy was estimated at eight or ten killed, and from forty to fifty wounded, principally by the 18 pounder under charge of lieutenant Lewis of the United States artillery.

The character of my first lieutenant Wadsworth was already too well established to require the additional evidence he gave of richly deserving the entire confidence of the department and his country. His brother officers of the navy and marines, equally zealous and attentive, are equally entitled to my thanks and their country's approbation. The bravery of the seamen and marines is unquestioned, their uncommon good conduct upon their march—those feelings which induced them to rally round their flag at a distance of 200 miles from the place of their dispersion, without one instance of desertion, entitle them to particular approbation, and render them an example which their brother tars may ever be proud to emulate.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

C. MORRIS.

Honorable William Jones, secretary of the navy.

Miscellaneous Articles.

Copy of a letter from major-general Brown to the secretary of war, dated Head-Quarters, Fort Erie, September 22, 1814.

SIR—Among the officers lost to this army in the battle of Niagara Falls, was my aid-de-camp, captain Ambrose Spencer, who being mortally wounded, was left in the hands of the enemy. By flags from the British army, I was shortly afterwards assured of his convalescence, and an offer was made me by lieutenant-general Drummond to exchange him for his own aid, captain Loring, then a prisoner of war with us. However singular this proposition appeared, as captain Loring was not wounded, nor had received the slightest injury, I was willing to comply with it on captain Spencer's account; but as I knew his wounds were severe, I first sent to ascertain the fact of his being then living. My messenger, with a flag was detained, nor even once permitted to see captain S. though in his immediate vicinity. The evidence I wished to acquire failed, but my regard for captain Spencer would not permit me longer delay, and I informed general Drummond that his aid should be exchanged even for the body of mine. This offer was, no doubt, gladly accepted, and the corpse of captain S. sent to the American shore.

Indignant, as I am, at this ungenerous procedure, I yet hold myself bound in honor to lieutenant-general Drummond to return captain Loring; and must, therefore, earnestly solicit of you his immediate release. He can return to lieutenant-general Drummond by the way of Montreal.

Very respectfully, sir, your most obedient servant,

JAC. BROWN.

Hon. James Monroe, secretary of war.

NEGOCIATION.—An American gentleman who left the British fleet in the Potomac on Friday last, (says the "Baltimore Patriot" of the 4th inst.) was informed, that English papers of the 9th and 15th of August, had been received on board, and that the British commissioners had certainly sailed for Ghent to meet those appointed on the part of the United States.

Brown and Drummond. The latter with his "invincibles" ran away from his position near Fort Erie, in the night of the 22d ult. The soldiers of Wellington are becoming famous for night-retrograding. They ran away from Baltimore in the night—from Plattsburg in the night—and from Erie in the night! Brown, though able to beat them in maneuvering or at arms, was reported too weak to chase them. As they retired they destroyed the bridge at Frenchman's creek, and burnt the stores they had at that place, and are said to be fortifying at Chippewa, and on Queenstown mountain. We hope they have stopped!

The last exploit of general Brown is one of those incidents in "the sublime business of war," that excites unceasing admiration. A better planned or more gallantly executed affair never happened. The whole rested with the general himself until the moment it was to be performed—the batteries were stormed—4 or 500 killed and wounded, and 400 prisoners made; one 68lb carronade, one 10½ inch mortar, five 24 pounders, and a great magazine of powder were destroyed—and much ammunition seized which was afterwards brought away—in the space of twenty-five minutes. The like, perhaps, was hardly ever done before. Some interesting unofficial details shall be preserved.

LATEST FROM THE SOUTH. Gen. Jackson has laid an embargo on all the ports of the Mississippi, Mobile &c. He is at or near Mobile, with 1500 regulars and some militia, number not stated. It is said that the enemy has occupied Mobile Point, which stops the [water] communication with New-Orleans. The state's quota of militia and many volunteers were pouring towards them from patriotic Tennessee—a hardy and generous race of freemen. What Jackson's immediate designs really are, are unknown to his most confidential officers—but all is life and energy, and we expect some signal event. Preparations have been made for the defence of New-Orleans; the naval force commanded by "pupils of the gallant Porter" assisting. The 7th infantry is cantoned at the navy yard. It is expected that we shall be assisted to drive out the intruders by a large indian force—Creeks, Choctaws and Chickasaws.

THE ENEMY IN THE CHESAPEAKE.

Several of the enemy's vessels have left our bay. It is understood that Cochrane has gone to Halifax and Cockburn to Bermuda to collect and push forward all their disposable force, for a second attack upon hated BALTIMORE. The fleet in the Chesapeake lies chiefly off St. George's island, in the Potomac and consists of 5 ships of the line and 7 frigates, besides transports, brigs and tenders, and is commanded by vice adm. Malcolm. They are collecting provisions and water and recruiting the health of their men, who are said to be sickly. Several small parties of robbers from the fleet have been nabbed by the militia in St. Mary's county.—None of the troops have left the bay.

BALTIMORE. The works for defence are extensively improved every day. Parties of volunteers and many pay-laborers are employed to strengthen the former and erect new batteries, intrenchments, &c. The avowed object of the enemy is to collect a great force and pay us another visit. If he does, we have a full confidence that he will repent it. The following resolves were issued by the "Committee of Vigilance and Safety," on the 3d inst.

Resolved, That all free people of color, be and they are hereby ORDERED to attend daily, commencing with Wednesday morning, the 5th inst. at the different works erecting about the city for the purpose of laboring therein, and for which they shall receive an allowance of fifty cents per day together with a soldier's ration.

Resolved, That capt. George Stiles and captain Isaac Philips, be, and they are hereby authorised to enforce the preceding order, and to call to their aid the different military companies of exempts, or such other aid as may be necessary to its complete execution.

Resolved, That our fellow-citizens who are exempt from military duty, be, and they are hereby earnestly invited to labor on the fortifications either in person or by substitute, and in the latter case to furnish the substitutes with notes to the superintendants, requesting them to certify therein that the bearer had performed his duty.

Resolved, That the thanks of this committee be and they are hereby tendered to the military associations, who have volunteered their services to labor, and that the committee will be gratified by a continuance of military aid on the fortifications.

POSTSCRIPT.

Sir George Prevost with the greater part of the force he had at Plattsburg, has gone to Kingston, supposed to attack Sacketts-harbor. Izard's army had landed near the Genessee river. He went on and had an interview with Brown, and it was understood he would immediately march for Buffalo. It was expected he would have landed on the British shore. Drummond has probably escaped. The fleet has returned to Sacketts-harbor to assist its defence.

The Burlington Centinel of the 30th September, mentions a report brought there from Montreal, of intelligence by a late arrival at Quebec, that an armistice had been agreed upon by the commissioners for 90 days, and that the same was sent up by express to Sir George Prevost. This is possibly true; but the shape it comes in does not give us confidence in the report.

PROCLAMATION.

Whereas it appears, that the war, in which our country is unfortunately engaged, has assumed an entirely different character, since its first commencement, and has become almost exclusively defensive, and is prosecuted by the enemy with a spirit, unexampled pending negotiations for peace, which leaves no prospect of safety but in a manly and united determination to meet invasion at every point, and expel the invader.

And whereas, notwithstanding the signal and glorious naval victory lately achieved by our gallant commander McDonough and his brave officers and seamen, over a superior British naval force, on lake Champlain, and a like discomfiture of the enemy's whole land force, concentrated at Plattsburgh, by general Macomb's small but valiant band of regular troops, aided and powerfully supported by our patriotic, virtuous and brave volunteers, who flew to meet the invader with an alacrity and spirit unexampled in this or any other country, it is stated to me, that the British army is still on the frontier of our sister state, collecting and concentrating a powerful force, indicating further operations of aggression.

And whereas, the conflict has become a common and not a party concern, the time has now arrived when all degrading party distinctions and animosities, however we may have differed respecting the policy of declaring, or the mode of prosecuting the war, ought to be laid aside; that every heart may be stimulated, and every arm nerved, for the protection of our common country, our liberty, our altars and our firesides; in the defence of which we may, with a humble confidence; look to heaven for assistance and protection:

Now therefore, I Martin Chittenden, governor and commander in chief in and over the state of Vermont, do issue this my proclamation, earnestly exhorting all the good people of this state, by that love of country which so signally distinguished our fathers, in their glorious and successful struggle for our independence, to unite both heart and hand, in defence of our common interest, and every thing dear to freemen.

I do enjoin it upon all officers of divisions, brigades, regiments and companies of the militia of this state, to exert themselves in the execution of their respective duties, in placing those under their command in a complete state of readiness, and without further order, to march at a moment's warning to meet any invasion which may be attempted, and to chastise and expel the invader.

And I would earnestly recommend it to those, who, by the lenity of our laws are exempt from ordinary military duty, were they have not already done it, to organize themselves into companies, and equip and stand in readiness to meet the approaching crisis, reminding them that it is their property, themselves and their families that are, in common with others, to be protected.

And more especially, I would recommend it to the selectmen and civil authorities of the respective towns, to be vigilant in the execution of the duties enjoined on them in providing ammunition, and in affording such assistance to the militia as their situations may require.

After witnessing the severe and degrading terms imposed on many of our fellow citizens on the seaboard, no man, who is mindful of what he owes to his country and to his own character, can advocate submission while resistance is practicable.

The fate of Alexandria forcibly appeals to the proud feelings of every American, to exert the augmented force and resources with what it has pleased a beneficent Providence to bless us, for the defence and security of that soil and those rights, rendered inestimable by having been purchased by the blood of our fathers.

Given under my hand at Jerico, this 19th day September, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and fourteen, and of the independence of the United States the thirty-ninth.

MARTIN CHITTENDEN.

Legislature of New-York.

On the 27th ult. at 11 o'clock, his excellency the governor met both branches of the legislature in the assembly chamber, and delivered the following speech:

Gentlemen of the senate, and of the assembly—The extreme pressure of public business, and the peculiar emergencies of the war in which we are engaged, induced me to call this session of the legislature. At the close of the last session, a confident expectation prevailed, that existing hostilities would soon be terminated by a fair and honorable peace. Great Britain, it is true, had declined the proffered mediation of the emperor of Russia—yet, as far as professions could be relied on, she was still disposed to restore amicable relations between the two countries, upon satisfactory and mutual terms. Subsequent events, however, have shown, that such hopes were fallacious. Whether originally insincere in his professions, or flustered by the recent events in Europe, and the vast disposable forces they have left at his command, the enemy has certainly assumed a tone of arrogance, and a spirit of increased hostility, incompatible with feelings of reconciliation. The most palpable delays and evasions have been practised to defer a meeting of negotiators—while, in the meantime, large armaments have been despatched to our coast, and powerful armies collected on our frontiers, in the presumptuous hope of overwhelming us in a single campaign. A predatory and wanton warfare, destitute of all generous principle, and disgraced by pillage and conflagration, has been carried on in our bays and rivers; and the enemy has openly avowed his intention of laying waste our cities, and of making a common ruin of public and private property.

But, besides the general causes of alarm, our apprehensions have been more immediately awakened for our own security, and we have been called upon to exert all our forces to protect our own homes from desolation. From information received, and corroborated by the movements of the enemy, there were sufficient grounds of belief that one great object of his campaign was to penetrate, with his northern army, by the waters of lake Champlain and the Hudson, and, by a simultaneous attack with his maritime force on New York, to form a junction which should sever the communication of the states. To defeat this arrogant design, to save the state from inroad, and our cities from destruction, it was necessary, immediately, to exercise fuller powers and more ample resources than had been placed in my hands by the legislature. The exigency of the time, while it subjected the executive to great responsibility, admitted of no delay: I proceeded, therefore, to make such dispositions as were deemed indispensable to secure the exposed points against menaced invasion. To effect these objects, I found it necessary to transcend the authority and means vested in me by law; but I feel perfectly satisfied, that the legislature will approve and sanction what I have done. In the mean time, I have requested this session, for the purpose of devising further measures of security and defence, and of clothing some public officer with the requisite powers to carry them into effect. A particular detail of the steps which have been taken, and of those which appear to me essential for the future safety of our frontiers, will form the subject of a special communication.

When we reflect that the present campaign was one in which the enemy had threatened to visit us with his wrath, and to make us feel his power, we cannot but exult that thus far we have sustained the shock with firmness, and have even gathered laurels from the strife. He has, it is true, been able to maraud our sea board, and harass and ruin individuals. He has penetrated to our capital, feebly opposed by a hasty levy of undisciplined militia, and has wantonly demolished edifices and monuments of art, hitherto held sacred in all but barbarous warfare. But whenever we have met with him in fair and open contest, the result has been signally honorable to our arms. A series of brilliant actions, which shed lustre upon the Niagara army, has entitled its distinguished generals, Brown, Scott, Porter, Gaines and Ripley, and their brave associates, to the lasting gratitude of their country.

The gallant deeds of Porter, Warrington and Blakely, have well sustained the splendid character of our navy. At the invasion of Baltimore the foe was promptly met, was harassed in his approach, and fled back with heavy loss to his ships. But the late glorious triumph at Plattsburgh, for grandeur of circumstance and importance of effect, renders all encomium feeble and inadequate. This was the blow by which the enemy hoped to lay open our northern frontier. He advanced with confidence in the superiority of his land and naval forces, and counted on a certain victory. After a severe and bloody contest his whole fleet was conquered and captured in the sight of his astonishing army. His land troops were likewise discomfited and driven to precipitate and ignominious retreat before a handful of regulars under brigadier general Macomb, and an inconsiderable body of the militia and volunteers of New York and Vermont, under generals Moores and Strong. The conduct of our troops on that occasion, both in repulsing the powerful assaults of the enemy and in pursuing and harassing him in his retreat, reflects the highest honor on the commanding officers and their companions in arms.

The achievement of commodore Macdonough and his intrepid comrades is not surpassed in the records of naval history. It sheds glory on the nation at large; but its immediate benefits are more peculiarly felt by the states of New-York and Vermont. Permit me to recommend a prompt and public expression, by the constituted authorities of this state, of their high sense of the illustrious services of these brave men who have so eminently contributed to the safety and glory of the nation; and the presentation of some testimonial gratitude, worthy of the dignity of the state, and the acceptance of gallant and high minded heroes.

I have heretofore submitted to the consideration of the legislature, the propriety of relieving the poorer classes of the community from bearing that unreasonable proportion of the burthen of militia duty, to which they are subjected by the existing laws. I must be permitted to renew my solicitations upon that subject. The experience of this campaign has furnished abundant evidence of the unequal operation of the present system, and has shown the indispensable necessity of substituting property as the criterion of contribution to the public defence. We may then establish a more disposable, better disciplined, and more economical and efficient force, than can possibly be organized from militia at large hastily assembled, at a moment of hurry and alarm. The population and resources of this state enable us to place at the disposal of the nation, for the continuance of the war, ten thousand uniformed troops, and to reserve for local defence, ten thousand minute men, uniformed, equipped and disciplined, to take the field at a moment's warning, as a substitute for ordinary militia. It is, however, due to the militia of this state, to acknowledge, that they have repaired to their country's standard, whenever summoned, with promptness and alacrity; that they have cheerfully endured the hardships and privations of the camp, and that they have generally conducted themselves in action with the coolness and bravery of veteran troops.

Gentlemen—It is with heartfelt satisfaction, that I witness the unanimity and patriotic spirit that actuates all classes of the community. The acrimony of party has disappeared in the combined exertion for the maintenance of national honor and commonsafety. The present time will form a proud era in the history of this state. It will develop the vastness of her resources, the strength of her population, the intelligence and liberality of her legislative bodies, and the valor and patriotism of her citizens. She has it in her power to assume an attitude worthy of her intrinsic character; to set an example of open handed munificence that will challenge emulation; to impart vigor and effect to the national arm, and thus to secure and perpetuate the independence of the United States.

British Parliament.

HOUSE OF LORDS, SATURDAY, JULY 30.

The house met this morning at ten, when the royal assent was given to those bills which were passed since the last commission.

The speaker, attended by several members, soon after appeared at the bar, with the vote of credit bill in his hand, and after bowing to the prince regent, addressed his royal highness in the following terms:—

May it please your royal highness,

"We, his majesty's most dutiful and loyal subjects, the commons of Great Britain and Ireland, do now attend your royal highness with our last bill of supply for the service of the present year.

"Assembled at a period when the fate of Europe was still doubtful, and balanced by hopes and revessels, we have been anxious but not inactive spectators of those great transactions which have wrought so fortunate a change in the state of the civilized world.

"During this portentous interval, we have pursued our legislative labors according to our accustomed course, applying practical remedies to the practical evils incident to old establishments or arising out of new occurrences in some cases proceeding experimentally by laws of a limited duration: in others collecting such materials of information, as may lay the ground for future measures; and those who may come in after us will see traces of that progressive improvement which the sober habit of this country cautiously, but not reluctantly, adopts into the system of its domestic policy and jurisprudence.

"With respect to our financial arrangements, by the provident measures of a former session, we have been enabled to refrain from augmenting the burthens of the people, and at the same time to make our military exertions correspond with the scale of passing events.

"Whilst we have been thus employed, the destinies of Europe have been gradually unfolding before our eyes; and the powerful nations of the north, sending forth their collective strength to try the last issues of war, whilst Great Britain and her allies were, with equal vigor, advancing from the south, their joint efforts have at length accomplished the downfall of the greatest military despotism which, in modern days, has disgraced and desolated the earth.

"In these arduous struggles, we can look back, with just pride, on the discharge of our high duties. The British army, modelled upon a wise system, steadily and impartially administered at home, and conducted by consummate skill and valor in the field, has borne its complete share in the glorious conclusion of this long and eventful war, and his majesty's faithful commons have gladly lent their aid to maintain the honors and dignities of those illustrious commanders, whom the wisdom of the sovereign has called upon to surround his throne.

"In the peace which has since followed, the efforts of this country have not been less glorious. The wise and liberal policy of our government which announced justice and equality of rights to be the basis of our diplomatic system, has been happily sustained abroad. The British name now stands high in policy as in arms; and an enlightened people has justly applauded the firmness and temper which have conciliated and cemented the interests of allies, cheered the doubtful, animated the zealous, and united the deliverers and the delivered in a peace honorable and advantageous to all the contracting powers.

"The events of our own times have outrun the ordinary march of history. Peace restored, commerce revived, thrones re-established, afford the well-founded hope that the same councils and the same master-hand so mainly instrumental in the work hitherto accomplished, may, at the approaching congress, extend and fix the work of peace throughout Europe; and a further hope that the earnest and universal prayer of this great country, may prevail upon the nations of Europe, in re-establishing their own happiness, to concur also in putting an effectual end to the wrongs and desolation of Africa.

"Auspicious, however, as our present state may seem to be, the instability of all human affairs forbids us to be too confident of its prosperous continuance. Much yet remains to be done in Europe, and we have still one contest to maintain by war:

a war which we can never consent to terminate but by the establishment of our claims, according to the maxims of public law, and the maritime rights of this empire.

"To provide for these branches of the public service has been our last care, and the bill which I have to present to your royal highness, is entitled "an act for enabling his majesty to raise the sum of three millions for the service of Great Britain, and for applying the sum of 200,000*£*. British currency for the service of Ireland." To which bill your faithful commons, with all humility, entreat his majesty's royal assent."

The speaker then handed the vote of credit bill to the clerk, and the royal assent having been given thereto in the usual form, his royal highness the prince regent delivered the following speech:

"My lords and gentlemen,

"I cannot close this session of parliament, without repeating the expression of my deep regret at the continuance of his majesty's lamented indisposition.

"When, in consequence of that calamity, the powers of government were first entrusted to me, I found this country engaged in a war with the greater part of Europe.

"I determined to adhere to that line of policy which his majesty had adopted, and in which he had persevered under so many and in such trying difficulties.

"The zealous and unremitting support and assistance which I have received from you, and from all classes of his majesty's subjects; the consummate skill and ability displayed by the great commander, whose services you have so justly acknowledged; and the valor and intrepidity of his majesty's forces by sea and land have enabled me, under the blessing of Divine Providence, to surmount all the difficulties with which I have had to contend.

"I have the satisfaction of contemplating the full accomplishment of all those objects for which the war was either undertaken or continued; and the unexampled exertions of this country, combined with those of his majesty's allies, have succeeded in effecting the deliverance of Europe from the most galling and oppressive tyranny under which it has ever labored.

"The restoration of so many of the ancient and legitimate governments of the continent affords the best prospect of the permanence of that peace which in conjunction with his majesty's allies, I have concluded: and you may rely on my efforts being directed, at the approaching congress, to complete the settlement of Europe, which has been already so conspicuously begun; and to promote, upon principles of justice and impartiality, all those measures which may appear best calculated to secure the tranquility and happiness of all the nations engaged in the late war.

"I regret the continuance of hostilities with the United States of America. Notwithstanding the unprovoked aggressions of the government of that country, and the circumstances under which it took place, I am sincerely desirous of the restoration of peace between the two nations upon conditions honorable to both, but until this object can be obtained, I am persuaded you will see the necessity of my availing myself of the means now at my disposal, to prosecute the war with increased vigor."

"Gentlemen of the house of commons,

"I thank you for the liberal provision which you have made for the services of the present year.

"The circumstances under which the war in Eu-be garrisoned by a detachment of artillery, and the light troops under lieutenant colonel Appling and captain Sprout, will take post in the ravine near the assistant inspector general's marquee, when they come in, and will receive orders from the general.

The light artillery will take such position as will best annoy the columns of the enemy, keeping up constantly a brisk fire on them—they will also take post, when not employed, in the same ravine with the light troops.

Mr. Paris, captain of the artificers, will form a corps of rocketeers with his men—they will take the direction of the chief engineer. The artillery is to be considered a separate service and the officers of that arm are responsible to the commanding general for the correct exercise of their functions. The officers of engineers will give directions for additional defences and for repairs, as occasion may require, which it will be the duty of the several commandants to lend all the aid in their power to execute. Every man knowing his post and his duty, no excuse can be received for not executing with firmness and decision, all that may be required for a vigorous defence of the place.

By order of brig. gen. Macomb, commanding,
WM. R. DUNCAN, act. as. adj. gen.

The following summary will show the movements of the British army, and our measures of defence, from the first invasion, to the retreat of the enemy's principal force over the lines.

On the 31st of August the advance of the British army under general Brisbane, entered Champlain, and encamped on the north side of the Great Chazy river, and on the same day major general Mooers ordered out the militia of the counties of Clinton and Essex. The regiment from Clinton county, under lieutenant colonel Miller, immediately assembled, and on the 2d instant, took a position on the west road near the village of Chazy; and on the 3d general Wright with such of his brigade as had arrived, occupied a position on the same road about eight miles in advance of this place. On the 4th the enemy having brought up his main body to Champlain, took up his line of march for this place. The rifle corps under Lt. col. Appling, on the lake road, fell back as far as Dead creek, blocking up the road in such manner as to impede the advance of the enemy as much as possible. The enemy advanced on the 5th within a few miles of Lt. col. Appling's position and finding it too strong to attack, halted and caused a road to be made west into the Beekmantown road, in which the light brigade under gen. Powers advanced, and on the morning of the 6th about 7 o'clock attacked the militia, which had at this time increased to nearly 700, under general Mooers, and a small detachment of regulars under major Wool, about 7 miles from this place. After the first fire, a considerable part of the militia broke and fled in every direction. Many however manfully stood their ground, and, with the small corps of major Wool, bravely contested the ground, against five times their number, falling back gradually and occupying the fences on each side the road, till they arrived within a mile of the town, when they were reinforced by two pieces of artillery under captain Leonard, and our troops occupying a strong position behind a stone wall, for some time stopped the progress of the enemy: being at length compelled to retire, they contested every inch of ground until they reached the south bank of the Saranac, where the enemy attempted to pursue them but was repulsed with loss. The loss of the British in this skirmish was colonel Wellington and a lieutenant, of the 3d Buffs and 2 lieutenants of the 58th killed, and one captain and one lieutenant of the 58th light company wounded, together with about 100 privates killed and wounded; while that on our part did not exceed twenty five. The corps of riflemen under col. Appling, and detachment under cap. Sprout, fell back from their position at Dead creek in time to join the militia, &c. just before they entered the village and fought with their accustomed bravery. The British got possession of that part of the village north of the Saranac about 11 o'clock, but the incessant and well directed fire of our artillery and musketry from the forts and opposite bank compelled them to retire before night beyond the reach of our guns. The enemy arrived towards night with his heavy artillery and baggage on the lake road and crossed the beach, where he met with a warm reception from our row-galleys, and it is believed suffered a heavy loss in killed and wounded. On our side lieutenant Duncan, of the navy, lost an arm by a rocket, and three or four men were killed by the enemy's artillery. The enemy encamped on the ridge west of the town, his right near the river, and occupying an extent of nearly three miles, his left resting on the lake, about a mile north of the village. From the 6th until the morning of the 11th, an almost continual skirmishing was kept up between the enemy's pickets and our militia stationed on the river, and in the mean time both armies were busily engaged—ours in strengthening the works of the forts, and that of the enemy in erecting batteries, collecting ladders, bringing up his heavy ordnance, and making other preparations for attacking the fort. On the morning of the 7th a body of the enemy under captain Noadie, attempted to cross at the upper bridge, about seven miles west of the village, but were met by captain Vaughan's company of about 25 men, and compelled to retire with the loss of two killed and several wounded, (one officer shot in the ankle.) On the morning of the 11th the enemy's fleet came round the Head with a light breeze from the north, and attacked ours which lay at anchor in Cumberland-bay, two miles from shore, east of the fort. The action was long and bloody, but decisive, and the event such as we believe it will always be (except by accident) when our navy contends with any thing like an equal force. The enemy commenced a simultaneous bombardment of our works from seven batteries, from which several hundred shells and rockets were discharged, which did us very little injury; and our artillery had nearly succeeded in silencing all before the contest on the Lake was decided. The enemy attempted at the same time to throw his main body in rear of the fort, by crossing the river three miles west of the town, near the site of Pike's cantonment. He succeeded in crossing after a brave resistance by the Essex militia and a few of the Vermont Volunteers, in all about 350 stationed at that place, who retired back a mile and a half from the river continually pouring in upon them an incessant fire from behind every tree, until lieutenant Sumpter brought up a piece of artillery to their support, when the enemy commenced a precipitate retreat. The Vermont volunteers, who had hastened to the scene of action on the first alarm, fell upon the enemy's left flank and succeeded in making many prisoners, including three officers. Had the British remained on the south side of the river 30 minutes longer, they must have lost nearly the whole detachment that crossed. Our loss in this affair was five killed and eight or ten wounded, some mortally. Immediately on ascertaining the loss of the fleet, sir George ordered preparations to be made for the retreat of the army and set off himself with a small escort for Canada. Little after noon. The main body of the enemy with the artillery and baggage, were taken off in the afternoon and night, and the rear guard, consisting of the light brigade, started at daybreak, and made a precipitate retreat, leaving their wounded and a large quantity of provisions, fixed ammunition, shot, shells, and other public stores in the different places of deposit about their camp. They were pursued some distance by our troops and many prisoners taken; but owing to the very heavy and incessant rain we were compelled to return. The enemy have lost upon land more than one thousand men in killed, wounded, prisoners and deserters, while our aggregate loss does not exceed one hundred and fifty.

New-York State Militia—Third Division.

Head Quarters Salmon River, Sept. 8th, 1814.

EXTRACT FROM GENERAL ORDERS.

The general is not insensible to the merits and patriotism of those who, upon approach of hostile forces upon this frontier, have gallantly flown to the defence of their country, and who under his command still continue steadfastly to oppose the progress of the enemy. The general regrets that there are some who are lost to patriotism and to honor, after coming forward in obedience to his call, fled at the first approach of the enemy, and afterwards basely disbanded themselves and returned home; thereby disgracing themselves, and furnishing to their fellow-foldiers an example of all that brave men detest and abhor.

The general is determined to have all deserters punished in the most exemplary manner, and all officers and others are directed to bring back such as are attempting to escape.

Those brave men of the militia and volunteer corps, who manfully kept their posts and fought the enemy on their retreat before a far superior force, for the distance of nearly seven miles, deserve the general's warmest thanks and the love and gratitude of their country.

The cool, intrepid and admirable skill and good order displayed by the small detachment of less than three hundred regulars, under that excellent officer major Wool, was highly honorable to themselves, and furnishes an example worthy of our future imitation.

The general cannot avoid noticing that the determined resistance of capt. Vaughan and his small band, at the upper bridge, which obliged a much superior force of the enemy to retire with loss, was both honorable to himself and the men under his command.

Captain Aikin's company of riflemen, and others of the volunteers have displayed throughout, a degree of gallantry in opposing the enemy, and of enterprise and boldness in reconnoitring him under all circumstances, highly gratifying to the general, and which merits his warmest thanks.

Let every man strive to do his duty at this crisis, as it will be much easier to retain our present position than to regain it after it is lost. By order of maj. gen. Mooers,

R. H. WALWORTH, A. D. C.

Third Division of the Militia of the state of N. York.

H. Q. Plattsburgh, Sept. 13th, 1814.

GENERAL ORDERS.

The sudden, unexpected and dastardly retreat of the enemy, renders it unnecessary that those patriotic militia and volunteers who have so gallantly defended their country from invasion should longer be detained from their homes—the general therefore makes known to the militia under his command and the volunteers of the state of Vermont, that they may return to their homes with the thanks of the general and the reflection that they have deserved the gratitude of their country. Those few who basely deserted their standard and returned to their homes, without leave, in time of danger, will meet their reward by being despised as cowards, not deserving to be freemen. Had the enemy remained a day or two longer we should have been enabled to have carried trouble and confusion into his camp. The spirit and emulation of the volunteers show to their country and to the enemy what may be expected in case of any future invasion on this frontier. The general tenders his thanks to general Strong and the officers and volunteers of the state of Vermont in general, for their promptness to meet the enemy on all occasions and on the shortest notice.

And he congratulates all who have been under his command, as well as his country, on the defeat, discomfiture and disgrace of the enemy, in his attack on this place both by water and land.

By order of major gen. Mooers.

HIGHLY IMPORTANT.

The following message was on Monday last sent to both houses of congress, by the president of the United States. The sentiments it excited in both houses were purely national, and almost unanimous.

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States,

I lay before congress communications just received from the plenipotentiaries of the United States, charged with negotiating peace with Great Britain; shewing the conditions on which alone that government is willing to put an end to the war.

The instructions to those plenipotentiaries, disclosing the grounds, on which they were authorised to negotiate and conclude a treaty of peace, will be the subject of another communication.

JAMES MADISON.

Washington, October 10, 1814.

DOCUMENTS.

Copy of a letter from Messrs. Adams, Bayard, Clay and Russell, to Mr. Monroe, secretary of state, dated Ghent, 12th August, 1814.

SIR—We have the honor to inform you that the British commissioners, lord Gambier, Henry Goulburn, esquire, and William Adams, esquire, arrived in this city on Saturday evening, the sixth instant. The day after their arrival, Mr. Baker, their secretary, called upon us to give us notice of the fact, and to propose a meeting, at a certain hour, on the ensuing day. The place having been agreed upon, we accordingly met, at one o'clock, on Monday, the eighth inst.

We enclose, herewith, a copy of the full powers exhibited by the British commissioners at that conference, which was opened on their part by an expression of the sincere and earnest desire of their government, that the negotiation might result in a solid peace, honorable to both parties. They, at the same time, declared, that no events which had occurred since the first proposal for this negotiation, had altered the pacific disposition of their government, or varied its views as to the terms upon which it was willing to conclude the peace.

We answered, that we heard these declarations with great satisfaction, and that our government had acceded to the proposal of negotiation; with the most sincere desire to put an end to the differences which divided the two countries, and to lay upon just and liberal grounds the foundation of a peace which, securing the rights and interests of both nations, should unite them by lasting bonds of amity.

The British commissioners then stated the following subjects, as those upon which it appeared to them that the discussions would be likely to turn, and on which they were instructed.

1. The forcible seizure of mariners on board of merchant vessels, and in connection with it, the claim of his Britannic majesty to the allegiance of all the native subjects of Great Britain.

We understood them to intimate, that the British government did not propose this point as one which they were particularly desirous of discussing; but that, as it had occupied so prominent a place in the disputes between the two countries, it necessarily attracted notice and was considered as a subject which would come under discussion.

2. The Indian allies of Great Britain to be included in the pacification, and a definite boundary to be settled for their territory.

The British commissioners stated, that an arrangement upon this point was a sine qua non; that they were not authorized to conclude a treaty of peace which did not embrace the Indians, as allies of his Britannic majesty; and that the establishment of a definite boundary of the Indian territory was necessary to secure a permanent peace, not only with the Indians, but also between the United States and Great Britain.

3. A revision of the boundary line between the United States and the adjacent British colonies.

With respect to this point, they expressly disclaim any intention, on the part of their government, to acquire an increase of territory, and represented the proposed revision as intended merely for the purpose of preventing uncertainty and dispute.

After having stated these three points, as subjects of discussion, the British commissioners added, that before they desired any answer from us, they felt it incumbent upon them to declare, that the British government did not deny the right of the Americans to the fisheries generally, or in the open seas; but that the privileges, formerly granted by treaty to the United States, of fishing within the limits of the British jurisdiction, and of landing and drying fish on the shores of the British territories, would not be renewed without an equivalent.

The extent of what was considered by them as waters peculiarly British, was not stated. From the manner in which they brought this subject into view, they seemed to wish us to understand that they were not anxious that it should be discussed, and that they only intended to give us notice that these privileges had ceased to exist, and would not be again granted without an equivalent, nor unless we thought proper to provide expressly in the treaty of peace for their renewal.

The British commissioners having stated, that these were all the subjects which they intended to bring forward or to suggest, requested to be informed, whether we were instructed to enter into negotiation on these several points? and, whether there was any amongst these which we thought it unnecessary to bring into the negotiation? and they desired us to state, on our part, such other subjects as we might intend to propose for discussion in the course of the negotiation. The meeting was then adjourned to the next day, in order to afford us the opportunity of consultation among ourselves, before we gave an answer.

In the course of the evening of the same day, we received your letters of the 25th and 27th of June.

There could be no hesitation, on our part, in informing the British commissioners, that we were not instructed on the subjects of Indian pacification or boundary, and of fisheries. Nor did it seem probable, although neither of these points had been stated with sufficient precision in that first verbal conference, that they could be admitted in any shape.—We did not wish, however, to prejudge the result, or by any hasty proceeding abruptly to break off the negotiation. It was not impossible that, on the subject of the Indians, the British government had received erroneous impressions from the Indian traders in Canada, which our representations might remove: And it appeared, at all events, important, to ascertain distinctly the precise intentions of Great Britain on both points. We, therefore, thought it advisable to invite the British commissioners to a general conversation on all the points; stating to them, at the same time, our want of instructions on two of them, and holding out no expectation of the probability of our agreeing to any article respecting them.

At our meeting on the ensuing day we informed the British commissioners, that upon the first and third points proposed by them we were provided with instructions, and we presented as further subjects considered by our government as suitable for discussion:

1st. A definition of blockade; and as far as might be mutually agreed of other neutral and belligerent rights.

2d. Claims of indemnity in certain cases of capture and seizure.

We then stated that the two subjects, 1st. of Indian pacification, and boundary, and 2d. of fisheries, were not embraced by our instructions.

We observed, that as these points had not been heretofore the grounds of any controversy between the government of Great Britain and that of the United States, and had not been alluded to by Lord Castlereagh, in his letter proposing the negotiation, it could not be expected that they should have been anticipated and made the subject of instructions by our government: that it was natural to be supposed, that our instructions were confined to those subjects upon which differences between the two countries were known to exist; and that the proposition to define, in a treaty between the United States and Great Britain, the boundary of the Indian possessions within our territories, was new and without example. No such provision had been inserted in the treaty of peace in 1783, nor in any other treaty between the two countries. No such provision had, to our knowledge, ever been inserted in any treaty made by Great Britain or any European power in relation to the same description of people, existing under like circumstances. We would say, however, that it would not be doubted, that peace with the Indians would certainly follow a peace with Great Britain: that we had information that commissioners had already been appointed to treat with them; that a treaty to that effect might, perhaps, have been already concluded: and that the United States having no interest, nor any motive to continue a separate war against the Indians, there could never be moment when our government would not be disposed to make peace with them.

We then expressed our wish to receive from the British commissioners a statement of the views and objects of Great Britain upon all the points, and our willingness to discuss them all, in order that, even if no arrangement should be agreed on, upon the points not included in our instructions, the government of the United States might be possessed of the entire and precise intentions of that of Great Britain, respecting these points, and that the British government might be fully informed of the objections, on the part of the United States, to any such arrangement.

In answer to our remark that these points had not been alluded to by lord Castlereagh, in his letter proposing the negotiation, it was said, that it could not be expected, that, in a letter merely intended to invite a negotiation, he should enumerate the topics of discussion, or state the pretensions of his government; since these would depend upon ulterior events, and might arise out of a subsequent state of things.

In reply to our observation, that the proposed stipulation of an Indian boundary was without example in the practice of European nations, it was asserted, that the Indians must in some sort be considered as an independent people, since treaties were made with them, both by Great Britain and by the United States; upon which we pointed out the obvious and important differences between the treaties we might make with Indians, living in our territory, and such a treaty as was proposed to be made, respecting them, with a foreign power, who had solemnly acknowledged the territory on which they resided to be part of the United States.

We were then asked by the British commissioners whether, in case they should enter further upon the discussion of the several points which had been stated, we could expect that it would terminate by some provisional arrangement on the points on which we had no instructions, particularly on that respecting the Indians, which arrangement would be subject to the ratification of our government?

We answered, that before the subjects were distinctly understood, and the objects in view more precisely disclosed, we could not decide whether it would be possible to form any satisfactory article on the subject; nor pledge ourselves as to the exercise of a discretion under our powers, even with respect to a provisional agreement. We added, that as we should deeply deplore a rupture of the negotiation on any point, it was our anxious desire to employ all possible means to avert an event so serious in its consequences; and that we had not been without hopes that a discussion might correct the effect of any erroneous information which the British government might have received on the subject which they had proposed as a preliminary basis.

We took this opportunity to remark, that no nation observed a policy more liberal and humane towards the Indians than that pursued by the United States; that our object had been, by all practicable means, to introduce civilization amongst them; that their possessions were secured to them by well defined boundaries, that their persons, lands and other property were now more effectually protected against violence or frauds from any quarter, than they had been under any former government; that even our citizens were not allowed to purchase their lands; that when they gave up their title to any portion of their country to the United States, it was by voluntary treaty with our government, who gave them a satisfactory equivalent; and that through these means the United States had succeeded in preserving, since the treaty of Grenville of 1793, an uninterrupted peace of sixteen years, with all the Indian tribes; a period of tranquility much longer than they were known to have enjoyed heretofore.

It was then expressly stated on our part, that the proposition respecting the Indians, was not distinctly understood. We asked whether the pacification, and the settlement of a boundary for them were both made a sine qua non? Which was answered in the affirmative. The question was then asked the British commissioners, whether the proposed Indian boundary was intended to preclude the United States from the right of purchasing by treaty from the Indians, without the consent of Great Britain, lands lying beyond that boundary? And as a restriction upon the Indians from selling by amicable treaties lands to the United States as had been hitherto practised?

To this question, it was first answered by one of the commissioners, that the Indians would not be restricted from selling their lands, but that the United States would be restricted from purchasing them; and on reflection another of the commissioners stated, that it was intended that the Indian territories should be a barrier between the British dominions and those of the United States; that both Great Britain and the United States should be restricted from purchasing their lands; but the Indians might sell them to a third party.

The proposition respecting Indian boundary thus explained, and connected with the right of sovereignty ascribed to the Indians over the country, amounted to nothing less than a demand of the absolute cession of the rights both of sovereignty and of soil. We cannot abstain from remarking to you, that the subject (of Indian boundary) was indistinctly stated when first proposed, and that the explanations were at first obscure and always given with reluctance. And it was declared from the first moment, to be a sine qua non, rendering any discussion unprofitable until it was admitted as a basis. Knowing that we had no power to cede to the Indians any part of our territory, we thought it unnecessary to ask, what probably would not have been answered till the principle was admitted, where the line of demarkation of the Indian country was proposed to be established?

The British commissioners, after having repeated that their instructions on the subject of the Indians were peremptory, stated that unless we could give some assurance, that our powers would allow us to make at least a provisional arrangement on the subject, any further discussion would be fruitless, and that they must consult their own government on this state of things. They proposed accordingly a suspension of the conferences, until they should have received an answer, it being understood that each party might call a meeting whenever they had any proposition to submit. They despatched a special messenger the same evening, and we are now waiting for the result.

Before the proposed adjournment took place, it was agreed, that there should be a protocol of the conferences; that a statement should for that purpose be drawn up by each party, and that we should meet the next day to compare the statements. We accordingly met again on Wednesday the 10th inst. and ultimately agreed upon what should constitute the protocol of the conferences. A copy of this instrument, we have the honor to transmit with this despatch; and we also enclose a copy of the statement originally drawn up on our part, for the purpose of making known to you the passages to which the British commissioners objected.

Their objection to some of the passages was, that they appeared to be argumentative, and that the object of the protocol was to contain a mere statement of facts. They, however, objected to the insertion of the answer which they had given to our question respecting the effect of the proposed Indian boundary; but they agreed to an alteration of their original proposition on that subject, which renders it much more explicit than as stated, either in the first conference or in their proposed draught of the protocol. They also objected to the insertion of the fact, that they had proposed to adjourn the conferences, until they could obtain further instructions from their government. The return of their messenger may, perhaps, disclose the motive of their reluctance in that respect.

PROTOCOL OF CONFERENCE.

August 8th, 1814.

The British and American commissioners having met, their full powers were respectively produced, which were found satisfactory, and copies thereof were exchanged.

The British commissioners stated the following subjects as those upon which it appeared to them that the discussions between themselves and the American commissioners, would be likely to turn.

1. The forcible seizure of mariners from on board merchant ships on the high seas; and in connection with it the right of the king of Great Britain to the allegiance of all his native subjects.

2. That the peace be extended to the Indian allies of Great Britain, and that the boundary of their territory be definitively marked out, as a permanent barrier between the dominions of Great Britain and the United States. An arrangement on this subject to be a sine qua non of a treaty of peace.

3. A revision of the boundary line between the British and American territories, with the view to prevent future uncertainty and dispute.

The British commissioners requested information whether the American commissioners were instructed to enter into negotiation on the above points? But before they desired any answer, they felt it right to communicate the intentions of their government as to the North American fisheries, viz. That the British government did not intend to grant to the United States, gratuitously, the privileges formerly granted by treaty to them, of fishing within the limits of the British sovereignty and of using the shores of the British territories for purposes connected with the fisheries.

August 9.

The meeting being adjourned to the 9th of August the commissioners met again on that day.

The American commissioners at this meeting stated, that upon the first and third points proposed by the British commissioners, they were provided with instructions from their government, and that the second and fourth of these points were not provided for in their instructions. That in relation to an Indian pacification, they knew that the government of the United States had appointed commissioners to treat of peace with the Indians, and that it was not improbable that peace had been made with them.

The American commissioners presented as further subjects considered by the government of the United States as suitable for discussion.

1. A definition of blockade, and as far as may be agreed, of other neutral and belligerent rights.

2. Certain claims of indemnity to individuals for captures and seizures preceding and subsequent to the war.

3. They further stated that there were various other points to which their instructions extended, which might with propriety be objects of discussion, either in the negotiation of the peace, or in that of a treaty of commerce, which in the case of a propitious termination of the present conferences they were likewise authorised to conclude. That for the purpose of facilitating the first and most essential object of peace, they had discarded every subject which was not considered as peculiarly connected with that, and presented only those points which appeared to be immediately relevant to this negotiation.

The American commissioners expressed their wish to receive from the British commissioners a statement of the views and objects of Great Britain, upon all the points, and their willingness to discuss them all.

They, the American commissioners were asked, whether, if those of Great Britain should enter further upon this discussion, particularly respecting the Indian boundary, the American commissioners could expect that it would terminate by some provisional arrangement, which they could conclude, subject to the ratification of their government?

They answered, that as any arrangement to which they could agree upon the subject must be without specific authority from their government, it was not possible for them, previous to discussion, to decide whether any article on the subject could be formed which would be mutually satisfactory, and to which they should think themselves, under their discretionary powers, justified in acceding.

The meeting was adjourned.

Draught of original protocol made by the American ministers, of the two first conferences held with the British commissioners.

At a meeting between the commissioners of his Britannic majesty and those of the United States of America, for negotiating and concluding a peace, held at Ghent, 8th August, 1814, the following points were presented by the commissioners on the part of Great Britain as subjects for discussion:

1. The forcible seizure of mariners on board of merchant vessels, and the claim of allegiance of his Britannic majesty upon all the native born subjects of Great Britain.

2. The Indian allies of Great Britain to be included in the pacification, and a boundary to be settled between the dominions of the Indians and those of the United States. Both parts of this point are considered by the British government as a sine qua non to the conclusion of a treaty.

3. The revision of the boundary line between the territories of the United States and those of Great Britain, adjoining them in North America.

4. The Fisheries—Respecting which the British government will not allow the people of the United States the privilege of landing and drying fish, within the territorial jurisdiction of Great Britain, without an equivalent.

The American commissioners were requested to say, whether their instructions from their government authorised them to treat upon these several points; and to state on their part such other points as they might be further instructed to propose for discussion.

The meeting was adjourned on Tuesday, the 9th August, on which day the commissioners met again.

The American commissioners at this meeting stated, that upon the first and third points proposed by the British commissioners, they were provided with instructions from their government; and that on the second and fourth of those points, there not having existed heretofore any differences between the two governments, they had not been anticipated by the government of the United States, and were therefore, not provided for in their instructions.—That in relation to an Indian pacification, they knew that the government of the United States had appointed commissioners to treat of peace with the Indians; and that it was not improbable that peace had been made with them.

The American commissioners presented as further points (subjects) considered by the government of the United States as suitable for discussion.

1. A definition of blockade, and, as far as may be agreed, of other neutral and belligerent rights.
2. Certain claims of indemnity to individuals for captures and seizures, preceding and subsequent to the war.
3. They further stated, that there were various other points to which their instructions extended, which might with propriety be objects of discussion, either in the negotiation of the peace or in that of a treaty of commerce, which in case of a propitious termination of the present conferences they were likewise authorised to conclude.

That for the purpose of facilitating the first and most essential object of peace, they had discarded every subject which was not considered as peculiarly connected with that, and presented only those points, which appeared to be immediately relevant to this negotiation.

The American commissioners expressed their wish to receive from the British commissioners a statement of the views and objects of Great Britain upon all the points, and their willingness to discuss them all, in order that if no arrangement could be agreed to upon the points not in their instructions, which would come within the scope of the powers committed to their discretion, the government of the United States might be put in possession of the entire and precise intentions of that of Great Britain with regard to such points; and that the British government might be fully informed of the objections on the part of the United States to any such arrangement.

They, the American commissioners, were asked whether, if those of Great Britain should enter further upon the discussion, particularly respecting the Indian boundary, the American commissioners could expect it would terminate by some provisional arrangement which they could conclude, subject to the ratification of their government?

They answered, that as any arrangement to which they could agree upon the subject must be without specific authority from their government, it was not possible for them previous to discussion to decide whether an article on the subject could be formed which would be mutually satisfactory, and to which they should think themselves under the discretionary powers, justified in acceding.

The British commissioners declined entering upon the discussion, unless the American commissioners would say, that they considered it within their discretion to make a provisional arrangement on the subject, conformable to the view of it prescribed by the British government, and proposed to adjourn the conferences for the purpose of consulting their own government on this state of things.

The British commissioners were asked, whether it was understood as an effect of the proposed boundary for the Indians, that the United States would be precluded from the right of purchasing territory from the Indians within that boundary by amicable treaty with the Indians themselves, without the consent of Great Britain? And whether it was understood to operate as a restriction upon the Indians from settling by such amicable treaties, lands to the United States, as has been hitherto practised?

They answered, that it was understood, that the Indian territories should be a barrier between the British possessions and those of the United States; that the United States and Great Britain should both be restricted from such purchases of land; but that the Indians would not be restricted from selling to any third party.

The meeting was adjourned to Wednesday 10th August.

Sec. to the mission extraordinary.

Messrs. Adams, Bayard, Clay, Russell, and Gallatin to Mr. Monroe, secretary of state, dated

GHENT, 19th AUGUST, 1814.

SIR—Mr. Baker, secretary to the British mission, called upon us to-day, at 1 o'clock, and invited us to a conference to be held at three. This was agreed to, and the British commissioners opened it, by saying that they had received their further instructions this morning, and had not lost a moment in requesting a meeting for the purpose of communicating the decision of their government. It is proper to notice that Lord Castlereagh had arrived last night in this city, whence, it is said, he will depart to-morrow on his way to Brussels and Vienna.

The British commissioners stated that their government had felt some surprize, that we were not instructed respecting the Indians, as it could not have been expected that they would leave their allies, in their comparatively weak situation, exposed to our resentment. Great Britain might justly have supposed that the American government would have furnished us with instructions authorising us to agree to a positive article on the subject; but, the least she could demand was that we should sign a provisional article admitting the principle, subject to the ratification of our government; so that, if it should be ratified, the treaty should take effect; and, if not, that it should be null and void; on our assent or refusal to admit such an article would depend the continuance or suspension of the negotiation.

As we had represented that the proposition made by them, on that subject, was not sufficiently explicit, their government had directed them to give us every necessary explanation, and to state distinctly the basis which must be considered as an indispensable preliminary.

It was a sine qua non that the Indians should be included in the pacification, and, as incident thereto, that the boundaries of their territory should be permanently established. Peace with the Indians was a subject so simple, as to require no comment. With respect to the boundaries which was to divide their territory from that of the United States, the object of the British government was, that the Indians should remain as a permanent barrier between our western settlements, and the adjacent British provinces, to prevent them from being continuous to each other: and that neither the United States, nor Great Britain, should ever hereafter have the right to purchase, or acquire any part of the territory thus recognized, as belonging to the Indians. With regard to the extent of the Indian territory, and the boundary line, the British government would propose the lines of the Greenville treaty, as a proper basis, subject, however, to discussion and modifications.

We stated that the Indian territory, according to these lines, would comprehend a great number of American citizens; not less, perhaps, than a hundred thousand: and asked, what was the intention of the British government respecting them, and under whose government they would fall? It was answered that those settlements would be taken into consideration, when the line became a subject of discussion; but that such of the inhabitants, as would ultimately be included within the Indian territory, must make their own arrangements and provide for themselves.

The British commissioners here said that, considering the importance of the question we had to decide, (that of agreeing to a provisional article) their government had thought it right, that we should also be fully informed of its views, with respect to the proposed revision of the boundary line, between the dominions of Great Britain and the United States.

1st. Experience had proved that the joint possession of the lakes, and a right common to both nations to keep up a naval force on them, necessarily produced collisions, and rendered peace insecure. As Great Britain could not be supposed to expect to make conquests in that quarter, and as that province was essentially weaker than the United States, and exposed to invasion, it was necessary, for its security, that Great Britain should require that the United States should hereafter keep no armed naval force on the Western Lakes, from Lake Ontario to Lake Superior, both inclusive; that they should not erect any fortified or military post or establishment on the shores of those lakes; and that they should not maintain those which were already existing. This must, they said, be considered as a moderate demand, since Great Britain, if she had not disclaimed the intention of any increase of territory, might with propriety have asked a cession of the adjacent American shores. The commercial navigation and intercourse would be left on the same footing as heretofore. It was expressly stated, (in answer to a question we asked,) that Great Britain was to retain the right of having an armed naval force on those lakes, and of holding military posts and establishments on their shores.

2. The boundary line west of lake Superior, and thence to the Mississippi, to be revised and the treaty right of Great Britain to the navigation of the Mississippi, to be continued. When asked, whether they did not mean the line from the lake of the Woods to the Mississippi, the British commissioners repeated that they meant the line from lake Superior, to that river.

3. A direct communication from Halifax and the province of New-Brunswick to Quebec, to be secured to Great Britain. In answer to our question, in what manner this was to be effected, we were told that it must be done by a cession to Great Britain of that portion of the district of Maine (in the state of Massachusetts) which intervenes between New-Brunswick and Quebec, and prevents that direct communication.

Reverting to the proposed provisional article, respecting the Indian pacification and boundary, the British commissioners concluded by stating to us, that if the conferences should be suspended by our refusal to agree to such an article, without having obtained further instructions from our government, Great Britain would not consider herself bound to abide by the terms which she now offered, but would be at liberty to vary and regulate her demands according to subsequent events, and in such manner as the state of the war, at the time of renewing the negotiations, might warrant.

We asked whether the statement made, respecting the proposed revision of the boundary line between the United States and the dominions of Great Britain, embraced all the objects she meant to bring forward for discussion, and what were, particularly, her views with respect to Moose island, and such other islands in the bay of Passamaquoddy, as had been in our possession till the present war, but had been lately captured? We were answered, that those islands, belonging of right to Great Britain, (as much so, one if the commissioners said, as Northamptonshire,) they would certainly be kept by her, and were not even supposed to be an object of discussion.

From the forcible manner in which the demand, that the United States should keep no naval armed force on the lakes, nor any military post on their shores, has been brought forward, we were induced to inquire whether this condition was also meant as a sine qua non? To this the British commissioners declined giving a positive answer. They said that they had been sufficiently explicit; that they had given us one sine qua non, and when we had disposed of that, it would be time enough to give us an answer as to another.

We then stated that, considering the nature and importance of the communication made this day, we wished the British commissioners to reduce their proposals to writing, before we gave them an answer; this they agreed to and promised to send us an official note without delay.

We need hardly say that the demands of Great Britain will receive from us an unanimous and decided negative. We do not deem it necessary to detain the John Adams for the purpose of transmitting to you the official notes which may pass on the subject and close the negotiation. And we have felt it our duty immediately to apprise you, by this hasty, but correct sketch of our last conference, that there is not at present, any hope of peace.

We have the honor to be, sir, with perfect respect, your obedient servants,

JOHN QUINCY ADAMS,
J. A. BAYARD,

Note of the British commissioners. Received after the above letter was written.

The undersigned, plenipotentiaries of his Britannic majesty, do themselves the honor of acquainting the Plenipotentiaries of the United States, that they have communicated to their court the result of the conference which they had the honor of holding with them upon the 9th instant, in which they stated, that they were unprovided with any specific instructions, as to comprehending the Indian nations in a treaty of peace to be made with Great Britain, and as to defining a boundary to the Indian territory.

The undersigned are instructed to acquaint the plenipotentiaries of the United States, that his majesty's government having at the outset of the negotiation, with a view to the speedy restoration of peace, reduced as far as possible the number of points to be discussed, and having professed themselves willing to forego on some important topics any stipulation to the advantage of Great Britain, cannot but feel some surprise that the government of the United States should not have furnished their plenipotentiaries with instructions upon those points which could hardly fail to come under discussion.

Under the inability of the American plenipotentiaries, to conclude any article upon the subject of Indian pacification and Indian boundary, which shall bind the government of the United States, his majesty's government conceive that they cannot give a better proof of their sincere desire for the restoration of peace, than by professing their willingness to accept a provisional article upon those heads, in the event of the American plenipotentiaries considering themselves authorised to accede to the general principles, upon which such an article ought to be founded. With a view to enable the American plenipotentiaries to decide, how far the conclusion of such an article is within the limit of their general direction, the undersigned are directed to state, fully and distinctly, the bases upon which alone Great Britain sees any prospect of advantage in the continuance of the negotiations at the present time.

The undersigned have already had the honor of stating to the American plenipotentiaries, that in considering the points above referred to, as a sine qua non of any treaty of peace, the view of the British government is the permanent tranquility and security of the Indian nations, and the prevention of those jealousies and irritations, to which the frequent alteration of the Indian limits has heretofore given rise.

For this purpose it is indispensably necessary, that the Indian nations who have been during the war in alliance with Great Britain should, at the termination of the war, be included in the pacification.

It is equally necessary, that a definite boundary should be assigned to the Indians, and that the contracting parties should guarantee the integrity of their territory, by a mutual stipulation, not to acquire by purchase, or otherwise, any territory within the specified limits. The British government are willing to take, as the basis of an article on this subject, those stipulations of the treaty of Grenville, subject to modifications, which relate to a boundary line.

As the undersigned are desirous of stating every point in connection with the subject, which may reasonably influence the decision of the American plenipotentiaries in the exercise of their discretion, they avail themselves of this opportunity to repeat what they have already stated, that Great Britain desires the revision of the frontier between her North American dominions and those of the United States, not with any view to an acquisition of territory, as such, but for the purpose of securing her possessions, and preventing future disputes.

The British government, consider the lakes from lake Ontario to lake Superior, both inclusive, to be the natural military frontier of the British possessions in North America. As the weaker power on the North American continent, the least capable of acting offensively, and the most exposed to sudden invasion, Great Britain considers the military occupation of these lakes as necessary to the security of her dominions. A boundary line equally dividing these waters, with a right to each nation to arm, both upon the lakes and upon their shores, is calculated to create a contest for naval ascendancy in peace as well as in war. The power which occupies these Lakes should, as a necessary result, have the military occupation of both shores.

In furtherance of this object the British government is prepared to propose a boundary. But as this might be misconstrued as an intention to extend their possessions to the southward of the lakes, which is by no means the object they have in view, they are disposed to leave the territorial limits undisturbed, and as incident to them, the free commercial navigation of the lakes, provided that the American government will stipulate not to maintain or construct, any fortifications upon, or within a limited distance of the shores, or maintain or construct any armed vessel upon the lakes in question, or in the rivers which empty themselves into the same.

If this can be adjusted, there will then remain for discussion the arrangement of the north western boundary between lake Superior and the Mississippi, the free navigation of that river, and such a vacation of the line of frontier as may secure a direct communication between Quebec and Halifax.

The undersigned trust, that the full statement which they have made of the views and objects of the British government in requiring the pacification of the Indian nations, and a permanent limit to their territories, will enable the American plenipotentiaries to conclude a provisional article upon the basis above stated. Should they feel it necessary to refer to the government of the United States for further instructions, the undersigned feel it incumbent upon them to acquiesce in the American plenipotentiaries, but the government cannot be precluded by anything that has passed from varying the terms at present proposed, in such a manner, as the state of war, at the time of resuming the conferences, may, in their judgment render advisable.

The undersigned avail themselves of this occasion to renew to the plenipotentiaries of the United States, the assurance of their high consideration.

(Signed)

GAMBIER,
HENRY GOULBURN,
WILLIAM ADAMS.

The Budget.

REPORT OF THE COMMITTEE OF WAYS AND MEANS.
The committee of ways and means, to whom was referred so much of the message of the president of the United States as relates to the finances—REPORT.

That taxes, loans, and treasury notes, appear to be the resources on which we must rely for carrying on the war. The product of the first, cannot be commanded in time to meet the immediate demands on the treasury—a recourse on loans, in the present situation of this country, would be uncertain, and the terms on which they would be obtained not such as to induce a resort to them at the present moment—treasury notes, combined with a system of taxation more extended than the one heretofore adopted, will, it is believed, in the present state of bank credit, be found to be a much better resource. The want of some medium, which, resting on a firm and solid basis, may unite public confidence, and have a general, instead of a local circulation, is now universally acknowledged. The stoppage of specie payments by the principal banks of the middle states, has embarrassed greatly the operations of the treasury, and by confining the circulation of notes to the limits of the states within which they are issued, has deprived the government of all the facilities, in the remittance of money, which was afforded while public confidence gave to bank notes a general circulation. The notes of New York and Philadelphia will not be received in Boston; the notes of Baltimore, or of the District of Columbia, will not answer for payments in Philadelphia. If by any new modification, treasury notes could be made to answer the purposes of a circulating medium, between the different states, they would greatly facilitate the operations of government, and free from embarrassment the transactions of individuals. To secure their circulation, it would be necessary, 1st. To issue the notes in sums sufficiently small for the ordinary purposes of society. 2d. To allow the individual who holds them, to fund them at pleasure at any of the loan offices, and to receive their amount in stock of the United States, bearing an interest of 8 per cent. 3d. To make them payable to bearer, and transferable by delivery. 4th. To make them receivable in all payments for public lands and taxes.—5th. To pledge, for the payment of the interest on the amount issued, so much of the internal duties as shall be necessary. To prevent an accumulation of circulating medium, the United States to retain the power, on giving six months notice, of redeeming them with specie, or exchanging for them stock, bearing an interest of 8 per cent. If these provisions are adopted, and taxes imposed, which shall manifest clearly the ability of the government to meet its engagements, our present difficulties will vanish, confidence be restored, and the capital, hoarded by avarice, or locked up from timidity, will be again restored to the accustomed channels of circulation. In presenting additional objects of taxation, care has been taken to select such as will bear equally on every portion of the community. In Europe, the price of agricultural products is not materially affected by a state of war; the produce of the earth is there consumed within the country, in peace and in war. The situation of the United States is totally different—with an extensive and fertile country, and a small population, compared to the extent of our territory, we have annually a large surplus to export to foreign markets, over and above what is necessary for consumption. On the export of this surplus, which is cut off by war, depends, in a great degree, the ability of the farmer to meet taxes. While, however, war depresses the agricultural interest, it gives vigor to various manufactures; by destroying all foreign competition, the war has brought many of these manufactures to a state of perfection, which will secure their successful prosecution even after peace shall be restored. In times of difficulty and danger, we must appeal to the patriotism of every class of our citizens. These establishments, under the fostering hand of the government, have grown to maturity, and will not hesitate to bear, with the agricultural interests, their portion of the taxes necessary to maintain, unimpaired, that character for punctuality and good faith, for which the American government has heretofore been distinguished. Several of these manufactures have been selected as proper subjects of taxation; and it is proposed to unite with the taxes, a pledge of the public faith for the continuance of the double duties, until the tax shall be repealed.

The committee deem it unnecessary, at present, to present any view of the expenditures for the next year, reserving a report on that subject, until the estimates from the treasury shall be forwarded. Confining, therefore, this report to the additional taxes, necessary for the support of the public credit, they submit the following resolutions:

1. Resolved, That it is expedient to continue the direct tax, and to increase the same fifty per cent.

2. Resolved, That it is expedient to increase the duty on spirits distilled, by an additional duty of 12 1-2 cents on the gallon.

3. Resolved, That it is expedient to add one hundred per cent. to the present duty on sales at auctions.

4. Resolved, That it is expedient to add fifty per cent. to the present duty on the conveyance of papers and letters.

5. Resolved, That it is expedient to impose a duty on the following articles, viz. manufactured tobacco and snuff, in the hands of the manufacturer; candles of tallow and spermacetti; hats, cotton yarn, spun by the aid of machinery, worked by steam or water; leather; pig iron; castings; bar, rolled and slit iron; and on nails made by the aid of machinery; on furniture, above a certain value, except beds, bedding, and articles of domestic manufacture, in the hands of the owner; beer, ale and port wine, in the hands of the manufacturer; boots and shoes above a certain price; in the hands of the manufacturer; on plated harness, in the hands of the owner; on vats for the manufacture of paper; on saddles and bridles, above a certain price, in the hands of the owner; on gold and silver watches, in the hands of the owner; on pleasure horses, kept exclusively for the saddle or carriage; on playing cards, and on lotteries.

Estimate of the amount of the proposed increase, and of the new duties.

50 per cent. on the direct tax. Dolls. 1,500,000

Congress of the United States.

SENATE.

Monday, October 3. Mr. Lacock submitted the following motion for consideration;

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to enquire and report to the senate the extent of the injury done the capitol and other public buildings of the United States by the enemy, the best means of preserving from further damage by the weather the remains of these edifices, and the expediency of an appropriation for repairing the same.

FOREIGN RELATIONS.

The following message was received from the president of the United States by Mr. Coles his secretary:

To the senate of the United States.

I transmit to the senate a report from the department of state complying with their resolution of the 26th ultimo. JAMES MADISON.

October 3d 1814,

The undersigned, acting as secretary of state, to whom was referred the resolution of the senate, requesting the president to cause to be laid before the senate such information in his possession, respecting the existing state of the relations between the United States and the continental powers of Europe, as he may deem not improper to be communicated, has the honor to report:

That the relations of the United States and the continental powers of Europe, continue to be those of peace and amity; nor is there, so far as is known to this department, reason to believe that an unfavorable change is likely to take place.

Measures have been taken to continue our diplomatic relations with France under the existing government, and to renew those with Spain, which have been for a time interrupted by the peculiar circumstances of that country. Diplomatic relations are also renewed with the united provinces of the low countries. The new government has sent an envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary to the United States, who has been received.

With the other powers of the continent of Europe, our relations have undergone no change since the last session of congress.

All which is respectfully submitted.

JAMES MONROE.

Department of state, October 1, 1814.

[The above is the only matter of importance in the proceedings of either house—the usual brief detail shall be inserted as customary.]

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

Thursday, September 9. The Speaker laid before the house the copy of a resolution, transmitted under cover to him from Philadelphia, passed by the select and common council of that city, offering to the congress and government, the use of buildings in that city, for their accommodation, provided it shall be deemed expedient in consequence of inconvenience experienced from the destruction of the capitol, &c. to remove from Washington.

On motion of Mr. Fisk of N. Y. this resolve was referred to the committee already raised on that subject.

Friday, Sept. 30.—Mr. Jackson's proposition to alter the constitution so that "congress shall have power to establish a national bank," was taken up in committee of the whole. After some interesting remarks from Mr. Johnson and Mr. McKee, the committee refused to agree to the proposition.

The question, in the house, on concurring with the committee in their disagreement to the proposition, was then decided as follows.

YEAS—Messrs. Alexander, Alston, Avery, Barnett, Baylies of Mass. Bayly of Vir. Bigelow, Boyd, Bradley, Brigham, Butler, Caperton, Caldwell, Champion, Chappell, Cilley, Clark, Clapton, Constock, Cooper, Cox, Culpeper, Cuthbert, Dana, Davenport, Denoyelles, Desha, Duval, Farrow, Findley, Fisk of Vt. Fisk of N. Y. Forsythe, Gaston, Geddes, Goldsborough, Grosvenor, Hanson, Hawkins, Hubbard, Hurlbert, Irwin, Jackson, of R. I. Kent, of N. Y. Kerr, King of Mass. Law, Lefferts, Lewis, Lovett, Lowndes, McKee, Miller, Moffitt, Mosely, Murfree, Markell, Oakley, Pearson, Pickering, Post, John Reed, Rea of Penn. Rich, Ruggles, Sage, Schureman, Sevier, Sharp, Sherwood, Skinner, Stanford, Stockton, Strong, Sturges, Thompson, Vose, Ward of Mass. Ward of N. J. Wheaton, White, Wilcox, Winter and Yancey.—66.

NAYS—Messrs. Anderson, Barbour, Bard, Bowen, Burwell, Condict, Conard, Crawford, Creighton, Davis of Penn. Earle, Epper, Evans, Franklin, Gholson, Glasgow, Goodwyn, Gourdin, Griffin, Hall, Harris, Hawes, Humphreys, Ingersoll, Jackson of Vir. Kershaw, King of N. C. Lyle, Macon, McCoy, McKim, McLean, Moore, Newton, Pickens, Piper, Pleasants, Rhea of Ten. Roane, Smith of Virg. Tannehill, Udree and Wilson of Penn.—14.

So the house decided by a large majority, that it would not agree to this proposed amendment to the constitution.

It would rather appear from the little that was said, that many voted against the proposition on the idea that congress had already the power required.

Adjourned until Monday.

Monday, October 3.—Mr. Troup from the military committee reported a resolution to confer certain honorary rewards on generals Brown, Scott, Gaines and Macomb—referred to a committee of the whole.

Mr. Fisk, of N. Y. from the committee to whom the same was referred, reported as follows:

“Resolved, That it is inexpedient to remove the seat of government at this time from the city of Washington.”

The house having agreed to consider the report—

Mr. Fisk of New-York said he had reported that resolution in conformity to the directions of a majority of the committee; but he now thought it his duty to move to strike out the word inexpedient and insert the word expedient.

A short desultory conversation took place between several members in relation to the state of defence of the place, &c.

When the question on Mr. Fisk's motion to amend (the effect of which was to declare it expedient to remove) was taken and decided as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Alexander, Alston, Baylies, of Mass. Bigelow, Boyd, Bradbury, Bradley, Brigham, Brown, Butler, Caldwell, Champion, Cilley, Clark, Condict, Conard, Cooper, Cox, Creighton, Davenport, Davis of Penn. Denoyelles, Desha, Duval, Ely, Fintley, Fisk of N. Y. Geddes, Gourdin, Grosvenor, Hurlbert, Ingersoll, Inglisham, Irwin, Jackson of R. I. Kent of N. Y. King of Mass. Law, Lovett, Lyle, Miller, Mosely, Murfree, Markell, Oakley, Pickering, Piper, Post, John Reed, Rea of Penn. Rich, Ruggles, Schureman, Seybert, Sharp, Sherwood, Skinner, Stanford, Stockton, Sturges, Tannehill, Taylor, Thompson, Udree, Vose, Ward, of Mass. Ward of N. J. Wilcox and Winter.—68.

NAYS—Messrs. Archer, Avery, Barbour, Bard, Barnett, Bayly of Vir. Bowen, Burwell, Caperton, Chappell, Clapton, Constock, Crawford, Culpeper, Cuthbert, Dana, Earle, Epper, Evans, Farrow, Findley, Fisk of Vt. Forsythe, Franklin, Gholson, Gaston, Gholson, Glasgow, Goodwyn, Griffin, Hall, Hanson, Harris, Hawes, Hawkins, Hubbard, Humphreys, Hungerford, Irving, Jackson of Virg. Johnson, of Ky. Kent, of Md. Kerr, Kershaw, King, of N. C. Lefferts, Lewis, Lowndes, Macon, McCoy, McKim, McLean, Montgomery, Moore, Newton, Pickens, Pleasants, Rhea of Ten. Roane, Sage, Sevier, Smith of Virg. Strong, Stuart, Telfair, Troup, White, Wilson of Penn. and Yancey.—66.

The house being equally divided—

The speaker said, he was now called on to give a vote as unexpected as painful. The speaker would, on this occasion, as on any other, regardless of the feelings which might be thereby excited, and the impressions probably received, give that vote which he believed the interests, safety and honor of the nation under all the circumstances to require. He was deeply impressed with the belief that these considerations required him to vote in the affirmative. The reason for this vote was, that this district could not be defended except at an immense expence, at an expence perhaps half of that which would be necessary to carry on the war.

So the amendment was carried.

Referred to a committee of the whole.

Mr. Montgomery, of Ky. offered the following:

Resolved, That the committee of claims be instructed to enquire into the expediency of making provision for the widows and orphans of militia privates slain in the service of the United States.

The motion having been amended, on suggestion of Mr. Desha of Ky. so as to include also those who may die or have died whilst in the service, and also so as to refer the subject to the military committee, instead of the committee of claims, was agreed to.

Tuesday, October 4.—Mr. Pleasants of Va. from the committee on naval affairs, who were instructed to enquire into the expediency of extending to merchant recaptors the provisions of the bill allowing a bounty on prisoners to the owners and crews of private armed vessels, reported, that it was inexpedient to extend the provisions of the said act to the case just stated.

After some objections by Mr. King of Mass. the report was accepted by a large majority.

The resolution on removing the seat of government was taken up—a motion for an indefinite postponement was negatived—ayes 61, nays 77. Progress reported, and the committee had leave to sit again.

From the 4th to the 10th, both houses waiting for the reports of their several committees, done nothing very important. In the senate, a vote bestowing the usual civic honors, on capt. Warrington and his officers and crew for capturing the Epervier, was passed unanimously. In the house, on the 5th and 6th, the resolved “that it was expedient to remove the seat of government,” was discussed. A motion to insert “inexpedient” for expedient was lost—ayes 67, nays 70. The next day, the question on the passage of the resolution, was, after debate, passed by yeas and nays, as follows: and a committee appointed to bring in a bill accordingly.

YEAS—Messrs. Alexander, Alston, Baylies of Mass. Bigelow, Boyd, Bradbury, Bradley, Brigham, Brown, Butler, Caldwell, Champion, Cilley, Clark, Condict, Conard, Cooper, Cox, Creighton, Davenport, Davis of Penn. Denoyelles, Desha, Duval, Ely, Fintley, Fisk of N. Y. Geddes, Gourdin, Grosvenor, Hurlbert, Ingersoll, Inglisham, Irwin, Jackson of R. I. Kent, of N. Y. King of Mass. Law, Lovett, Lyle, Miller, Moffitt, Mosely, Markell, Oakley, Ormsby, Pickering, Piper, Post, John Reed, Rea, of Penn. Rich, Ruggles, Schureman, Seybert, Sharp, Sherwood, Shippland, Skinner, Stockton, Strong, Stanford, Tannehill, Taylor, Thompson, Udree, Vose, Ward of Mass. Ward of N. J. Wheaton, Wilcox and Winter.—72.

NAYS—Messrs. Archer, Avery, Barbour, Bard, Barnett, Bayly, of Virg. Bowen, Burwell, Chappell, Clapton, Constock, Crawford, Culpeper, Cuthbert, Dana, Earle, Epper, Evans, Farrow, Fisk of Vt. Forsythe, Franklin, Gholson, Gaston, Gholson, Glasgow, Goldsborough, Goodwyn, Griffin, Hall, Hanson, Harris, Hawes, Hawkins, Hubbard, Humphreys, Hungerford, Irving, Jackson, of Virg. Johnson, of Ky. Kent, of Md. Kerr, Kershaw, King, of N. C. Lefferts, Lewis, Lowndes, Macon, McCoy, McKim, McLean, Montgomery, Moore, Newton, Pickens, Pleasants, Rhea, of Ten. Roane, Sage, Sevier, Smith of Virg. Stuart, Telfair, Troup, White, Wilson, of Penn. Wright and Yancey.—71.

On the 10th, some time was spent in considering the resolution for giving due honors to generals Brown, Scott, Gaines, &c. when the important message from the president, inserted in page 70, et seq. interrupted the proceedings. The message being read, on a motion for printing, Mr. Hanson rose and delivered a very patriotic and animated speech—short but pointed.—Messrs. Oakley, Forsythe and Wright also offered some remarks, and 10,000 copies of the message were ordered to be printed. [Particulars hereafter.] On the 11th, the resolutions respecting Brown, Scott, &c. were ordered to be engrossed for a third reading—and in committee of the whole, a proposition made by Mr. Jefferson to sell to Congress, on their own terms, his valuable library, the work of 50 years attention and care, to supply that which had been destroyed, was considered. The venerable gentleman states that his constant design to have offered this library to the public, was hastened by the late events at Washington, &c. This letter will probably be published. The committee reported progress and had leave to sit again, to allow further time to examine the catalogue.

On the 11th, also, the committee of ways and means made their report, which is inserted in page 76.

After ten ballots, Mr. Cutts, formerly a senator of New Hampshire, was elected secretary of the senate. There were many candidates.

Wednesday, Oct. 12. Nothing of importance transacted.

Events of the War.

MISCELLANEOUS.

From the south, we have glorious news! See gen. Jackson's letter below. Of Fort Bowyer where this brilliant affair happened, the “National Intelligencer” observes—This little fort, (which was erected in 1812, by lieut. col. Bowyer, and consists only of common logs filled in with sand) was performed, we learn by a detachment of the 2d regt. which had not before an opportunity of distinguishing ing itself in the present war, tho' highly distinguished formerly, for its gallant stand against the savages in covering St. Clair's retreat, where only 10 of its officers survived, and only 4 escaped unhurt. Of these col. Sparks and lieut. col. Bowyer still remain in the regiment. col. Bowyer has been recently promoted, and transferred to the Northern frontier. Maj. Lawrence who commanded fort Bowyer, is an officer of high promise—a native of Calvert county, Maryland.

It is stated that gen. Jackson will have under his command, immediately, not less than 12,000 men; part of which is a fine body of regulars—the rest chiefly Kentucky and Tennessee militia, nearly equal to them, and perhaps, for the service required not inferior in real utility. We fear nothing in that quarter. The spirit of the population of the West, with the nature of the country, climate, &c., will, probably, confine the operations of the British forces to the murdering of a few men, women and children. 3000 men have been required from Louisiana, the number is partly made up of volunteers, 4500 march from Kentucky.

The British commanding officer at Pensacola—we say commanding at Pensacola, a Spanish place—is spouting away in great style; and with a force that we do not believe amounts to more than 2 or 300 British and as many Indians, is puffing and blowing beyond any thing that Bonaparte has left us samples of in that sort of style. We shall notice him more at length anon.

An expedition has been fitted out at New-Orleans, supposed against Barataria under command of capt. Patterson of the navy. If his means are sufficient, the nest of privates will be destroyed. The people at Orleans have had a meeting, and appointed a committee of defence, &c.

Head-Quarters, 7th Military District.

Mobile, September 7, 10 A. M.

SIR—I have but a moment to spare to tell you since the departure of my letter of this morning, a messenger has returned from fort Bowyer, with the pleasing intelligence that major Lawrence has gallantly repulsed the enemy with great loss, blowing up a vessel of 36 guns. Only four of our men were killed and 5 wounded. The officers bringing the despatches will be here in an hour, when I will be enabled to give you the particulars.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, your obedient serv't.
ANDREW JACKSON,
Maj. gen. commanding.

The hon. John Armstrong, secretary at war.

Extract of a letter received in this city.

"By a letter just received from general Jackson, he has beaten the British and Indians at Mobile Point, blown up the admiral's ship, and sunk one brig. About 20 of their crews saved. The letter I saw."
W. M. DONNISON.

Fayetteville, Tenn. Sept. 14, 1814.

FROM ONTARIO, besides the information contained in commodore Chauncey's letters inserted below; we learn that, our fleet had come to Sackett's harbor on the 7th, inst. supposed with a view of obtaining supplies. The enemy's great ship had not then sailed. A letter dated the 7th, says:—

"The enemy's ship is ready for sea, excepting that her sails are not bent, which it is expected they will be by the 12th. She is a large vessel of 102 guns. Her lower deck thirty-four 32 pounders; middle-deck thirty-four 24 pounders; has twenty 62 pound cannonades on her upper deck, besides other guns. It will be impossible for our fleet to withstand the enemy on the lake. Probably the first object of the enemy will be to relieve Drummond's army, which is in great want of supplies. Bread is said to be a dollar a pound with them. The enemy made an attempt to send supplies up to them by two ships, some days since, but they were driven back by Chauncey.

"It is expected an attack will be made by sea and land, in a few days. The enemy is assembling his forces at Kingston for that purpose. Drummond, it is said, will lead the attack by land.

"The harbor is completely surrounded by breastworks and entrenchments, and every preparation making to give the foe a warm reception. A large additional militia force has been called out, and is repairing to the harbor with great alacrity."

We further learn that, lieutenant Dickerson, with a detachment, had captured five boats of the enemy's, loaded with goods of the north-western company, valued at $12,000—350 seamen have gone from lake Champlain to join Chauncey.

Copy of a letter from commodore Chauncey to the secretary of the navy, dated U. S. ship Superior, off the Ducks, Oct. 1, 1814.

SIR—On the 28th ult. at day light, we discovered two of the enemy's ships standing out of Kingston, under a press of sail. As soon as they discovered us, they hove to. The wind being fresh from the northward and eastward, and fair to leave Kingston, I was impressed with a belief that sir James had got his large ship ready, and was coming out with his whole fleet. I immediately made sail, in order to get the wind; but as soon as we tacked for them, the enemy's ships filled, made sail on the wind, and soon after tacked from us. The weather being lazy, it soon became so thick a fog that we could not discover objects at more than 100 yards distance. I, however, continued to beat to windward, and late in the afternoon it cleared up for a short time, when we discovered the enemy's two ships outside of the Nine-mile Point; as soon as he discovered that we had neared him considerably, and in a situation to cut him off from Kingston, if he ventured further out, he immediately made all sail, and beat into his anchorage.

As no other part of the enemy's squadron made their appearance, and these 2 ships from their manœuvres evidently wished to escape us, it struck me that the enemy had learnt the movements of general Izard up the lake, and apprehending an attack upon general Drummond's army (which probably also was distressed for provisions) had induced him to put on board these two ships troops and provisions, and risk them for the relief of his army on the Niagara frontier; the wind and thick foggy weather also favored such a movement. I determined to frustrate his designs if possible. Soon after sundown I anchored the fleet between the Galoos and Grenadier island, for the purpose of keeping them together, and put lieut. Skinner with an additional number of men on board the Lady of the Lake with orders to anchor between Pigeon and Snake Islands, and if he discovered any movement of the enemy to make a signal with rockets or guns, his number, &c. It continued a thick fog during the night—the enemy made no movement, and the next morning (29th) the weather cleared up, with the wind to the westward—weighed with the fleet and stood in for Kingston, until we opened the town—sent the Lady of the Lake close in to reconnoitre and ascertain the state of forwardness of the new ship. Lieut. Skinner found her hauled on in the stream, and completely rigged, but sails not bent—4 other ships and a large schooner lying also in the stream, and apparently ready to sail.

From present appearances I have no doubt but the enemy will be on the lake with his whole force in the course of a week, and I think his first movement will be to attempt to retrieve, at Sackett's Harbor, what he lost at Plattsburgh. I hope, however, that he will meet with the same gallant resistance upon this lake that he experienced on lake Champlain.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, sir, your obedient servant, I. CHAUNCEY.

HON. WM. JONES, Washington.

From the same to the same.

U. S. S. Superior, off the Ducks, Oct. 2.

SIR—Having a very commanding breeze yesterday, I sent the Lady of the Lake into Kingston to reconnoitre. She stood close in with the forts and shipping, keeping just within the range of their shot and had a fair view. The ships lay in the same positions as on the 29th, and the large ship still without her sails bent—no visible preparations to embark troops. I shall watch them in this position as long as possible without endangering the fleet.

I have the honor to be very respectfully, sir, your most obedient humble servant,

ISAAC CHAUNCEY,

Hon. WM. JONES, sec. of the navy.

REASON FOR WAR. Sir George Collier, of the Leander, is stated lately to have given an opinion "that Great Britain wished to continue the war in order to employ her numerous soldiers and sailors whom she dare not trust in idleness."

EASTERN COAST. Captain Raguet, of the Nymph frigate, has received 4,000 dollars from Brewster, and 12,000 from Eastham, the amount of the ransom lately demanded for these places, see page 52. How pitiful!

THANKSGIVING. The mayor of Baltimore, on the suggestion "of the reverend pastors of the several congregations," has appointed Thursday next, to be observed as "a day of thanksgiving to the Adorable Disposer of all human events, on account of our recent deliverance from the British fleet and army."

REINFORCEMENTS. It is now resolved to a moral certainty that Lord Hill, is coming to America, with a force of from 10,000 to 15,000 men. A London paper of August 11, says—"At a grand fête given on Saturday, at Whitechurch, in honor of Lord's Hill, and Combermere, the Chairman, among other toasts gave "Success to Lord Hill and his American expedition." In returning thanks the noble lord said, that he had three days ago taken leave of his prince, and on the 1st of September he should quit England for Cork where he should embark on the first favorable opportunity for America, to take the command of the British army; and he had no doubt, with the means already there, together with those on the way, and what were promised by his prince, he should humble the Yankees, and bring the contest to a speedy and successful termination. From the remote period fixed for his lordship's departure, it is evident that he waits the result of the negotiations at Ghent."

NEGOCIATION. On the documents inserted in this number it is superfluous to remark, except they have excited an universal burst of indignation, and an unanimous determination to repel, to the last extremity, the outrageous pretensions of the enemy. They are such as America will never submit to. Such as none but a slave will accede to. The demands are as impudent as any they could offer us, if a conquered people. Events may teach the foe moderation. But we have no prospect of peace from the present mission. Let the energies of the country be brought fairly into action, and, at Washington, the scene of their barbarism, will they make an honorable treaty. Our resources are immense and the union of all honest men will bring them into full operation. On land and on water we have gloriously triumphed; and on either element we have men that can successfully meet and humble the numerous Englishmen.

Hamilton, 6. Sept. 12. The Indians, who are to co-operate with the Ohio and Kentucky mounted volunteers under general Cass, are rendezvousing at St. Mary's. Between one and 200,000 lbs. of beef and pork and 500 bbls. of flour, has been ordered to this place.

Brig. Gen. Thomas Mounsey, it is stated in the Savannah papers has resigned his commission in the army.

Desertions are numerous from the enemy from all possible points. A Boston paper states that an entire sergeant's guard had arrived at Wiscasset from Castine, and there enlisted in the service of the U. States. At Castine, commissioned officers were necessitated to take charge of the guards.

A party of the red allies of the "defender of the faith" lately made an incursion into the Illinois territory. They were pursued by a party of our rangers, and a skirmish ensued, in which each side lost 4 men.

A court martial has been appointed to enquire into the conduct of General Proctor.

Major-General Scott arrived in Baltimore on Tuesday evening last, and proceeded next day to Washington.

A court martial has been ordered and detailed for the trial of Captain Ryan, who blew up Fort Washington, on the Potomac.

Major-General Gaines, has taken command of the 4th military district—Lancaster, Philadelphia. Scott and Gaines are of the sort of men to beat the Lord Hills of the enemy.

For interesting particulars of Macomb's repulse of the enemy at Plattsburgh, see page 68.

ON THE NIAGARA FRONTIER, little has occurred since the retirement of Drummond. Brown and Izard had had an interview—the latter with his army was at Lewisstown, at our last date. 320 of the prisoners taken by general Brown in the late sortie have arrived at Greenbush.

FROM THE NORTH WEST we have nothing important; except that the Indians are reported to be becoming troublesome in the neighbourhood of Detroit.

We have captain Blakely's account of the splendid cruise of the U. S. sloop of war Wasp, detailing his capture of the British sloop Reindeer of 21 guns, after a sharp action of 19 minutes. Our loss 5 killed and 21 wounded—British, 25 killed and 42 wounded. Capt. B. also made 7 other valuable prizes on the British coast, which he sunk or burnt. The Wasp was at L'Orient July 8, refitting.

The U. S. Peacock, capt. Warrington, has also been dealing destruction to the enemy in his own waters. She has destroyed several vessels even in Dublin bay, and has alarmed the whole coast. Several sloops of war went after her. We are assured, as well by paragraphs in the London papers, as in the following letter, that she also has sent a sloop of war "down cellar," as the sailors say.

Extract of a letter from the minister of the U States at Paris to the secretary of the navy, dated Aug. 17, 1814.

"I have the pleasure to enclose you captain Blakely's despatches giving the result of his cruise and especially of the capture of the Reindeer. This is another proud trophy which will swell the glorious annals of our little navy. I believe the Peacock has sunk the British sloop of war PELICAN. It appears to be certain that she has had an action in the Irish channel and sunk a sloop of his majesty's.

"Many circumstances concur in favor of its being the Pelican; she is known to have sailed in quest of the Peacock."

[Every reader will recollect that it was the Pelican that took our sloop of war Argus, and that she was one of the best sloops of war in the British navy.]

THE ENEMY IN THE CHESAPEAKE.

About thirty-five of the enemy's vessels late in our bay, have gone to war—the most appear collected chiefly in Lynnhaven bay. It is said they have burnt their hospital and barracks on Tangier island. A party landed at Northumberland, before they went down from the Potomac, and committed great depredations. Particulars not yet received.

The Instructions.

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States.

I now transmit to congress copies of the instructions to the Plenipotentiaries of the United States, charged with negotiating a peace with Great Britain, as referred to in my message of the 10th instant.

JAMES MADISON.

Washington, October 13th, 1814.

Mr. Monroe, secretary of state, to the plenipotentiaries of the United States, for treating of peace with Great Britain, dated Department of state, April 15th, 1814.

GENTLEMEN—I had the honor on the 11th to receive from Mr. Adams two letters, one bearing date on the 30th September, and the other on the 17th October last, communicating the overture of the emperor of Russia to promote peace by his friendly mediation between the United States and Great Britain. On the day following, Mr. Daschkoff, the Russian minister, made a similar communication to this department. The subject has, in consequence, been duly considered, and I have now to make known to you the result.

The President has not hesitated to accept the mediation of Russia, and he indulges a strong hope that it will produce the desired effect. It is not known that Great Britain has acceded to the proposition, but it is presumed that she will not decline it. The president thought it improper to postpone his decision, until he should hear of that of the British government. Sincerely desirous of peace, he has been willing to avail himself of every opportunity which might tend to promote it, on just and honorable conditions, and in accepting this overture he has been particularly gratified to evince, by the manner of it, the distinguished consideration which the United States entertain for the emperor Alexander. Should the British government accept the mediation, the negotiation to which it leads will be held at St. Petersburg. The president commits it to you, for which a commission is enclosed, and he has appointed Mr. Harris secretary of the mission.

The impressment of our seamen and illegal blockades as exemplified more particularly in the orders in council, were the principal causes of the war. Had not Great Britain persevered obstinately in the violation of these important rights, the war would not have been declared. It will cease as soon as these rights are respected. The proposition made by Mr.

Russell to the British government immediately after the war, and the answer given by this department to admiral Warren's letter since, shew the ground on which the United States were willing to adjust the controversy relative to impressment.

This has been further evinced by a report of the committee of foreign relations of the house of representatives, and an act of congress passed in consequence of that report. By these documents you will see that to accommodate this important difference, the United States are disposed to exclude British seamen altogether from the American service. This being effectually done, the British government can have no pretext for the practice. How shall it be done? By restraints to be imposed by each nation on the naturalization of the seamen of the other, excluding at the same time all others not naturalized—or shall the right of each nation to naturalize the seamen of the other be prohibited, and each exclude from its service the natives of the other? Whatever the rule is, it ought to be reciprocal. If Great Britain is allowed to naturalize American seamen, the U. States should enjoy the same privilege. If it is demanded that the United States shall exclude from their service all native British subjects, a like exclusion of American citizens from the British service ought to be reciprocated. The mode also should be common to both countries. Each should be at liberty to give the same facilities, or be bound to impose the same restraints that the other does. The president is willing to agree to either alternative, and to carry it into effect by the most eligible regulations that can be devised.

If the first alternative is adopted, the extent of the proposed exclusion will depend on the impediments to naturalization, on the efficacy of the regulations to prevent imposition, and the fidelity of their execution. The greater the difficulty in acquiring the right of citizenship, the easier will it be to avoid imposition, and the more complete the desired exclusion. The law of the last session of congress relative to seamen proves how sincerely desirous the legislative as well as executive branch of our government, is to adjust this controversy on conditions which may be satisfactory to Great Britain. By that law it is made indispensable for every British subject who may hereafter become a citizen, to reside five years without intermission within the United States, and so many guards are imposed to prevent frauds, that it seems to be impossible that they should be eluded. No British subject can be employed in a public or private ship of the United States, unless he produces to the commander in one instance, and to the collector in the other, a certified copy of the act by which he became naturalized. A list of the crew, in the case of a private ship, must be taken, certified and recorded by the collector, and the consuls or commercial agents of Great Britain may object to any seaman, and attend the investigation. The commander of a public ship receiving a person not duly qualified shall forfeit a thousand dollars, and the commander or owner of a private ship, knowing thereof, five hundred dollars, to be recovered in an action of debt one half to the informer and one half to the United States. It is also made penal, punishable as a felony by imprisonment and labor from three to five years, or by fine, from five hundred to one thousand dollars, for any person to forge or counterfeit, or to pass, or use any forged or counterfeited certificate of citizenship, or to sell or dispose of one.

It may fairly be presumed that if this law should be carried into effect, it would exclude all British seamen from our service.

By requiring five years continued residence in the United States, as the condition of citizenship, few if any British seamen would ever take advantage of it. Such as had left Great Britain, and had resided five years in this country, would be likely to abandon the sea forever. And by making it the duty of the commanders of our public, and of the collectors, in the case of private ships, to require an authenticated copy from the clerk of the court, before which a British subject, who offered his service, had been naturalized, as indispensable to his admission, and highly penal in either to take a person not duly qualified, and by allowing also British agents to object to any one offering his service, and to prosecute by suit the commander or collector, as the case might be, for receiving an improper person, it seems to be impossible that such should be received.

If the second alternative is adopted; that is, if all native British subjects are to be hereafter excluded from our service, it is important that the stipulation providing for it should operate so as not to effect those who have been already naturalized. By our law all the rights of natives are given to naturalized citizens. It is contended by some that these complete rights do not extend beyond the limits of the United States; that in naturalizing a foreigner, no state can absolve him from the obligation which he owes to his former government, and that he becomes a citizen in a qualified sense only. This doctrine, if true in any case, is less applicable to the United States than to any other power. Expatriation seems to be a natural right, and by the original character of our institutions, founded by compact, on principle, and particularly by the unqualified investment of the adopted citizen with the full rights of the native, all that the United States could do, to place him on the same footing, has been done. In point of interest the object is of little importance to either party. The number to be affected by the stipulation is inconsiderable; nor can that be a cause of surprise, when the character of that class of men is considered. It rarely happens that a seaman who settles on a farm, or engages in a trade, and pursues it for any length of time, returns to sea. His youthful days are exhausted in his first occupation. He leaves it with regret, and adopts another, either in consequence of marriage, of disease, or as an asylum for age.

To a stipulation which shall operate prospectively only, the same objection does not apply. In naturalizing foreigners, the United States may prescribe the limit to which their privileges shall extend. If it is made a condition that no native British subject, who may hereafter become a citizen, shall be employed in our public or private ships, their exclusion will violate no right. Those who might become citizens afterwards would acquire the right; subject to that condition, and would be bound by it. To such a stipulation the president is willing to assent, altho' he would much prefer the alternative of restraints on naturalization; and to prevent frauds and to carry the same fully into effect, you are authorised to apply all the restraints and checks, with the necessary modification to suit the case, that are provided in the act above recited, relative to seamen, for the purposes of that act.

In requiring that the stipulation to exclude British seamen from our service, with the regulations for carrying it into effect, be made reciprocal; the president desires that you make a provision, authorising the United States, if they should be so disposed, to dispense with the obligations imposed by it on American citizens. The liberal spirit of our government and laws is unfriendly to restraints on our citizens, such at least as are imposed on British subjects from becoming members of other societies. This has been shown in the law of the last session relative to seamen, to which your particular attention has been already drawn. This provision may likewise be reciprocated if desired.

The president is not particularly solicitous that either of these alternatives (making the proposed reservation in case the latter be) should be preferred. To secure the United States against impressment he is willing to adopt either. He expects in return that a clear and distinct provision shall be made against the practice. The precise form in which it may be done is not insisted on, provided the import is explicit. All that is required is, that in consideration of the act to be performed on the part of the United States, the British government shall stipulate in some adequate manner, to terminate or forbear the practice of impressment from American vessels.

It has been suggested as an expedient mode for the adjustment of this controversy that British cruisers should have a right to search our vessels for British seamen, but that the commanders thereof should be subjected to penalties, in case they made mistakes, and took from them American citizens. By this the British government would acquire the right of search for seamen, with that of impressing from our vessels the subjects of all other powers. It will not escape your attention, that by admitting the right, in any case, we give up the principle, and leave the door open to every kind of abuse. The same objection is applicable to any and every other arrangement, which withholds the respect due to our flag by not allowing it to protect the crew sailing under it.

If the first alternative should be adopted, it will follow, that none of the British seamen who may be in the United States at the time the treaty takes effect, and who shall not have become citizens, will be admitted into our service, until they acquire that right.

If the second is adopted, the number of native British seamen, who have been naturalized, and will be admissible into our service, will not, it is believed exceed a few hundred; all others who may be in the United States at the time the treaty takes effect, or who may arrive afterwards will be excluded.

As a necessary incident to an adjustment on the principle of either alternative, it is expected that all American seamen, who have been impressed, will be discharged, and that those who have been naturalized, under the British laws, by compulsive service, will be permitted to withdraw.

I have to repeat that the great object which you have to secure, in regard to impressment, is, that our flag shall protect the crew, and providing for this in a satisfactory manner, that you are authorized to secure Great Britain effectually against the employment of her seamen in the service of the United States. This it is believed would be done by the adoption of either of the above alternatives, and the application to that which may be adopted, of the checks contained in the law of the last session relative to seamen; in aid of which it will always be in the power of Great Britain to make regulations operating in her own ports, with a view to the same effect. To terminate, however, this controversy in a manner satisfactory to both parties, the president is willing, should other checks be suggested as likely to be more effectual, consistent with the spirit of our constitution, that you should adopt them. The strong feature of the first alternative which authorizes the naturalization of seamen, requires their continued residence in the United States for five years, as indispensable to the attainment of that right. In case this alternative be adopted, the president is willing, for example to secure a compliance with that condition, to make it the duty of each alien, who may be desirous to become a citizen, to appear in court every year, for the term of five years, till his right shall be completed. This example is given, not as a limitation, but as an illustration of your power; for to the exclusion of British seamen from our service, no repugnance is felt. To such exclusion the amicable adjustment of this controversy with Great Britain affords a strong motive, but not the only one. It is a growing sentiment in the United States, that they ought to depend on their own population, for the supply of their ships of war and merchant service; experience has shewn that it is an abundant resource. In expressing this sentiment, you will do it in a manner to inspire more fully a confidence, that the arrangement which you may enter into, will be carried faithfully into effect, without derogating, however, from the conciliatory spirit of the accommodation.

A strong desire has heretofore been expressed by the British government to obtain of the United States an arrangement to prevent the desertion of British seamen, when in our ports, and it cannot be doubted, that a stipulation to that effect would be highly satisfactory, as well as useful to Great Britain. It is fairly to be presumed that it, alone, would afford to the British government a strong inducement to enter into a satisfactory arrangement of the difference relating to impressment. The claim is not inadmissible, especially as the United States have a reciprocal interest in the restoration of deserters from American vessels in British ports. You may therefore agree to an article, such as hath been heretofore authorized by the United States, which shall make it the duty of each party to deliver them up.

Of the right of the United States to be exempted from the degrading practice of impressment, so much has been already said, and with such ability, that it would be useless, especially to you, who are otherwise so well acquainted with it, to dilate on its merits. I must observe, however, that the practice is utterly repugnant to the law of nations; that it is supported by no treaty with any nation; that it was never acquiesced in by any; and that a submission to it by the United States, would be the abandonment, in favor of Great Britain, of all claim to neutral rights and of all other rights on the ocean.

This practice is not founded on any legitimate right. The greatest extent to which the belligerent claim has been carried, over the vessels of neutral nations, is, to board, and take from them, persons in the land and sea-service of an enemy, contraband of war, an enemy's property. All nations agree respecting the two first articles, but there has been and still exists a diversity of opinion as to the last. On that and other questions of considerable importance, disputes have arisen which are yet unsettled. The empress Catharine of Russia, a distinguished advocate of just principles, placed herself in 1780 at the head of neutral nations, in favor of a liberal construction of their rights, and her successors have generally followed her example. In all the discussions on these topics, we find nothing of the British claim to impressment; no acknowledgment of it in any treaty, or proof of submission to it by any power. If instances have occurred in which British cruisers have taken British seamen from the vessels of any other nations, they were, as it is presumed, in cases either not acquiesced in or of an extraordinary nature only, affording no countenance to their practice and pretension in relation to the United States. Cases of this kind if such there be, afford no proof of a systematic claim in the British government to impressment, or of submission to it by other powers. This claim has been set up against the United States only, who have in consequence thereof been compelled to discuss its merits.

This claim is in fact traced to another source, the allegiance due by British subjects to their sovereign, and his right by virtue thereof, to their service. This has been distinctly stated in a late declaration by the prince regent. Knowing the nature of the claim, we know also the extent of the right and obligations incident to it. Allegiance is a political relation between a sovereign and his people. It is the obligation which binds the latter in return for the protection which they receive. These reciprocal duties have the same limit. They are confined to the dominions of the sovereign, beyond which he has no rights, can afford no protection, and can of course claim no allegiance. A citizen or subject of one power entering the dominions of another, owes allegiance to the latter, in return for the protection he receives. Whether a sovereign has a right to claim the service of such of his subjects as have left his own dominions is a question, respecting which also a difference of opinion may exist. It is certain that no sovereign has a right to pursue his subjects into the territories of another, be the motive for it what it may. Such an entry without the consent of the other power, would be a violation of its territory, and an act of hostility. Offenders, even conspirators, cannot be pursued by one power into the territory of another, nor are they delivered up by the latter, except in compliance with treaties; or by favor. That the vessels of a nation are considered a part of its territory, with the exception of the belligerent right only, is a principle too well established to be brought into discussion.—Each state has exclusive jurisdiction over its own vessels. Its laws govern in them, and offences against those laws are punishable by its tribunals only. The flag of a nation protects every thing sailing under it, in time of peace, and in time of war likewise, with the exception of the belligerent rights growing out of the war. An entry on board the vessels of one power by the cruisers of another, in any other case, and the exercise of any other authority over them, is a violation of right, and an act of hostility.

The British government, aware of the truth of this doctrine, has endeavored to avoid its consequences in the late declaration of the prince regent. It has not contended that British cruisers have a right to pursue and search our vessels for British seamen. It asserts only that they have a right to search them for other objects, and being on board for a lawful cause, and finding British seamen there, that they have a right to impress and bring them away, under the claim of allegiance. When we see a systematic pursuit of our vessels by British cruisers, and the impressment of seamen from them, not at a port of the enemy, where a regular blockade had been instituted, and by the blockading squadron, but in every part of the ocean, on our coast, and even in our harbors, it is difficult to believe that impressment is not the real motive, and the other the pretext for it. But to place this argument of the British government on the strongest ground, let it be admitted that the entry was lawful, is it so to commit an act not warranted by the purpose for which the entry was made? There is a levity in this argument, which neither suits the parties nor the subject. The British government founds its right of impressment from our ships on that of allegiance, which is a permanent right, equally applicable to peace and war. The right of impressment, therefore, from the vessels of other powers must likewise be permanent, and equally applicable to peace and war. It would not, however, take this broad ground, lest the injustice, and extravagance of the pretension might excite the astonishment and indignation of other powers, to whom it would be equally applicable. To claim it as a belligerent right would have been equally unjust and absurd, as no trace of it could be found in the belligerent code. The British government was, therefore, reduced to a very embarrassing dilemma. To acknowledge that it could not support the claim, on either principle, would be to relinquish it, and yet it could rely on neither. It endeavored to draw some aid from both. A state of war exists which brings the parties together, Great Britain, as a belligerent, and the United States as a neutral power, British officers have now a right to board and search American vessels, but for what? Persons in the service of an enemy, contraband of war, or enemy's property? This would not accomplish the end. It is however, the utmost limit of the belligerent right. Allegiance, which is an attribute of sovereignty, comes to her aid, and communicates all the necessary power. The national character of the neutral vessel ceases. The complete right of sovereignty and jurisdiction over it is transferred to Great Britain. It is on this foundation that the British government has raised this monstrous superstructure. It is with this kind of argument that it attempts to justify its practice of impressment from our vessels.

The remark contained in the declaration of the prince regent, that in impressing British seamen from American vessels, Great Britain exercised no right which she was not willing to acknowledge as appertaining equally to the government of the United States, with respect to American seamen in British merchant ships, proves only that the British government is conscious of the injustice of the claim, and desirous of giving to it such aid as may be derived from a plausible argument. The semblance of equality, however, in this proposition, which strikes at first view, disappears on a fair examination. It is unfair, first, because it is impossible for the United States to take advantage of it. Impressment is not an American practice, but utterly repugnant to our constitution and laws. In offering to reciprocate it, nothing was offered, as the British government well knew. It is unfair, secondly, because if impressment was allowable, a reciprocation of the practice would be no equivalent to the United States. The exercise of a right in common, at sea, by two nations, each over the vessels of the other, the one powerful and the other comparatively weak, would be, to put the latter completely at the mercy of the former. Great Britain, with her vast navy, would soon be the only party which made impressment. The United States would be compelled to abstain from it, and either to submit to the British rule, with all the abuses incident to power, or to resist it. But, should the United States be permitted to make impressment from British vessels, the effect would be unequal. Great Britain has, perhaps, thirty ships of war at sea, to one of the United States, and would profit of the arrangement in that proportion. Besides, impressment is a practice incident to war, in which view, likewise, the inequality is not less glaring, she being at least thirty years at war, to one of the United States. Other considerations prove that the British government made this acknowledgement merely as a pretext to justify its practice of impressment, without intending that the right or practice should ever be reciprocated. What would be the effect of its adoption by American ships of war, with British merchant vessels. An American officer boards a British merchant vessel and claims, as American citizens, whom he pleases. How many British seamen would disclaim a title which would take them to the United States and secure them there all the advantages of citizenship? The rule of evidence, as the ground of impressments in every instance, must likewise be reciprocated between the two governments. The acknowledgment of the men would surely be a better proof of their national character than the decision of a British officer who boarded an American vessel, however impartial he might be, and strong his power of discrimination, when opposed by the voluntary and solemn declaration of the party. In this way we might draw from the British service the greater part, if not all their seamen. I might further ask, why was this acknowledgment made at this late period, for the first time only, after the declaration of war, and when on that account it could produce no effect? In the various discussions of this subject, in many of which it has been demanded whether the British government would tolerate such a practice from American ships of war, no such intimation was ever given.

If Great Britain had found the employment of her seamen in our service injurious to her, and been disposed to respect our rights, the regular course of proceeding would have been for her government to have complained to the government of the United States of the injury, and to have proposed a remedy. Had this been done, and no reasonable remedy been adopted, sound in principle and reciprocal in its operation, the British government might have had some cause of complaint, and some plea for taking the remedy into its own hands. Such a procedure would at least, have given to its claim of impressment the greatest plausibility. We know that such complaint was never made, except in defence of the practice of impressment, and that in the mean time the practice has gone on, and grown into an usage, which with all its abuses, had resistance been longer delayed, might have become a law. The origin and progress of this usurpation afford strong illustrations of the British policy. The practice and the claim began together, soon after the close of our revolutionary war, and were applicable to deserters only. They extended next to all British seamen—then to all British subjects, including as in the case of emigrants from Ireland, persons who would not have been subject to impressment in British ports, not being seafaring men—and, finally, to Swedes, Danes and others, known to be not British subjects, and by their protections appearing to be naturalized citizens of the U. States.

Other views may be taken of the subject, to shew the unlawfulness and absurdity of the British claim. If British cruisers have a right to take British seamen from our vessels, without regarding the abuses inseparable from the practice, they may take from them, on the same principle, and with much greater reason, every species of property to which the British government has any kind of claim. Allegiance cannot give to a sovereign a better right to take his subjects than ownership to take his property. There would be no limit to this pretension or its consequences. All property forfeited by exportation, contrary to the laws of Great Britain, every article to which her sovereignty, jurisdiction or ownership would extend, in British vessels, would be liable to seizure in those of the United States. The laws of England would be executory in them. Instead of being a part of the American, they would become a part of the British territory.

It might naturally be expected that Great Britain would have given by her conduct, some support to her pretensions; that if she had not disclaimed altogether the principle of naturalization, she would at least have excluded from her service foreign seamen. Her conduct however has been altogether at variance with her precepts. She has given great facility to naturalization in all instances where it could advance her interest, and peculiar encouragement to that of foreign seamen. She naturalizes by special act of parliament. She naturalizes all persons who reside a certain term of years in British colonies, all those who are born of British subjects, in foreign dominions, and all seamen who have served a certain short term in the British service, and would doubtless protect all such as British subjects, if required by them so to do. Her governors of neighboring provinces are at this time compelling emigrants thither from the United States, to bear arms against the U. States.

The mediation offered by Russia presents to Great Britain, as well as to the United States a fair opportunity of accommodating this controversy with honor. The interposition of so distinguished a power, friendly to both parties, could not be declined by either, on just ground, especially by Great Britain, between whom and Russia there exists at this time a very interesting relation. When the British ministers are made acquainted at St. Petersburg with the conditions on which you are authorised to adjust this difference, it seems as if it would be impossible for Great Britain to decline them. Should she do it, still adhering to her former pretensions, her motive could not be misunderstood. The cause of the United States would thenceforward become the common cause of nations. A concession by them would operate to the disadvantage of every other power. They would all find in the conduct of Great Britain an unequivocal determination to destroy the rights of other flags, and to usurp the absolute dominion of the ocean. It is to be presumed that the British government will find it neither for the honor or interest of Great Britain, to push things to that extremity, but will have accepted this mediation, and have sent a minister or ministers to St. Petersburg with full powers to adjust the controversy on fair and just conditions.

Should improper impressions have been taken of the probable consequences of the war, you will have ample means to remove them. It is certain that from its prosecution Great Britain can promise to herself no advantage, while she exposes herself to great expenses, and to the danger of still greater losses. The people of the United States, accustomed to the indulgence of a long peace, roused by the causes and progress of the war, are rapidly acquiring military habits and becoming a military people. Our knowledge in naval tactics has increased, as has our maritime strength. The gallantry and success of our little navy have formed an epoch in naval history. The laurels which these brave men have gained, not for themselves alone, but for their country, from an enemy pre-eminent in naval exploits, for ages past, are among the proudest boasts of their grateful and affectionate fellow citizens. Our manufactures have taken an astonishing growth. In short, in every circumstance, in which the war is felt, its pressure tends evidently to unite our people, to draw out our resources, to invigorate our means, and to make us more truly an independent nation, and, as far as may be necessary, a great maritime power.

If the British government accepts the mediation of Russia, with a sincere desire to restore a good intelligence between the two countries, it may be presumed that a fair opportunity will be afforded for the arrangement of many other important interests, with advantage to both parties. The adjustment of the controversy relating to impressment only, though very important, would leave much unfinished. Almost every neutral right has been violated, and its violation persisted in to the moment that war was declared. The president sincerely desires, and it is doubtless for the interest of Great Britain, to prevent the like in future. The interposition of the emperor of Russia to promote an accommodation of those differences is deemed particularly auspicious.

A strong hope is, therefore, entertained, that full powers will be given to the British commissioners, to arrange all these grounds of controversy in a satisfactory manner. In entering on this interesting part of your duty, the first object which will claim your attention is, that of blockade. The violation of our neutral rights by illegal blockades, carried to an enormous extent by orders in council, was a principal cause of the war. These orders, however, and with them the blockade of May, 1806, and as is understood, all other illegal blockades, have been repealed, so that, that cause of war has been removed. All that is now expected is, that the British government will unite in a more precise definition of blockade, and in this no difficulty is anticipated; for having declared that no blockade would be legal, which was not supported by an adequate force, and that the blockades which it might institute should be supported by an adequate force, there appears to be, according to the just interpretation of these terms, no difference of opinion on the subject.

The British government has recently in two formal acts, given definitions of blockade, either of which would be satisfactory. The first is to be seen in a communication from Mr. Merry to this department, bearing date on the 12th of April, 1804. The following are the circumstances attending it. Commodore Hood, the commander of a British squadron in the West Indies in 1803, having declared the islands of Martinique and Guadeloupe in a state of blockade, without applying an adequate force to maintain it, the secretary of state remonstrated against the illegality of the measure, which remonstrance was laid before the lords commissioners of the admiralty in England, who replied, "that they had sent orders not to consider any blockade of these islands as existing unless in respect of particular ports, which might be actually invested, and then not to capture vessels bound to such ports, unless they shall previously have been warned not to enter them." The second definition is to be found in a convention between Great Britain and Russia in June, 1801, 4th sec. 3d art. which declares, "that in order to determine what characterises a blockaded port, that denomination is given only to a port where there is by the disposition of the power which attacks it, with ships stationary or sufficiently near, an evident danger in entering." The president is willing for you to adopt either of these definitions, but prefers the first as more precise and determinate; and when it is considered that it was made the criterion by so formal an act between the two governments, it cannot be presumed that the British government will object to the renewal of it. Nothing is more natural after the differences which have taken place between the two countries, on this and other subjects, and the departure from this criterion by Great Britain, for reasons which are admitted by her no longer to exist, than that they should on the restoration of a good understanding recur to it again. Such a recurrence would be the more satisfactory to the president, as it would afford a proof of a disposition in the British government, not simply to compromise a difference, but to re-establish a sincere friendship between the two nations.

An interference with our commerce between enemy's colonies and their parent country was among the violations of our neutral rights committed by Great Britain in her own present war with France. It took place in 1805, did extensive injury and produced universal excitement. In securing us against a repetition of it, you will attend to an article of the convention between Russia and Great Britain entered into on the day of 1801, to the 11th article of the project of a treaty with Great Britain that was signed by Mr. Monroe and Mr. Pinkney on the 31st December, 1806, and to the instructions from this department relating to that article of the 20th of May, 1807. The capture by Great Britain of almost all the islands of her enemies, diminishes the importance of any regulation of this subject; but as they may be restored by a treaty of peace, it merits particular attention. It being understood, however, that unless such a trade can be obtained in a proper extent, and without a relinquishment of the principle contended for by the United States, it will be best that the treaty be silent on the subject.

A disposition has been shewn by the British government to extend this principle so far as to inhibit a trade to neutrals even between a power at peace with Great Britain and her enemy, as for example between China and France. The absurdity of this pretention may prevent its being hereafter advanced. It will not, however, be unworthy of your attention.

By an order of the British government in 1803, British cruisers were authorized to take neutral vessels laden with innocent articles, on their return from an enemy's port, on the pretence that they had carried to such port contraband of war. This order is directly repugnant to the law of nations, as the circumstance of having contraband articles on board bound to an enemy's port, is the only legal ground of seizure. The claim was relinquished by the British government in the 9th article of the project above recited, you will endeavor in like manner to provide against it. It is the practice of British cruisers to compel the commanders of neutral vessels which they meet at sea, either to board them in person with their papers, or to send their papers on board in their boats by an officer. The injustice and irregularity of this procedure need not be mentioned. You will endeavor to suppress it in the manner proposed in the third article of a project communicated to Mr. Monroe at London in his instructions of the 5th January, 1804. You will endeavor likewise to restrict contraband of war, as much as in your power, to the list contained in the 4th article of that project.

The pretension of Great Britain to interdict the passage of neutral vessels with their cargoes from one port to another port of an enemy, is illegal and very injurious to the commerce of neutral powers. Still more unjustifiable is the attempt to interdict their passage from a port of one independent nation to that of another, on the pretence that they are both enemies. You will endeavor to obtain, in both instances, security for the neutral right.

Upon the whole subject I have to observe that your first duty will be to conclude a peace with G. Britain, and you are authorised to do it, in case you obtain a satisfactory stipulation against impressment, one which shall secure, under our flag, protection to the crew. The manner in which it may be done has been already stated, with the reciprocal stipulations which you may enter into to secure Great Britain against the injury of which she complains. If this encroachment of Great Britain is not provided against, the United States have appealed to arms in vain. If your efforts to accomplish it should fail, all further negotiations will cease, and you will return home without delay. It is possible that some difficulty may occur in arranging this article respecting its duration. To obviate this the president is willing that it be limited to the present war in Europe. Resting, as the United States do, on the solid ground of right, it is not presumable that Great Britain, especially after the advantage she may derive from the arrangement proposed, would ever revive her pretension. In forming any stipulation on this subject, you will be careful not to impair by it the right of the United States, or to sanction the principle of the British claim.

It is deemed highly important, also, to obtain a definition of the neutral rights which I have brought to your view, especially of blockade, and the manner suggested, but it is not to be made an indispensable condition of peace. After the repeal of the orders in council, and other illegal blockades, and the explanations attending it, it is not presumable that Great Britain will revive them. Should she do it, the United States will always have a corresponding resort in their own hands. You will observe in every case, in which you may not be able to obtain a satisfactory definition of the neutral right, that you enter into none respecting it.

Indemnity for losses seems to be a fair claim on the part of the United States, and the British government, if desirous to strengthen the relations of friendship, may be willing to make it. In bringing the claim into view, you will not let it defeat the primary objects intrusted to you. It is not perceived on what ground Great Britain can resist this claim, at least in the cases in favor of which she stands pledged. Of these a note will be added.

You are at liberty to stipulate in the proposed treaty the same advantages in the ports of the United States, in favor of British ships of war, that may be allowed to those of the most favored nations. This stipulation must be reciprocal.

No difficulty can arise from the case of the non-importation act, which will doubtless be terminated in consequence of a pacification. Should any stipulation to that effect be required, or found advantageous, you are at liberty to enter into it. Should peace be made, you may, in fixing the periods at which it shall take effect, in different latitudes and distances, take for the basis the provisional articles of the treaty of peace with Great Britain in 1782, with such alterations as may appear to be just and reasonable.

In discharging the duties of the trust committed to you, the president desires that you will manifest the highest degree of respect for the emperor of Russia, and confidence in the integrity and impartiality of his views. In arranging the question of impressment and every question of neutral right, you will explain to his government without reserve, the claims of the United States, with the grounds on which they severally rest. It is not doubted that from a conduct so frank and honorable the most beneficial effects will result.

I shall conclude by remarking that a strong hope is entertained that this friendly mediation of the emperor Alexander will form an epoch in the relations between the United States and Russia, which will be extensively felt, and be long and eminently distinguished by the happy consequences attending it. Since 1780, Russia has been the pivot on which all questions of neutral right have essentially turned. Most of the wars which have disturbed the world in modern times, have originated with Great Britain and France. These wars have affected distant countries, especially in their character as neutrals, and very materially the United States, who took no part in promoting them, and had no interest in the great objects of either power.

Extract of a letter from the secretary of state to the commissioners of the United States, for treating of peace with Great Britain, dated

Department of state, June 23, 1813.

"An opportunity offering, I avail myself of it to explain more fully the views of the president on certain subjects already treated on in your instructions, and to communicate his sentiments on some others, not adverted to in them.

"The British government having repealed the orders in council, and the blockade of May, 1806, and all other illegal blockades, and having declared that it would institute no blockade which should not be supported by an adequate force, it was thought better to leave that question on that ground, than to continue the war to obtain a more precise definition of blockade after the other essential cause of war, that of impressment, should be removed. But when it is considered that a stipulated definition of blockade will cost Great Britain nothing after having thus recognized the principle, and that such definition is calculated to give additional confidence, in the future security of our commerce, it is expected that she will agree to it. It is true, this cause of war being removed, the United States are under no obligation to continue it, for the want of such stipulated definition, more especially as they retain in their hands the remedy against any new violation of their rights, whenever made. The same remark is applicable to the case of impressment, for if the British government had issued orders to its cruisers not to impress seamen from our vessels and notified the same to this government, that cause of war would also have been removed. In making peace it is better for both nations, that the controversy respecting the blockade, should be arranged by treaty as well as that respecting impressment. The omission to arrange it may be productive of injury. Without a precise definition of blockade, improper pretensions might be set up on each side, respecting their rights, which might possibly hazard the future good understanding between the two countries.

"Should a restitution of territory be agreed on, it will be proper for you to make a provision for settling the boundary between the United States and Great Britain on the St. Lawrence and the lakes, from the point at which the line between them strikes the St. Lawrence, to the north western corner of the lake of the Woods, according to the principles of the treaty of peace. The settlement of this boundary is important from the circumstance that there are several islands in the river and lakes, of some extent and great value, the dominion over which is claimed by both parties. It may be an advisable course to appoint commissioners on each side, with full powers to adjust on fair and equitable considerations, this boundary. To enable you to adopt a suitable provision for the purpose it would be proper for you to recur to the instructions heretofore given on the subject, published in the documents in your possession."

Mr. Monroe, secretary of state, to the plenipotentiaries of the United States, at St. Petersburg.

Department of State, January 1st, 1814.

GENTLEMEN—I have not received a letter from you since your appointment to meet ministers from Great Britain at St. Petersburg, to negotiate a treaty of peace, under the mediation of the Emperor of Russia. This is doubtless owing to the miscarriage of your dispatches.

The message of the president, of which I have the honor to transmit to you a copy will make you acquainted with the progress of the war with Great Britain, to that period, and the other documents which are forwarded, will communicate what has since occurred.

Among the advantages attending our success in Upper Canada, was the important one of making capture of general Proctor's baggage, with all the public documents belonging to the British government in his possession. It is probable that these documents will be laid before congress, as they are of a nature highly interesting to the public. You will understand their true character by extracts of two letters from governor Cass, which are enclosed to you. By these it appears that the British government has exercised its influence over the Indian tribes within our limits, as well as elsewhere in peace, for hostile purposes towards the United States; and that the Indian barbarities, since the war, were, in many instances, known to, and sanctioned by the British government.

I have the honor to be, &c. &c. &c.

(Signed) JAMES MONROE.

Mr. Monroe, secretary of state, to the plenipotentiaries of the United States, at St. Petersburg.

Department of state, January 8th, 1814.

GENTLEMEN—I have the honor to transmit to you a copy of a letter from lord Castlereagh to this department and of a note from lord Castlereagh to the Russian government, with my reply to the communication.

The arrangement of a negotiation to be held at Gottenburg, directly between the United States and Great Britain, without the aid of the Russian mediation, makes it necessary that new commissions should be issued correspondent with it, and for this purpose that a new nomination should be made to the senate. The president instructs me to inform you, that you will both be included in it, and that he wishes you to repair immediately on the receipt of this, to the appointed rendezvous. It is probable the business may not be limited to yourselves on account of the great interest involved in the result. The commissions and instructions, will be duly forwarded to you, as soon as the arrangements shall be finally made.

In taking leave of the Russian government you will be careful to make known to it the sensibility of the president to the friendly disposition of the emperor, manifested by the offer of his mediation; the regret felt at its rejection by the British government, and a desire that, in future, the greatest confidence and cordiality, and the best understanding may prevail between the two governments.

I have the honor to be, &c.

(Signed) JAMES MONROE.

Mr. Monroe secretary of state, to the American plenipotentiaries at Gottenburg.

Department of state, January 28th, 1814.

GENTLEMEN—The British government having declined the Russian mediation, and proposed to treat directly with the United States, the president has, on due consideration, thought proper to accept the overture. To give effect to this arrangement, it was necessary that a new commission should be formed, and for that purpose that a new nomination should be made to the senate, by whose advice and consent this important trust is committed to you.

You will consider the instructions given to the commission to treat under the mediation of Russia, as applicable to the negotiation with which you are now charged, except as they may be modified by this letter.

I shall call your attention to the most important grounds of the controversy with Great Britain only, and make such remarks on each, and on the whole subject, as have occurred since the date of the former instructions, and are deemed applicable to the present juncture, taking into view the negotiation in which you are about to engage.

On impressment, as to the right of the United States to be exempted from it, I have nothing new to add. The sentiments of the president have undergone no change on that important subject. This degrading practice must cease; our flag must protect the crew, or the United States cannot consider themselves an independent nation. To settle this difference amicably the president is willing, as you are already informed by the former instructions, to remove all pretexts for it, to the British government, by excluding all British seamen from our vessels, and even to extend the exclusion to all British subjects, if necessary excepting only the few already naturalized, and to stipulate likewise, the surrender of all British seamen deserting in our ports in future from British vessels, public or private. It was presumed by all dispassionate persons, that the law of congress relative to seamen would effectually accomplish the object. But the president is willing, as you find, to prevent a possibility of failure, to go further.

Should a treaty be made, it is proper, and would have a conciliatory effect, that all our impressed seamen who may be discharged under it, should be paid for their services by the British government, for the time of their detention, the wages which they might have obtained in the merchant service of their own country.

Blockade is the subject next in point of importance, which you will have to arrange. In the instructions bearing date on the 15th April, 1813, it was remarked, that as the British government had revoked its orders in council, and agreed that no blockade could be legal which was not supported by an adequate force, and that such adequate force should be applied to any blockade which it might hereafter institute, this cause of controversy seemed to be removed. Further reflection, however, has added great force to the expediency and importance of a precise definition of the public law on this subject. There is much cause to presume, that if the repeal of the orders in council had taken place in time to have been known here before the declaration of war, and had had the effect of preventing the declaration, not only that no provision would have been obtained against impressment, but that under the name of blockade the same extent of coast would have been covered by proclamation as had been covered by the orders in council. The war, which these abuses and impressment contributed so much to produce might possibly prevent that consequence. But it would be more satisfactory, if not more safe, to guard against it by a formal definition in the treaty. It is true, should the British government violate again the legitimate principles of blockade, in whatever terms, or under whatever pretext it might be done, the United States would have in their hands a correspondent resort; but a principal object in making peace is to prevent, by the justice and reciprocity of the conditions, a recurrence again to war, for the same cause. If the British government sincerely wishes to make a durable peace with the United States, it can have no reasonable objection to a just definition of blockade, especially as the two governments have agreed in their correspondence, in all its essential features. The instructions of the 15th of April, 1813, have stated in what manner the president is willing to arrange this difference.

On the other neutral rights, enumerated in the former instructions, I shall remark only, that the catalogue is limited in a manner to evince a spirit of accommodation; that the arrangement proposed in each instance is just in itself; that it corresponds with the general spirit of treaties between commercial powers, and that Great Britain has sanctioned it in many treaties, and gone beyond it in some.

On the claim to indemnify for spoiliations, I have only to refer you to what was said in the former instructions. I have to add, that should a treaty be formed, it is just in itself, and would have a happy effect on the future relations of the two countries, if indemnity should be stipulated on each side, for the destruction of all unfortified towns and other private property, contrary to the laws and usages of war. It is equally proper, that the negroes taken from the southern states should be returned to their owners, or paid for at their full value. It is known that a shameful traffic has been carried on in the West Indies, by the sale of those persons there, by those who professed to be their deliverers. Of this fact, the proof which has reached this department shall be furnished you. If these slaves are considered as non-combatants they ought to be restored: if as property, they ought to be paid for. The treaty of peace contains an article which recognizes this principle.

In the view which I have taken of the conditions on which you are to insist in the proposed negotiations, you will find, on a comparison of them with those stated in the former instructions, that there is no material difference between them, the two last mentioned claims to indemnity excepted, which have originated since the date of those instructions. The principal object of this review has been to show, that the sentiments of the president are the same in every instance and that the reasons for maintaining them have become more evident and strong, since the date of those instructions.

In accepting the overture of the British government to treat independently of the Russian mediation, the United States have acted on principles which governed them in every transaction relating to peace since the war. Had the British government accepted the Russian mediation, the United States would have treated for themselves, independently of any other power, and had Great Britain met them on such conditions, peace would have been the immediate result. Had she refused to accede to such conditions, and attempted to dictate others, a knowledge of the views of other powers on those points might have been useful to the United States. In agreeing to treat directly with Great Britain, not only is no concession contemplated on any point in controversy, but the same desire is cherished to preserve a good understanding with Russia, and the other Baltic powers, as if the negotiation had taken place under the mediation of Russia.

It is probable that the British government may have declined the Russian mediation, from the apprehension of an understanding between the United States and Russia, for very different purposes from those which have been contemplated, in the hope that a much better treaty might be obtained of the United States, in a direct negotiation, than could be obtained under the Russian mediation, and with a view to profit of the concessions which might thus be made by the United States in future negotiations with the Baltic powers. If this was the object of the British government, and it is not easy to conceive any other, it clearly proves the advantage to be derived in the proposed negotiation, from the aid of those powers, in securing from the British government such conditions as would be satisfactory to all parties. It would be highly honorable as well as advantageous to the United States, if the negotiations with which you are charged, should terminate in such a treaty. I have the honor to be, &c.

Mr. Monroe, secretary of state, to the plenipotentiaries of the United States at Gottenburgh.

Department of State, Jan. 30, 1814.

GENTLEMEN—In addition to the claims to indemnity, stated in your preceding instructions, I have to request your attention to the following, to which it is presumed there can be no objection.

On the declaration of war by the United States, there happened to be, in the ordinary course of commerce, several American vessels and cargoes in the ports of Great Britain, which were seized and condemned; and, in one instance, an American ship which fled from Algiers, in consequence of the declaration of war by the Dey, to Gibraltar, with the American consul and some public stores on board, shared the same fate.

After the declaration of war, congress passed an act, allowing to British subjects six months from the date of the declaration, to remove their property out of the United States, in consequence of which many vessels were removed with their cargoes. I add, with confidence, that on a liberal construction of the spirit of the law, some vessels were permitted to depart even after the expiration of the term specified in the law. I will endeavor to put in your possession a list of these cases. A general reciprocal provision, however, will be best adapted to the object in view. I have the honor to be, &c. &c. &c.

(Signed) JAS. MONROE.

From the secretary of state to the commissioners of the United States for treating with Great Britain, dated

Department of State, Feb. 10, 1814.

GENTLEMEN—Should you conclude a treaty and not obtain a satisfactory arrangement of neutral rights, it will be proper for you to provide that the United States shall have advantage of any stipulations more favorable to neutral nations, that may be established between Great Britain and other powers. A precedent for such a provision is found in a declaratory article between Great Britain and Russia, bearing date on the 8th October, 1801, explanatory of the 2d section, 3d article, of a convention concluded between them on the 5th June of the same year. I have the honor to be, &c.

(Signed) JAMES MONROE.

Extract of a letter from the secretary of state to the commissioners of the United States for treating with Great Britain, dated

Department of State, Feb. 14, 1814.

"I received last night your letter of the 15th October, with extracts of letters from Mr. Adams and Mr. Harris of the 22d and 23d of November.

"It appears that you had no knowledge at the date, even of the last letter, of the answer of the British government, to the offer which had been made to it, a second time, of the Russian mediation. Hence it is to be inferred that the proposition made to this government by the Bramble was made not only without your knowledge, but without the sanction, if not without the knowledge of the emperor. Intelligence from other sources, strengthens this inference. If this view of the conduct of the British government is well founded, the motive for it cannot be mistaken. It may fairly be presumed that it was to prevent a good understanding and concert between the United States and Russia and Sweden, on the subject of neutral rights, in the hope that by drawing the negotiation to England, and depriving you of an opportunity of free communication with these powers, a treaty less favorable to the United States might be obtained, which might afterwards be used with advantage by Great Britain in her negotiations with those powers.

By an article in the former instructions, you were authorised in making a treaty to prevent impressment from our vessels to stipulate, provided a certain specified term could not be agreed on, that it might continue in force for the present war in Europe only. At that time it seemed probable that the war might last many years. Recent appearances, however, indicate the contrary. Should peace be made in Europe, as the practical evil of which we complain in regard to impressment would cease, it is presumed that the British government would have less objection to a stipulation to forbear that practice for a specified term, than it would have, should the war continue. In concluding a peace with Great Britain, even in case of a previous general peace in Europe, it is important to the United States to obtain such a stipulation."

Mr. Monroe, secretary of state, to the plenipotentiaries of the United States at Gottenburg.

Department of State, 21st of March, 1814.

GENTLEMEN—By the cartel Chauncy you will receive this, with duplicates of the commission to treat with Great Britain, and of the instructions and other documents that were forwarded by the John Adams. This vessel is sent to guard against any accident that might attend the other.

If a satisfactory arrangement can be concluded with Great Britain, the sooner it is accomplished the happier for both countries. If such an arrangement cannot be obtained, it is important for the United States to be acquainted with it without delay. I hope, therefore, to receive from you an account of the state of the negotiation and its prospects, as soon as you may be able to communicate any thing of an interesting nature respecting them.

I have the honor to be, &c.

(Signed)

JAS. MONROE.

Mr. Monroe to the envoys extraordinary and ministers plenipotentiary of the United States.

Department of State, June 25, 1814.

GENTLEMEN—No communication has been received from the joint mission which was appointed to meet the commissioners of the British government, at Gottenburg. A letter from Mr. Bayard, at Amsterdam, of the 18th March, was the last from either of our commissioners. It was inferred, from that letter, and other communications, Mr. Bayard, Mr. Mr. Gallatin and Mr. Adams, would be in Gottenburg; and it has been understood from other sources, that Mr. Clay and Mr. Russell had arrived there about the 15th of April. It is therefore expected, that a meeting will have taken place in May, and that we shall soon be made acquainted with your sentiments of the probable result of the negotiation.

It is impossible, with the lights which have reached us, to ascertain the present disposition of the British government towards an accommodation with the United States. We think it probable that the late events in France may have had a tendency to increase its pretensions.

At war with Great Britain and injured by France, the United States have sustained the attitude founded on these relations. No reliance was placed on the good offices of France, in bringing the war with Great Britain to a satisfactory conclusion. Looking steadily to an honorable peace, and the ultimate attainment of justice from both powers, the president has endeavored, by a consistent and honorable policy, to take advantage of every circumstance that might promote that result. He nevertheless, knew that France held a place in the political system of Europe and of the world, which as a check on England, could not fail to be useful to us. What effect the late events may have had, in these respects, is the important circumstance of which you are doubtless better informed than we can be.

The president accepted the mediation of Russia, from a respect for the character of the emperor, and a belief that our cause, in all the points in controversy, would gain strength by being made known to him. On the same principle, he preferred (in accepting the British overture, to treat independently of the Russian mediation) to open the negotiation on the continent, rather than at London.

It was inferred from the general policy of Russia, and the friendly sentiments and interposition of the emperor, that a respect for both would have much influence with the British cabinet in promoting a pacific policy towards us. The manner, however, in which it is understood that a general pacification is taking place; the influence Great Britain may have in modifying the arrangements involved in it; the resources she may be able to employ exclusively against the United States; and the uncertainty of the precise course which Russia may pursue in relation to the war between the United States and Great Britain, naturally claim attention, and raise the important question, in reference to the subject of impressment, on which it is presumed your negotiations will essentially turn, whether your powers ought not to be enlarged, so as to enable you to give to those circumstances all the weight to which they may be entitled. On full consideration, it has been decided, that in case no stipulation can be obtained from the British government at this moment, when its pretensions may have been much heightened by recent events, and the state of Europe be most favorable to them; either relinquishing the claim to impress from American vessels, or discontinuing the practice, even in consideration of the proposed exclusion from them of British seamen, you may concur in an article, stipulating, that the subjects of impressment, together with that of commerce, between the two countries, be referred to a separate negotiation, to be undertaken without delay, at such place as you may be able to agree on, preferring this city, if to be obtained. I annex at the close of this letter, a project of an article, expressing more distinctly, the idea which it is intended to communicate, not meaning thereby to restrain you in any respect as to form. Commerce and seamen, the objects of impressment, may, with great propriety, be arranged in the same instrument. By stipulating that commissioners shall be forthwith appointed for the purpose, and that all rights on this subject shall in the mean time be reserved, the faith of the British government will be pledged to a fair experiment in an amicable mode, and the honor and rights of the United States secured. The United States having resisted by war the practice of impressment, and continued the war until that practice had ceased by a peace in Europe, their object has been essentially obtained for the present. It may reasonably be expected, that the arrangement contemplated and provided for, will take effect before a new war in Europe shall furnish an occasion for reviving the practice. Should this arrangement, however, fail, and the practice be again revived, the United States will be again at liberty to repel it by war; and that they will do so cannot be doubted; for after the proof which they have already given of a firm resistance in that mode, persevered in until the practice had ceased, under circumstances the most unfavorable, it cannot be presumed that the practice will ever be tolerated again. Certain it is, that every day will render it more ineligible in Great Britain to make the attempt.

In contemplating the appointment of commissioners, to be made after the ratification of the present treaty, to negotiate and conclude a treaty to regulate commerce and provide against impressment, it is meant only to show the extent to which you may go, in a spirit of accommodation, if necessary.—Should the British government be willing to take the subject up immediately with you, it would be much preferred, in which case the proposed article would, of course, be adapted to the purpose.

Information has been received from a quarter deserving attention, that the late events in France have produced such an effect on the British government, as to make it probable that a demand will be made at Gottenburg, to surrender our right to the fisheries, to abandon all trade beyond the Cape of Good Hope, and cede Louisiana to Spain. We cannot believe that such a demand will be made; should it be, you will of course treat it as it deserves. These rights must not be brought into discussion. If insisted on, your negotiations will cease.

I have the honor to be, &c. &c.

(Signed)

JAMES MONROE.

"Whereas by the peace in Europe, the essential causes of the war between the United States and Great Britain, and particularly the practice of impressment, have ceased, and a sincere desire exists to arrange, in a manner satisfactory to both parties, all questions concerning seamen; and it is also their desire and intention to arrange, in like satisfactory manner, the commerce between the two countries, it is therefore agreed, that commissioners shall forthwith be appointed on each side, to meet at —, with full power to negotiate and conclude a treaty, as soon as it may be practicable, for the arrangement of those important interests. It is nevertheless understood, that until such treaty be formed, each party shall retain all its rights, and that all American citizens who have been impressed into the British service shall be forthwith discharged."

Extract of a letter from the secretary of state to the commissioners of the United States for treating of peace with Great Britain, dated

Department of State, June 27, 1814.

"The omission to send ministers to Gottenburg without a previous and official notification of the appointment and arrival there of those of the United States, a formality, which, if due from either party, might have been expected from that making the overture rather than that accepting it, is a proof of a dilatory policy, and would in other respects justify animadversions, if there was less disposition here to overlook circumstances of form, when interfering with more substantial objects.

"By my letter of the 25th inst. which goes with this, you will find that the subject had already been acted on under similar impressions with those which Mr. Bayard and Mr. Gallatin's letter could not fail to produce. The view however presented by them is much stronger, and entitled to much greater attention. The president has taken the subject into consideration again, and given to their suggestions all the weight to which they are justly entitled.

"On mature consideration it has been decided, that under all the circumstances above alluded to, incident to a prosecution of the war, you may omit any stipulation on the subject of impressment, if found indispensably necessary to terminate it. You will, of course not recur to this expedient until all your efforts to adjust the controversy in a more satisfactory manner have failed. As it is not the intention of the United States, in suffering the treaty to be silent on the subject of impressment, to admit the British claim thereon, or to relinquish that of the United States, it is highly important that any such inference be entirely precluded by a declaration or protest in some form or other, that the omission is not to have any such effect or tendency. Any modification of the practice, to prevent abuses, being an acknowledgment of the right in Great Britain, is utterly inadmissible.

"Although Gottenburg was contemplated at the time your commission was made out, as the seat of the negotiation, yet your commission itself does not confine you to it. You are at liberty, therefore, to transfer the negotiation to any other place made more eligible by a change of circumstances. Amsterdam and the Hague readily present themselves as preferable to any place in England. If, however, you should be of opinion, that under all circumstances, the negotiation in that country will be attended with advantages, outweighing the objections to it, you are at liberty to transfer it there."

Extract of a letter from the secretary of state, to the commissioners of the United States, for treating of peace with Great Britain, dated

Department of state, August 11, 1814.

"I had the honor to receive on the third of this month a letter from Mr. Bayard and Mr. Gallatin, of the 23d of May, and one from Mr. Gallatin, of the 2d of June.

"The president approves the arrangement communicated by those gentlemen for transferring the negotiation with the British government from Gottenburg to Ghent. It is presumed from Mr. Gallatin's letter that the meeting took place towards the latter end of June, and that we shall soon hear from you what will be its probable result.

"By my letters of the 25th and 27th June, of which another copy is now forwarded, the sentiments of the president, as to the conditions, on which it will be proper for you to conclude a treaty of peace, are made known to you. It is presumed that either in the mode suggested in my letter of the 25th June, which is much preferred, or by permitting the treaty to be silent on the subject, as is authorised in the letter of the 27th June, the question of impressment may be so disposed of, as to form no obstacle to a pacification. This government can go no further, because it will make no sacrifice of the rights or honor of the nation.

"If Great Britain does not terminate the war on the conditions which you are authorised to adopt, she has other objects in it than those for which she has hitherto professed to contend. That such are entertained, there is much reason to presume.—These, whatever they may be, must and will be resisted by the United States. The conflict may be severe, but it will be borne with firmness, and, as we confidently believe, be attended with success."

Pirates of Barrataria.

Copy of a letter from John K. Smith, esquire, to the secretary of the navy, dated

New-Orleans, September 23d, 1814.

SIR—Captain Patterson left this place on the 11th inst. with three barges, and was joined at the Balize by six gun boats and the schooner Carolina, from whence he proceeded against Barrataria. He has been completely successful in breaking up the nest of pirates at that place, and has taken nine vessels, some specie and a quantity of dry goods. The principal (Lafitte) escaped; but the second in command, Dominique, is taken. The number of prisoners taken is not known, nor are any of the particulars. A letter from that place states that capt.

Patterson would leave there on the 20th. He will therefore, no doubt, have the honor of giving you the result by the next mail.

The breaking up of this piratical establishment is of great importance to this country, it is ascertained that vessels clearing out from this port with passengers have been captured and every soul on board murdered; they took indiscriminately vessels of every nation, and the fact was perfectly known at Pensacola. The commanding British officer at that place recently made a communication in writing to Lafitte, requesting his aid in an attack upon New Orleans, which was refused. That correspondence which is in the hands of governor Claiborne no doubt has been communicated to the government.

In the gallant defence of Mobile Point the only two 24 pounders were injured and rendered useless.—general Jackson has since made a requisition upon captain Patterson for others to replace them, which have in his absence been furnished. I have the honor to be,

J. K. SMITH, &c.

Hon. William Jones, secretary of the navy.

From the Louisiana Gazette Extra, of Sept. 22.

GOOD NEWS.

Extract of a letter from col. Ross, at Grandterre, to major Reynolds, dated 19th Sept. 1814.

I have just time to say that in addition to taking some of the ringleaders, we are in possession of all the flotilla except a sch'r that was burnt to the water's edge, that were here, say seven fine sch'r's and felucces, armed and unarmed. We have this moment returned from taking a fine sch'r. outside of the island, of 150 tons, armed complete. Captain Henley lay off the bar, and out-manoeuvred her; she ran for us, getting between two fires—signal, a gun from the commodore; another strange sail in sight.

Enemy repulsed at Mobile.

Copy of a letter from major-general Jackson, to the secretary of war, dated

H. Q. 7th military district,
Mobile, September 17.

SIR—With lively emotions of satisfaction, I communicate that success has crowned the gallant efforts of our brave soldiers, in resisting and repulsing a combined British naval and land force, which on the 15th inst. attacked Fort Bowyer, on the point of Mobile.

I enclose a copy of the official report of major Wm. Lawrence, of the 2d infantry, who commanded. In addition to the particulars communicated in his letter, I have learnt that the ship which was destroyed, was the Hermes, of from 24 to 28 guns, captain the hon. Wm. H. Percy, senior officer in the Gulf of Mexico; and the brig so considerably damaged is the Sophie, 18 guns, captain Wm. Lockyer. The other ship was the Carron, of from 24 to 28 guns, captain Spencer, son of earl Spencer; the other brig's name unknown.

On board the Carron, 85 men were killed and wounded; among whom was col. Nicoll, of the royal marines, who lost an eye by a splinter. The land force consisted of 110 marines, and 200 Creek Indians, under the command of captain Woodbine, of the marines, and about 20 artilleryists, with one four and a half inch howitzer, from which they discharged shells and nine pound shot. They re-embarked the piece, and retreated by land towards Pensacola, whence they came.

By the morning report of the 16th, there were present in the fort, fit for duty, officers and men, 158.

The result of this engagement has stamped a character on the war in this quarter highly favorable to the American arms; it is an event from which may be drawn the most favorable augury.

An achievement so glorious in its consequences, should be appreciated by the government; and those concerned are entitled to, and will, doubtless, receive the most gratifying evidence of the approbation of their countrymen.

In the words of major Lawrence "where all behaved so well, it is unnecessary to discriminate." But all being meritorious, I beg leave to annex the names of the officers who were engaged and present; and hope they will, individually, be deemed worthy of distinction.

Major Wm. Lawrence, 2d inf. commanding; captain Walsh of the artillery, captains Chamberlain, Brownlow and Bradley of the 2d inf. captain Sands, deputy commissary of ordnance, lieutenants Villerd, Sturges, Conway, H. Sanders, T. R. Sanders, Brooks, Davis, and C. Sanders. all of the 2nd infantry.

I am confident that your own feelings will lead you to participate in my wishes on the subject. Permit me to suggest the propriety and justice of allowing to this gallant little band the value of the vessel destroyed by them.

I remain, with great respect, your obedient servant,

A. JACKSON, maj. gen. comd.

The hon. secretary of war.

Copy of a letter from major Lawrence to major general Jackson, dated Fort Bowyer, Sept. 15—12 o'clock at night.

SIR—After writing the enclosed, I was prevented by the approach of the enemy from sending it by express. At meridian they were under full sail, with an easy and favorable breeze standing directly for the fort, and at 4, P. M. we opened our battery, which was returned from two ships and two brigs, as they approached. The action became general at about 20 minutes past 4, and was continued without intermission on either side until 7, when 1 ship and 2 brigs were compelled to retire. The leading ship, supposed to be the commodore's, mounting 22 thirty-two pound carronades, having anchored nearest our battery, was so much disabled, her cable being cut by our shot, that she drifted on shore, within 600 yards of the battery, and the other vessels having got out of our reach, we kept such a tremendous fire upon her that she was set on fire and abandoned by the few of the crew who survived. At 10 P. M. we had the pleasure of witnessing the explosion of her magazine. The loss of lives on board must have been immense, as we are certain no boats left her except three, which had previously gone to her assistance, and one of these I believe was sunk; in fact, one of her boats was burned along side of her.

The brig that followed her I am certain was much damaged both in hull and rigging. The other two did not approach near enough to be so much injured, but I am confident they did not escape, as a well directed fire was kept on them during the whole time.

During the action a battery of a twelve pounder and a howitzer was opened on our rear without doing any execution, and was silenced by a few shot. Our loss is four privates killed and five wounded.

Towards the close of the action the flag-staff was shot away; but the flag was immediately hoisted on a sponge-staff over the parapet. While the flag was down the enemy kept up their most incessant and tremendous fire; the men were withdrawn from the curtains and N. E. bastion, as the enemy's own shot completely protected our rear, except the position they had chosen for their battery.

Where all behaved well it is unnecessary to discriminate. Suffice it to say, every officer and man did his duty; the whole behaved with that coolness and intrepidity which is characteristic of the true American, and which could scarcely have been expected from men most whom had never seen an enemy, and were now for the first time exposed for nearly three hours to a force of nearly or quite four guns to one.

We fired during the action between 4 and 500 guns, most of them double shotted, and after the first half hour but few missed an effect.

September 16th, 11 o'clock, A. M.

Upon an examination of our battery this morning, we find upwards of 300 shot and shot holes in the inside of the north and east curtains, and N. E. bastion, of all calibres, from musket ball to 32 pound shot. In the N. E. bastion there were three guns dismounted; one of which, a four pounder, was broken off near the trunnions by a 32 pound shot and another much battered. I regret to say that both the 24 pounders are cracked in such a manner as to render them unfit for service.

I am informed by two deserters from the land force, who have just arrived here, and whom I send for your disposal, that a reinforcement is expected, when they will doubtless endeavor to wipe off the stain of yesterday.

If you will send the Amelia down, we may probably save most or all of the ship's guns, as her wreck is lying in 6 or 7 feet water and some of them are just covered. They will not, however, answer for the fort, as they are too short.

By the deserters, we learn that the ship we have destroyed was the Hermes, but her commander's name they did not recollect. It was the commodore, and doubtless fell on his quarter deck, as we had a raking fire upon it at about two hundred yards distance for some time.

To capt. Sands, who will have the honor of handing you this despatch, I refer you for a more particular account of the movements of the enemy than may be contained in my letters; his services both before and during the action were of great importance, and I consider fully justify me in having detained him. Capt. Walsh and several men were much burned by the accidental explosion of two or three cartridges. They are not included in the list of wounded heretofore given.

The enemy's fleet this morning at day break were at anchor in the channel about four miles from the fort; shortly after it got under way and stood to sea; after passing the bar they hove too, and boats have been constantly passing between the disabled brig and the others. I presume the former is so much injured as to render it necessary to lighten her.

15 minutes after 1 P. M.—The whole fleet have this moment made sail and are standing to sea.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, sir, your obedient servant,

WM. LAWRENCE.

Re-establishment of the Inquisition

OR,
"SPANISH LIBERTY" CONSUMMATED.

One might think that the mere publication of the following decree of Ferdinand the ungrateful would of itself be sufficient at a time like this when we are so overrun with matter of great interest; but there is in the procedure so much of that real kingcraft and priestcraft which I have felt it my duty to say a good deal upon for these several years past, that I cannot permit its insertion without seriously and solemnly calling the attention of my youthful readers, particularly, to the many truths I have told them, over and over again, regarding unholy alliances between the church and the state; and of the burlesque fighting for "liberty" in Spain, &c. where a despotism now reigns more dreadful, because more likely to be permanent, than ever the brain of the "tyrant" Bonaparte contrived or thought of. Every remnant of freedom is destroyed. The real patriots of Spain, and many such there were,—men who fought for their country, in sincerity and truth, are meeting secret death, groaning in dungeons, laboring in the gallees, or proscribed and banished from the soil they preserved for a base king and villainous priesthood.—The "holy office," blasphemously so called, has already put its foul engines at work, and the king's minister "of justice and mercy" finishes and perfects the spirit of the monarchy by prostituting all claims to either.

There is no freedom of opinion in Spain—the press is fettered; nay, the very mind of man, if it be possible, is enchained. Every thing—every thought, word or deed, undergoes the inquisition of the partizans of the court—and every thing is condemned that does not come up to its standard of political and religious corruption. The editors of a journal at Madrid, Villanueva and Juan Joseph Lassennal, inserted a paragraph stating that "the officers of the third army had declared collectively that they would defend the constitution"—that constitution which Ferdinand had accepted: for this, the former was sent to the gallees stationed on the coast of Africa, for six years; and the latter condemned to pass that period in close confinement! It is for these things that the Spaniards relieved their country of Bonaparte!

It is worthy of remark with what gratitude Ferdinand treats his disinterested friends, the English. The second paragraph of the decree has some passages which I have marked in italic, that shews his opinion of the "burden of religion."

To top the whole, the king has levied a contribution of fifteen millions on his impoverished and exhausted people; and cut them off from receipts of books and papers from other countries, especially prohibiting the introduction of British newspapers. "Rejoice Spain—the Bourbons are restored!" Your people "repose in the arms of their legitimate king!"

Supplement to the Madrid Gazette, July 3d, 1814.

The king our lord has been pleased to enact the following decree. The glorious time of Catholic, by which the kings of Spain are distinguished among the other christian princes, because they do not tolerate in their kingdom any one who professes another religion than the catholic, apostolic and roman, has powerfully excited my heart to employ all the means which God has placed in my hands, in order to make myself worthy of it.

The past troubles and war which afflicted all the provinces of the kingdom, during the space of six years; the residence therein during that time of foreign troops of different sects, almost all infected with abhorrence and hatred to the catholic religion; and the disorder that these evils always bring with them, together with the little care which was taken for some time in providing for what concerned the things of religion, gave to the wicked unlimited license to live after their free will, and to introduce in this kingdom, and fix in many persons, pernicious opinions by the same means with which they had been propagated in other countries.

Desiring therefore to provide a remedy against so great an evil, and preserve in my dominions the holy religion of Jesus Christ, which my people love, and in which they have lived and do live happily, both by the duty which the fundamental laws of the kingdom impose on the prince which shall reign over it, and I have sworn to observe and fulfil, as likewise being the most proper means to preserve my subjects from intestine discussions, and maintain them in peace and tranquillity, I have thought it would be very convenient in the present circumstances, that the tribunal of the holy office should return to the exercise of its jurisdiction.

Upon which subject wise and virtuous prelates and many corporations and serious persons, both ecclesiastical and secular, have represented to me that it was owing to this tribunal that Spain was not contaminated in the 16th century, with the errors that caused so much affliction in other kingdoms, that nation flourishing, at that time, in all kinds of literature, in great men, in holiness and virtue. And that one of the principal means employed by the oppressor of Europe in order to sow corruption and discord, from which he derived so many advantages, was to destroy it under pretence that the light of the age could not bear its continuance any longer; and which, afterwards, the self-styled general cortes, with the same pretence, and that of the constitution, which they had tumultuously framed, annulled, to the great sorrow of the nation.

Wherefore, they have ardently requested me to re-establish that tribunal, and according to their requests, and the wishes of the people, who from love to the religion of their fathers, have restored by their own accord, some of the subaltern tribunals to their functions, I have resolved that the council of the inquisition and the other tribunals of the holy office, should be restored and continued in the exercise of their jurisdiction, both ecclesiastical, which, at the request of my august predecessors, the pontiffs gave to it, and the royal, which the Kings granted to it, observing in the exercises of both the ordinances by which they were governed in 1808, and the laws and regulations, which, to avoid certain abuses, and moderate some privileges, it was mete to take at different times.

As besides these provisions it may perhaps be suitable to others; and my intention being to improve this establishment that the greatest utility may arise to my subjects from it, I wish that as soon as the council of inquisition shall meet, two of its members, and two of my royal council, both of which I shall nominate, should examine the form and mode of proceeding in the causes appertaining to the holy office, and the notions established for the censure and prohibition of books; and if there should be found any thing in it, contrary to the good of my subjects, and the upright administration of justice, or that ought to be altered, it shall be proposed to me, that I may determine what shall be proper. This is communicated for your information, and of whom it may concern.

Palace, 21st July, 1814.

THE KING.

Events of the War.

MISCELLANEOUS.

In the next paper, which will be published on Wednesday, to supply one of the numbers in arrear, we shall insert the usual notice of events. The present very brief account of the principal things that have happened may suffice till then.

It appears that the British fleet, their great ship in c. is out on Ontario—our's is at Sackett's harbor—where great preparations are made to receive the expected attack of the enemy.

The enemy appears to have taken that part of Massachusetts that lies east of the Penobscot as a permanent possession.

The bill before Congress to remove the seat of government has been rejected. A very important letter from the secretary of the treasury has been received—he recommends as a part of his system, the establishment of a national bank with a capital of 50 millions.

The enemy has chiefly left the Chesapeake bay. An attack on New York seems expected. Possibly, from the troops that are supposed to be coming out with lord Hall, who has not yet arrived, as we know of.

Gen. M'Arthur with 700 mounted men, and 2 or 500 Indians, arrived at Detroit about the 10th inst. Gen. Brown, had received handsome reinforcements from the west.

GENERAL ORDERS. Head quarters, Washington city, 16th, October, 1814. Major-general Scott, who has been appointed to the 10th military district, enters on the duties of his command.

A morning state of the troops in service within the district, whether regulars, volunteers or militia, will be forwarded without delay to the office of the assistant adjutant general, Baltimore, at which place head-quarters will be established until further orders.

The major-general will have the pleasure of reviewing the troops in succession, in the course of the present week, of which intention, commandants of brigades and corps will be more particularly notified, in the mean time, it is confidently expected that no exertions will be spared to give to the troops the highest degree of efficiency, which the expectations of the country, and the fame of individual corps so imperiously demand.

W. SCOTT, Maj. gen.

By order,

R. G. HITE,

Assist. adj. gen. 10th military district.

Head-quarters, town of Mobile September 17, 1814.

Inspector general's office, 7th military district.

GENERAL ORDERS—Our companions in arms have triumphed over the enemy. At 4 o'clock P. M. on the 15th inst. fort Bowyer was attacked, by a superior British naval and land force, and the enemy was repulsed at all points. The naval force consisted of 2 ships from 24 to 28 guns, mounting 32 pound carronades, two brigs, from 16 to 18 guns, mounting 24 pound carronades, with three tenders, all under the command of commodore sir W. H. Percy. The land forces of the enemy consisted of one hundred marines, under the command of colonel Nicolls, 300 Indians under the command of captain Woodbine of the British army, and a battery of a 12 pounder and howitzer, under the direction of a British captain of the royal artillery. Our effective force opposed to the enemy was about 120 men, of whom not more than 90 were engaged.

The leading ship called the Hermes, commodore sir W. H. Percy, having approached within the reach of our guns, our battery opened upon her; the guns of which were fired in succession as they could be brought to bear; and at 20 minutes after 4 P. M. the engagement became general. About this time the enemy on shore with colonel Nicolls at the head of the marines, captain Woodbine at the head of their allies the Indians, and the captain of the British royal artillery, with his battery, were put to flight, by two discharges of grape and cannister from a nine pounder. At 5 P. M. the commodore's ship swung head on, to our battery, when we were enabled to rake her so effectually as to silence her guns. Having cut her cable by our shot, she drifted out and grounded stern on, within 600 yards, which again afforded us an opportunity of raking her, and we continued doing so while there was light enough to see that her colors were flying; just about sunset the other vessels cut their cables and stood off with a light breeze, under a tremendous fire from our battery. At a quarter past 7 we discovered the commander's ship to be on fire, and at 10 P. M. her magazine blew up.

We cannot ascertain the precise loss of the enemy, but from deserters, who came in the morning after the battle, we learn that the commander and only 20 men escaped from the Hermes—her crew being originally 170. That 85 were killed and wounded on board the Charon. The loss on board the brigs is unknown, but must have been very great, from the circumstance of one of them being infinitely more exposed than the Charon. Our loss was four privates killed and five wounded. During the hottest part of the action our flag staff being shot away, the flag was immediately regained under a heavy fire of grape and cannister, and hoisted on a sponge staff and planted on the parapet.

This achievement of our brothers in arms is dear to us, and calls for, and will have the gratitude of a grateful country! Our arms have triumphed over the enemy. The brave officers, non-commissioned officers and privates under the command of the gallant major Lawrence, have done their duty, and in point of cool and determined courage their conduct cannot be surpassed. There was but one feeling pervading every grade and rank through the whole action, and that was who should be foremost in the race of glory. With them the post of danger was the post of honor.

By command of major general Jackson,

H. HAYNE.

The WASHINGTON of 74 guns, built at Portsmouth, N. H. under the superintendence of captain Hull, was launched without the slightest accident or impediment, on the 1st inst. She, with the Independence, at Boston, are probably two of the finest vessels afloat; and will not decline a combat with any other two that swims—three deckers not excepted.

The famous American privateer Prince, of Neufchatel has recently sailed from Cherbourg on a cruise. She has since arrived at Boston, after a splendid cruise.

Twenty one sail of transports arrived in the St. Lawrence from Cork, on the 22nd September. The troops on board are not given.

The crew of the Reindeer, captured by the Wasp, have been sent to England from France.

The American prisoners sent to England in the Benson transport, made an unsuccessful attempt to recover their freedom, in which 4 of them were killed and 8 wounded.

London, August 5.—Accounts have been received at Lloyd's, since the first of last month of the capture of 7 vessels by the U. S. sloop of war Wasp, (put into L'Orient to refit;) 2 by the U. S. sloop of war Syren; and 99 by different American privateers.

Two deserters arrived in town yesterday morning from the Superb 74, in Gardner's bry. They report themselves to be Americans, who have been detained seven years in the British service, and that they were sent on shore with a foraging party, when they made their escape. They state that the enemy is furnished almost daily with our different newspapers, by a grey headed pilot.—New York paper.

The British coasts are excessively vexed by a few of our flying privateers. A London paper says, that, the navigation of the Irish channel is unsafe!—One daring fellow lately burnt a large ship laden with brandy from Bordeaux in Dublin bay. The British growl excessively about the admission of our armed vessels into the ports of France—three were reported refitting at Rochelle!

Burlington, vt. Sept. 30. The British large ship taken by commodore Maedonough is repaired and painted. She is undoubtedly one of the finest ships of her class in the British navy, mounting 28 long double fortified 24 pounders with locks, and carrying in the whole 39 guns, she is 160 feet in length, 40 feet in breadth; presenting a most formidable battery, and which if it had been managed with the skill of Maedonough, was sufficient of itself to have captured or destroyed the whole of our fleet.*—Apprehending no danger from the enemy in this quarter, we understand that the commodore intends in a few days to put his fleet up for winter quarters in the bay of Fiddlers Elbow, a place so called a little this side Schenboroug (White Hall).—From the situation of the adjacent rocks and mountains, being almost perpendicular, a small battery will in all human probability defend our fleet from any force which the enemy may bring against it.

Slave trade.—A Spanish ship with 323, and a schooner with 130 SLAVES, lately arrived at Havanna from Africa.

The following numerical calculation of the emigrations from France, between the 14th July, 1793, was published at Paris by order of the directory, in the year 1798: Total number 124,000, of whom 9,000 women, and 16,920 men, were of the nobility; 28,000 priests, 404 belonging to the parlements, 8,492 nobles in the military profession, 9,933 landed proprietors, 2,867 lawyers, 220 bankers, 7,890 merchants, 324 notaries, 528 physicians, 540 surgeons, 3,258 farmers, 2,000 nobles in the naval service, 22,729 artisans, 2,850 servants, 3,000 wives of the artisans, 3,033 children of both sexes, 4,428 nuns (religieuses.)

London, May 30. In a letter from Christiansand, dated the 13th inst. it is stated that the Norwegians had taken several Swedish privateers, and carried them into Norway, and that four or five Norwegian privateers were out from Christiansand.

While Ferdinand from Sicily is issuing declarations of his right to the kingdom of Naples, and his firm resolve to support his claims, Murat is progressively strengthening himself on the throne by alliance with the great confederates of Europe, and with the other powers of the Mediterranean. A truce has been concluded for twelve months between him and the dey of Tunis.

Christiana, April 24.—The following is the result of the deliberations of the diet at Edswold, up to the 19th of this month.

"Norway shall be an hereditary limited monarchy, the kingdom free and indivisible: the regent king.

"The Lutheran is the established religion of the state, but the professors of every other religion preserve their liberty and privileges.

"The king has the right of making war and peace, and the right of pardoning.

"The people exercise, by their representatives, the legislative authority, and the rights of levying the taxes.

"The judicial power is always to remain distinct from other branches of government.

"Henceforward no hereditary privileges shall be allowed either to persons or corporations.

"Industry and civil occupations shall not be subject to any new restriction.

"The press shall be free from all restraints."

Legislature of New York.

IV ASSEMBLY—Sept. 30, 1814.

MESSAGE,

From his Excellency the governor, with accompanying documents.

Gentlemen—Conformably to the declaration made in my public communication, I now do myself the honor of detailing the measures of defence which have been pursued in the recess of the legislature.

Learning that general Brown's army had retrograded to Erie, and was jeopardized, and that he had called on maj. general Hall for a small militia force, I dispatched col. John B. Yates, one of my aids, to that frontier with authority and directions to consult with the principal officers and characters there, and to make a further call for such force as might be deemed necessary. His report is herewith communicated. Part of the militia called out by that order, have crossed to Erie, and conducted like patriots and brave men, as will appear by the official letter of major general Brown, which accompanies this letter.

Taking it for granted that Sackett's harbor would occasionally be drained of regular troops during the campaign, and that the commanding officer there would of course be under the necessity of asking for temporary reinforcements of militia, the major general and brigadier generals of the surrounding districts of country were severally instructed to comply promptly with any call for militia, without waiting to consult me; and I engaged to confirm, as far as depended on me, their official acts in such cases. Accordingly, bodies of militia have, at different times, repaired to the defence of the harbor, and a considerable number are now in service there.

The success of the enemy at Washington, spread a momentary panic on the sea board. The corporation of the city of New York, had previously made an arrangement with the general government for the advance, in the first instance, of the funds necessary to pay three thousand militia, to be called into service at New York. Upon receiving a requisition for that number of militia, it was immediately put in service. Soon after the disasters at Washington, a requisition was made by the commanding officer of the third military district, for a large additional number of militia for the defence of New-York. This call was also promptly complied with and numbers rather exceeding the amount of the requisition, are now in the service of the United States, at New York.

The Champlain frontier was at that time considered by me, perfectly secure, and I was confirmed in this opinion by a communication from major general Mooers, of the militia, a copy whereof, marked C. accompanies this communication—but after I had made a call upon the militia of the interior counties to make up the number required for New York, a communication, acquainting me with the withdrawal of a principal part of the northern army from the frontier, and with general Izard's call upon maj. gen. Mooers, for a militia detachment, was received by me at New-York, and contained the first intimation I had of that movement.

An express was instantly dispatched with orders for general Mooers to comply with general Izard's demand immediately. General Mooers, however, had anticipated my orders, by calling out the militia of Clinton, Essex and Franklin; and upon the receipt of my instructions made a further levy for militia of Saratoga, Montgomery and Schoharie counties, detached and organized as a part of our quota of 13,500 men, required by the president's order of the 4th of July last, and upon the Rensselaer, Washington and Warren brigades en masse; and I directed that part of the detachment of 13,500 men, made from Rensselaer county, to repair to Plattsburg with general Eddy's brigade. A few of these troops had arrived, and the residue were on their way when the glorious triumph of our naval and land forces at Plattsburg was announced.

In addition to the militia in service at New York I thought it my duty, with the advice of the city authorities, to organize, for the defence of New York, a body of seamen. Accordingly I have formed corps of sea fencibles, upon the principles contained in the act of congress relative to that description of troops. But they are liable to disbandment if the legislature should disapprove of their employment. About one thousand of this description of troops have been raised, and are stationed in the block houses, water batteries and other places in the harbor, where they can be most serviceable. The corporation have been so liberal as to advance the funds for paying them, in confidence that the same will be assumed and refunded by the state. As the time for which the sea fencibles have been paid in advance will soon expire, an immediate expression of the intention of the legislature, with respect to their continuance, is desirable, to the end, that they may be disbanded without further expenses, in case the employment of them should not be sanctioned.

It is with regret, I notice that the militia generally have appeared without arms or equipments; and that too, where it was well ascertained that they were provided with them at home. There is no law which enables the officers to punish such delinquency. There was no alternative left, therefore, but to assume the responsibility of purchasing an additional supply of arms to equip them, or to leave the city of New York unprotected. I did not hesitate to purchase arms with funds advanced by the corporation of New York, under an expectation that they would be reimbursed by the state. The sum advanced by the corporation to the commissary of this state, for providing muskets, equipments, ammunition and camp equipage, and the sums advanced by them to the principal paymaster for raising, paying and equipping about one thousand sea fencibles, will be stated in a communication as soon as I may receive the return from those officers, which they have been directed to make.

In addition to these sums, five thousand dollars were advanced, at my request, to one of the assistant deputy and quarter master generals of militia at New York, for the purpose of meeting some expenses indispensable for the comfortable accommodation of the militia, the deputy quarter master general of the district not being in funds to give the requisite assistance; but part only of the last mentioned advance has been expended, the account and vouchers for which, with the balance in hand, will be transferred to the deputy quarter master general, and the state be thereby exonerated from it.

The paymasters and quarter masters of the militia of New York have executed bonds with satisfactory sureties, and in large penalties, for the performance of their respective duties, and for rendering accurate and faithful vouchers and accounts for all monies which come to their hands.

The state troops now in service in New York, may be estimated, and are stationed as follows:

One division under major gen. Ebenezer Stevens of the militia,	5,700
One brigade commanded by brigadier gen. Samuel Haight, stationed at Brooklyn,	1,800
One brigade commanded by brig. general Jeremiah Johnson, stationed at Brooklyn,	1,750
One brigade under the command of brigadier general John Sweetwood, stationed at Staten Island,	2,150
One brigade, at Great Baron Island, under the command of brig. gen. — Van Orden,	1,500
One brigade at Harlem Heights commanded by brig. gen. Heernance,	1,600
One brigade stationed at Greenwich, under the command of brig. gen. Peter Curtin,	1,750
A squadron of cavalry, commanded by lieut. col. James Warner,	400
Sea-fencibles, raised for the emergency, and stationed in the Hackaway and Gravi send Lockhouse, and in Forts Gates, Diamond, Stevens, &c. supposed to be in the whole, by this time,	1,000
	17,550

These troops, with the regulars, commodore Deatur's force, the United States' Sea-Fencibles and the militia of New Jersey, do, in my opinion place the city of New-York in a respectable state of defence.

All the services which were rendered by my aids de camp since the commencement of the war, and which at times have been very arduous, were rendered gratuitously until the first day of September, inst. when the pressure of business was such as to call for their constant attendance and employment at my office; and I then ordered them into actual service, deeming it unreasonable any longer to require of them, as gratuitous, such arduous services as were needed, and for the want of which it would have been impossible for me, without destroying my health, to get along with the accumulated military business of my office.

I pray the legislature to confirm this proceeding and to make some provision which may hereafter relieve me from embarrassment in similar cases.

Experience has, I believe, satisfied all reflecting persons that the expence, public inconvenience, waste and destruction of military stores, and interruption of agricultural pursuits, arising from calls on the ordinary militia, as now organized and regulated, are totally disproportioned to their efficiency in service, and that therefore a resort to some other measure to repel invasion and to meet emergencies, is indispensable.

I have had the honor to suggest the propriety of organizing and having in constant readiness as an advance corps, at least twenty thousand men uniformed, armed and equipped. These may be raised by classification or otherwise, as may best suit the views of the legislature. Camp equipage, cannon and arms, for the equipment of that number of men, might be provided and be kept in readiness in accessible depots, and the ordinary militia might be excused from service except in a dernier resort, when the exercise of more summary authority than is now granted by law will be necessary to compel attendance and enforce prompt subordination. The organization of staff departments for the state, for districts and for corps, as nearly conformable to the staff of the army as may be practicable, is highly necessary. Should an advance corps of about 20,000 men be raised, uniformed and equipped for service, it might be organized, proportioned and held in readiness, as follows:

FOR THE NORTHERN FRONTIER.

TWO DIVISIONS.

One regiment artillery, including company officers,	1080
One brigade of sea-fencibles,	2100
One battalion of riflemen,	540
One squadron horse artillery, to act also as cavalry,	540
Two brigades of infantry,	4320

FOR THE CHAMPLAIN FRONTIER.

ONE DIVISION.

A regiment of riflemen,	1280
One brigade of infantry,	2160
A squadron of cavalry,	540
A battalion of artillery,	516
Two companies of mounted riflemen,	216
	4836

For the Frontier of Niagara, and on Lake Ontario.

TWO DIVISIONS.

One regiment of riflemen,	1080
One regiment of artillery,	1080
Two brigades of infantry,	4320
One battalion of sea-fencibles,	540

The ignorance of discipline of some of the officers of the militia, render it proper that the military institutions should be kept up in time of war, as nurseries for officers. A liberal gentleman in New York has offered to uniform a corps of cadets if I would organize them, and permission has been given by the war department for three of the members of the military academy of the United States to take charge and instruct them. I should be happy, with the approbation of the legislature, to organize three companies of cadets, and to have them instructed and disciplined for militia officers. One company for New York, one for the Eastern and one for the Western District.

It is probable that no one establishment would be of more importance to the United States, and in particular to this state, than a common foundry upon the Hudson above the Highlands. If the Legislature will take measures separately or in concert with individuals to erect an extensive foundry on the Hudson, I am satisfied that they will thereby greatly advance the public interests. The purchase money of a site and other expenses of an extensive foundry, will probably amount to 70,000 dollars. The establishment may, with industry, be put in operation in two months.

The power to organize the militia is vested in Congress. As that body is now in session, it is respectfully submitted whether it would not be advisable to authorise a re-organization of the militia of this state in the recess of the Legislature, so as to conform in any new organization which congress may prescribe during their present session.

BUFFALO, Sept. 3, 1814.

Dear Sir—The militia are collecting at this place very rapidly—there is the greatest probability that more will turn out than were required by the order. Every thing has been done to rouse the feelings of the community, and the exertions for that purpose have been apparently attended with very great success. Brig. general Davis, of Genessee county, has ordered out his whole brigade, without any requisition or authority. Yet, as it was thought they might be usefully employed, it was thought proper not to discourage him. If he were regularly ordered out, he would take the command from general Porter.

By a proper disposition and use of the means which now are, or in a few days will be, in the power of gen. Brown, the enemy's force now cannonading Fort Erie, will be obliged to retire. There is every appearance of a disposition on the part of the militia to cross the Niagara; and if they do not, the disappointment will be very great indeed—but I cannot for a moment doubt it. If they do the enemy must retreat or submit. The disproportion of force will be too great for them to resist.

There has been a very great difficulty in procuring a sufficient quantity of arms. I wrote to Mr. Carpenter, at Whitesboro', from whom I have not yet heard. I have also written to Mr. Hopper at Onondaga.

The arms at Canandaigua and Batavia have been taken for the use of the detachment—some have been sent out also to collect such as may be in the hands of individuals, and have not been returned; these together with such United States arms as can be procured, and British arms taken from the enemy, will probably be sufficient to arm the men.

With the greatest respect, I am,

Your excellency's very obed't serv't.

Head-quarters, Fort Erie, Sept. 20 1814.

MY DEAR SIR—Your excellency is no doubt aware how near the army under my command has suffered from the fire of the enemy's batteries, of which the first and second were not more than 500 yards distant. Soon after my arrival, I ascertained they were night and day employed in erecting a third, to the right of the others, which would rake obliquely our whole encampment. About the 12th, this new work was nearly completed, and in it were mounted some long 24 pounders. Being very impatient under the fire of the old, and knowing that our difficulties would increase from the opening of a new battery, I determined to hazard a sortie, with a view of carrying them, and destroying the cannon. On the 17th inst. an order was given to this effect, and executed in the most gallant style.

The batteries were carried, the principal work blown up, and the cannon effectually destroyed. It was a desperate conflict. The loss of the enemy cannot be less than 300 men. Our own is severe, in officers particularly. The militia of New York have redeemed their character—they behaved gallantly. Gen. Davis was killed, and general Porter slightly wounded in the hand.

Of the militia that were called out by the last requisition, fifteen hundred men have crossed. This reinforcement has been of immense importance to us; it doubled our effective strength, and their good conduct can but have the happiest effect upon the nation. The brave men deserve well of their country; and I flatter myself that the legislature about to convene, will notice them as becomes the representatives of a generous people.

I am, sir, very respectfully, your most obedient servant,

(Signed) JAC. BROWN.

His excellency Gov. Tompkins.

Extract of a letter from major-general Mooers.

"Plattsburg, Aug. 14, 1814.

SIR—Inclosed is a copy of my note to gen. Izard, and of his to me. In place of a few companies, as the general's letter indicates, I consider several thousand of the militia necessary to the maintenance of this frontier. I shall do what is in my power to aid the regular troops whenever necessary.

I am, &c.

BENJAMIN MOOERS.

Copy of a letter from major-general Mooers, of the militia, to major-general Izard, of the army.

SIR—Report says, we are invaded by the enemy's flotilla, &c. or in imminent danger of being invaded by a formidable force. Should it be necessary to call out the militia on this occasion, your requisition will be immediately attended to. I am, &c.

BENJAMIN MOOERS.

Major-general Izard, 12th Aug. 1814.

Copy of general Izard's answer.

Camp near Chazy, Aug. 13, 1814.

Maj. gen. Mooers, N. Y. militia.

SIR—Your note of yesterday was delivered to me last evening, by major Rees. There has occurred nothing on this frontier to justify the alarm which appears to prevail at Plattsburg. It is not improbable that an engagement will take place soon on the lines; but I see no cause for apprehending the result. I have received no instructions to call out the militia; it will be well, however, to order such companies as are nearest to the scene of operations, to hold themselves in readiness to assemble in arms at the shortest notice. When you shall have determined the place of rendezvous, I will thank you to give me notice of it, and of the number of men who may be counted upon.

I am, sir, your most obed't humble serv't,

GEORGE IZARD.

Northern Army—Head-quarters, near Chazy,

August 23th, 1814.

His excellency gov. Tompkins.

SIR—Having received on the 22d inst. authority from the department of war to make a requisition on the governor of New York, for such detachments of militia as in my opinion, may be necessary, I called upon major-general Mooers as commanding officer of the militia in this part of the state, for one regiment of infantry, and one troop of light dragoons, armed and equipped according to law, to assemble as speedily as possible at the village of Chazy.

I last evening was honored with major-general Mooers's answer, by which I am informed, that "he has not received any instructions to call into service the militia, or any part of it, except what is given by law in case of invasion, &c."

As I am ordered to move with the greater part of my force from lake Champlain, I am apprehensive that serious evil may result from the delay in acting upon the requisition. I hasten to communicate the circumstance to you, in the wish that a remedy may be applied in season. The fortifications erected by my direction at Plattsburgh and Cumberland Head, will, I trust, suffice for the protection of captain Macdonough's squadron, and the stores which I leave behind me. But they will require the whole of the force, amounting to between two and three thousand men of United States' troops, under brigadier-general M'comb, to whom I intrust their defence. The country north and west of these points, from Plattsburgh to Champlain and Chateaugay, will remain exposed to the enemy.

I am, with great respect, sir, your excellency's most obedient servant,

GEO. IZARD.

Copy of a letter to major-general Mooers.

New-York, September 2, 1814.

DEAR SIR—I received, sometime since, a letter from you, containing a notice of an offer by you to general Izard, to order out militia, and a copy of his declension to call upon militia at that time.

Your conduct in that respect met my decided approbation—I was therefore surprised at the receipt of a letter from gen. Izard, informing me that you doubted your authority, or hesitated with respect to a compliance with his request. You will perceive by reference to the act of congress, passed 28th February, 1795, that the requisition of the president may be made on any officer of the militia, who is bound to obey it; and that it is not indispensable, nor will the public emergencies generally admit, that it should be made through the commander in chief of the state. I send this by express, and pray you, if you have not already done it, to comply with general Izard's requisition immediately. You may order one battalion from Saratoga, under the command of lieutenant-col. John Prior, and a major to be selected by yourself or him, and one regiment from Washington and Warren counties. If the detached regiments of Van Schaick and Green, organized by general orders of the 20th July 1st, are not to be collected so readily, order out some of the regiments of Washington and Warren counties en masse. All details not comprehended in this letter, you are authorised to direct.

I am, dear sir, your obedient servant,

DANIEL D. TOMPKINS.

Major-general Mooers.

Gen. Brown's splendid action.

Copy of a letter major general Brown to the secretary of war, dated Head-quarters, camp fort Erie, September 29th, 1814.

SIR—In my letter of the 18th inst. I briefly informed you of the fortunate issue of the sortie which took place the day preceding. But it is due to the gallant officers and men, to whose bravery we are indebted for our success on this occasion, that I should give you a more circumstantial and detailed account of this affair.

The enemy's camp I had ascertained to be situated in a field surrounded by woods nearly two miles distant from their batteries and entrenchments, the object of which was to keep the parts of the force which was not upon duty, out of the range of our fire from fort Erie and Black-rock. Their infantry was formed into three brigades estimated at 12 or 15 hundred men each. One of these brigades, with a detail from their artillery, was stationed at their works, (these being about 500 yards distant from old fort Erie and the right of our line.) We had already suffered much from the fire of two of their batteries, and were aware that a third was about to open upon us. Under these circumstances, I resolved to storm the batteries, destroy the cannon and roughly handle the brigade upon duty before those in reserve could be brought into action.

On the morning of the 17th, the infantry and rifle men, regulars and militia, were ordered to be paraded and put in readiness to march precisely at 12 o'clock. General Porter with the volunteers, colonel Gibson with the rifle men, and major Brooks with the 23d and 1st infantry, and a few dragoons acting as infantry, were ordered to move from the extreme left of our position upon the enemy's right, by a passage opened through the woods for the occasion. General Miller was directed to station his command in the ravine which lies between fort Erie and the enemy's batteries, by passing them by detachments through the skirts of the wood—and the 21st infantry under general Ripley was posted as a corps of reserve between the new bastions of fort Erie; all under cover, and out of the view of the enemy.

columns, under the command of general Porter, which were destined to turn the enemy's right, within a few rods of the British entrenchments. They were ordered to advance and commence the action. Passing down the ravine, I judged from the report of musquetry that the action had commenced on our left; I now hastened to general Miller and directed him to seize the moment and pierce the enemy's entrenchment between batteries No. 2 and 3. My orders were promptly and ably executed. Within 30 minutes after the first gun was fired, batteries No. 3 and 2, the enemy's line of entrenchments, and his two block houses, were in our possession. Soon after battery No. 1 was abandoned by the British. The guns in each were spiked by us, or otherwise destroyed, and the magazine of No. 3 was blown up.

A few minutes before the explosion, I had ordered up the reserve under general Ripley. As he passed me at the head of his column, I desired him as he would be the senior in advance, to ascertain as near as possible, the situation of the troops in general, and to have a care that not more was hazarded than the occasion required; that the object of the sortie effected, the troops would retire in good order, &c. General Ripley passed rapidly on—soon after, I became alarmed for general Miller, and sent an order for the 21st to hasten to his support towards battery No. 1. Colonel Upham received the order, and advanced to the aid of general Miller. General Ripley had inclined to the left, where major Brooks' command was engaged, with a view of making some necessary enquiries of that officer, and in the act of doing so was unfortunately wounded. By this time the object of the sortie was accomplished beyond my most sanguine expectations. General Miller had consequently ordered the troops on the right to fall back—observing this movement, I sent my staff along the line to call in the other corps. Within a few minutes they retired from the ravine, and from thence to camp.

Thus one thousand regulars and an equal portion of militia, in one hour of close action, blasted the hopes of the enemy, destroyed the fruits of fifty days labor, and diminished his effective force 1000 men at least. I am at a loss to express my satisfaction at the gallant conduct of the officers and men of this division, whose valor has been superior to every trial. General Porter in his official report herein inclosed, has very properly noticed those patriotic citizens who have done so much honor to themselves, by freely and voluntarily tendering their services at a dangerous and critical period.

As the scene of action was in the wood in advance of the position I had chosen for directing the movements of the whole, the several reports of the commandants of corps must guide me in noticing individuals.

General Miller mentions lieutenant colonel Aspinwall, lieutenant colonel Beadle, major Trimble, captain Hull, captain Ingersoll, lieutenant Crawford, lieutenant Lee, and particularly ensign O'Ting as entitled to distinction.

Lieutenant colonel McDonald, upon whom the command of the rifle corps devolved, upon the fall of the brave and generous Gibson, names adjutants Shortridge of the 1st, and Ballard of the 4th regiment, as deserving the highest applause for their promptness and gallantry in communicating orders. Of the other officers of the corps, he reports generally, that the bravery and good conduct of all was so conspicuous, as to render it impossible to discriminate.

Major Brooks, to whom much credit is due for the distinguished manner in which he executed the orders he received, speaks in high terms of lieutenants Goodell, Ingersoll, Livingston, and ensigns Brant and of the 23d—particularly of the latter. Also of captain Simms, lieutenants Bissel, Shore and Brint of the 1st infantry, and lieutenant Watts of the dragoons.

Lieutenant colonel Upham, who took command of the reserve after general Ripley was disabled, bestows great praise upon major Chambers of the 4th regiment of riflemen, attached to the 21st infantry, as also upon captain Bradford and lieutenant Helling of that regiment.

My staff, colonel Snelling, colonel Gardner, major Jones, and my aid-de-camp, major Austin and lieutenant Armstrong were, as usual, zealous, intelligent and active—they performed every duty required of them to my entire satisfaction.

Major H. H. assistant inspector general, led a battalion of militia, and conducted with skill and gallantry. Lieutenant Kirby, aid-de-camp to general Ripley, was extremely active and useful during the time he was in the action.

Lieutenants Fraser and Riddle were in general Porter's staff; their bravery was conspicuous, and no officers of their grade were more useful.

The corps of artillery commanded by major Hindman, which has been so eminently distinguished throughout this campaign had no opportunity of taking a part in the sortie. The 25th infantry under colonel Jessup, was stationed in fort Erie to hold the key of our position.

Colonel Brady, on whose firmness and good conduct every reliance could be placed, was on command at Buffalo with the remains of the 22d infantry. Lieutenant colonel M'Bee and lieutenant colonel Wood of the corps of engineers, having rendered to this army services the most important, I must seize the opportunity of again mentioning them particularly. On every trying occasion I have reaped much benefit from their sound and excellent advice. No two officers of their grade could have contributed more to the safety and honor of this army. Wood, brave, generous and enterprising, died as he had lived without a feeling but for the honor of his country and the glory of her arms. His name and example will live to guide the soldier in the path of duty so long as true heroism is held in estimation. M'Bee lives to enjoy the approbation of every virtuous and generous mind, and to receive the reward due to his services and high military talents.

It is proper here to notice that although but one-third of the enemy's force was on duty when his works were carried, the whole were brought into action while we were employed in destroying his cannon. We secured prisoners from seven of his regiments, and know that the 6th and 82d suffered severely in killed and wounded, yet these regiments were not upon duty.

Lieutenant general Drummond broke up his camp during the night of the 21st and retired to his entrenchments behind the Chippewa. A party of our men came up with the rear of his army at Frenchman's creek; the enemy destroyed part of their stores by setting fire to the buildings from which they were employed in conveying them. We found in and about their camp a considerable quantity of cannon ball, and upwards of one hundred stand of arms.

I send you enclosed herein a return of our loss. The return of prisoners inclosed does not include the stragglers that came in after the action.

I have the honor to be, sir, very respectfully, your most obedient humble servant,

JACOB BROWN.

Honorable secretary of War.

Copy of a letter from brigadier general Porter, to major general Brown.

Fort Erie, September 22, 1814.

SIR—In executing the duty you have imposed upon me, of reporting the conduct of the officers and men composing the left column, which you was pleased to place under my command, in the sortie of the 17th inst. the pleasure I derive in representing to you the admirable conduct of the whole, is deeply chased by sorrow for the loss of many brave and distinguished men.

Being obliged from the nature of the ground, to act on foot, it was impossible that my personal observation should reach to every officer. Some part of this report must therefore rest upon the information of others.

It is the business of this communication to speak of the conduct of individuals; yet you will permit me to premise, although well known to you self already, that the object of the left column was to penetrate, by a circuitous route, between the enemy's batteries where one-third of his force was always kept on duty, and his main camp, and that it was subdivided into three divisions—the advance of 200 riflemen, and a few Indians, commanded by colonel Gibson, and two columns moving parallel to, and 30 yards distant from each other. The right column was commanded by lieutenant colonel Wood, headed by 400 infantry, under major Brook of the 23d, and I followed by 500 volunteers and militia, being parts of lieutenant colonel Dobbin's, McBarney's and Fleming's regiments, and was intended to attack the batteries. The left column of 500 militia was commanded by brigadier general Davis, and comprised the commands of lieutenant colonels Hopkins, Churchill and Crosby; and was intended to hold in check any reinforcements from the enemy's camp; or both columns (circumstances requiring it, which frequently happened) to co-operate in the same object.

After carrying by storm in the handsomest style, a strong block-house in rear of the third battery, making its garrison prisoners, destroying the three 24 pounders and their carriages in the third battery, and blowing up the enemy's magazine, and after co-operating with general Miller in taking the second battery, the gallant leaders of the three divisions all fell nearly at the same time; colonel Gibson, at the second battery, and general Davis and lieutenant colonel Wood, in an assault upon the first.

Brig. general Davis, although a militia officer of little experience, conducted on this occasion with all the coolness and bravery of a veteran, and fell while advancing upon the enemy's entrenchments. His loss as a citizen, as well as a soldier, will be severely felt in the patriotic county of Genesee. Col. Gibson fully sustained the high military reputation, which he had before so justly acquired. You know how exalted an opinion I have always entertained of lieutenant colonel Wood of the engineers. His conduct, on this day, was, what it uniformly has been, on every similar occasion, an exhibition of military skill, acute judgment, and heroic valor. Of the other regular officers, lieutenant colonel Macdonald and major Brook, senior in command, will report to you in relation to their respective divisions. Permit me, however, to say of these two officers, that, much as was left to them by the fall of their distinguished leaders, they were able to sustain their parts in the most admirable manner, and they richly deserve the notice of the government.

Of the militia, I regret that the limits of a report will not permit me even to name all those, who on this occasion established claims to the gratitude of their fellow citizens; much less to particularize individual merits. Lieut. cols. Hopkins, McBarney, Churchill and Crosby, and majors Lee, March, Wilson, Lawrence, Burr, Dunham, Kellogg, and Gamson, are entitled to the highest praise for their gallant conduct, their steady and persevering exertions. Lieut. col. Dobbin being prevented by severe indisposition from taking the field, major Hall, assistant inspector general, volunteered his services to join major Lee in the command of the volunteer regiment; and maj. Lee and every other officer speaks in the highest terms of the gallant and good conduct of this young officer.

Capt. Fleming, who commanded the Indians, was, as he always is, in the front of the battle. There is not a more intrepid soldier in the army. I should be ungrateful, were I to omit the names of captains Knapp and Hull of the volunteers, and capt. Parker and Lieut. Chaffield of the militia, by whose intrepidity I was, during the action, extricated from the most unpleasant situation. Capts. Richardson, Buel, and Kennedy, lieuts. Parkhurst and Brown, and adjuts. Dobbin, Bates, and Robinson, particularly distinguished themselves. The patriotic conduct of capt. Elliott with 20 young gentlemen, who volunteered from Batavia, and of maj. Hubbard with 14 men exempted by age from military duty, should not be omitted. They were conspicuous during the action.

You will excuse me, if I shall seem partial, in speaking of my own family, consisting of my brigade major Frazer, my volunteer aid de camp Riddle, (both 1st. lieutenants in the 15th infantry,) capt. Bigger of the Canadian volunteers, messrs. Williams and Delapierre, volunteer aids for the day, all of whom except Mr. Williams were wounded.

Lieuts. Frazier and Riddle were engaged for most of the preceding day with fugitive parties, cutting roads for the advance of the column through the swamp, and falling timber to the rear, and within 150 yards of the enemy's right: which service they executed with so much address as to avoid discovery; and on the succeeding day they conducted the two columns to the attack. Frazer was severely wounded by a musket ball whilst spiking a gun on the second battery. Riddle, after the first battery was carried, descended into the enemy's magazine, and after securing (with the assistance of quarter master Greene of the Volunteers, whose good conduct deserves much praise) a quantity of fixed ammunition, blew up the magazine and suffered severely by the explosion. I must solicit, through you sir, the attention of the general government to these meritorious young men. Capt. Bigger is an excellent officer, and rendered me much assistance, but was dangerously wounded. The other young gentlemen are citizens, and deserve much credit for their activity, and for having voluntarily encountered danger. My aid de camp, major Dox, was confined at Buffalo by sickness.

On the whole, sir, I can say of the regular troops attached to the left column, and of the veteran volunteers of lieut. col. Dobbin's regiment, that every man did his duty, and their conduct on this occasion reflects a new lustre on their former brilliant achievements. To the militia, the compliment is justly due, and I could pay them no greater one, than to say, that they were not surpassed by the heroes of Chippawa and Niagara in steadiness and bravery.

The studied intricacy of the enemy's defences, consisting not only of the breast works connecting their batteries, but of successive lines of entrenchments for a hundred yards in the rear, covering the batteries and enfilading each other, and the whole obstructed by abatis, brush and felled timber, was calculated to produce confusion among the assailants, and led to several contests at the point of the bayonet. But by our double columns any temporary irregularity in the one was always corrected by the other. Our success would probably have been more complete, but for the rain which unfortunately set in soon after we commenced our march, which rendered the fire of many of our muskets useless, and by obscuring the sun, led to several unlucky mistakes. As an instance of this, a body of 50 prisoners who had surrendered, were ordered to the fort in charge of a subaltern and 14 volunteers; the officer mistaking the direction, conducted them towards the British camp in the route by which we had advanced, and they were retaken with the whole of the guard, excepting the officer and one man who fought their way back. Several of our stragglers were made prisoners by the same mistake. But, sir, notwithstanding these accidents, we have reason to rejoice, at our signal success in inflicting a vastly disproportionate injury on the enemy, and in wholly defeating all his plans of operation against this army.

I have the honor to be, with very great respect, your obedient servant,

P. B. FORSTER, Brig. Gen.

THE BRITISH "OFFICIAL."

[The following is a pure "official." Though Brown accomplished every thing he designed gaining every battery he aimed at, general Drummond makes out a kind of negative victory. He is careful not to mention his loss; yet permits it unofficially to be said that he had but 190 taken prisoners, though about 320 captured in the splendid affair, are now at Greenbush.]

DISTRICT GENERAL ORDER.

Head-quarters, Camp before fort Erie, 18th September.

Lieutenant general Drummond, having received the reports of the general officer in the immediate direction of the troops engaged yesterday, begs to offer his best acknowledgements for their very gallant conduct in repulsing the attack made by the enemy on our batteries, with his whole force, represented to consist of not less than five thousand men, including militia. The brilliant style in which the battery No. 2, was recovered, and the enemy driven beyond our entrenchments by seven companies of the 82d regiment under major Proctor, and three companies of the 6th regiment detached under major Taylor, excited lieutenant general Drummond's admiration, and entitled those troops to his particular thanks. On the right the enemy's advance was checked by the 1st battalion of the royal Scots, supported by the 89th under the direction of lieutenant colonel Gordon of the royals; and in the centre he was driven back by the Glengary light infantry, under lieutenant colonel Battersby, and directed by lieutenant colonel Pearson, inspecting field officer. To these troops the lieutenant general's best thanks are due, as also to the remainder of the reserve under lieutenant colonel Campbell, consisting of the remaining companies of the 6th regiment, the flank companies of the 41st, and the incorporated militia, which supported the troops engaged.

The lieutenant general deeply laments the unfortunate circumstances of weather which enabled the enemy to approach unperceived close to the right of the position, and to capture a considerable number of the regiment De Watteville stationed at the point. The severe loss in killed and wounded which the 8th or King's and De Watteville's regiment have suffered, affords incontestible proof that No. 2 battery was not gained without a vigorous resistance; it is equally obvious that the block-house on the right was well defended by the party of the king's regiment stationed in it.

Lieutenant general Drummond feels greatly indebted to major general De Watteville for his judicious arrangement; and he also desires to offer his thanks to the respective command-officers of brigades and corps, and the officers and men of the royal artillery and engineers, for their exertions. To major general Stovin, who joined the army a short time before the attack, the lieutenant general is indebted for his assistance, and also to the officers of the general of his personal staff.

Lieutenant general Drummond greatly regrets the wounds which have deprived the army for the present of the services of colonel Fisher, lieutenant colonels Pearson and Gordon.

Lieutenant colonels Fisher, Pearson, and Gordon, have permission to proceed to the rear for the recovery of their wounds.

GENERAL ORDER.

Head-quarters, Montreal, 29th September 1814.

His excellency the commander of the forces having received the official report of lieutenant general Drummond, of an affair which took place at fort Erie, on the 17th instant in which very superior numbers of the enemy were repulsed with loss, entirely coincides with the lieutenant general in the just tribute of praise he bestows on the intrepid valor and determined discipline evinced by the troops under his command, as detailed in the district general order of the 18th inst. which his excellency is pleased to order to be published for the general information of the troops under his command. Copy of a letter from major-general Brown, to the secretary of war, dated Head-Quarters, camp Fort Erie, Oct. 1st. 1814.

SIR—Looking over my official account of the battle of the 17th ult. I find that the names of the regiments which composed general Miller's command, have not been given. As I believe it even more important to distinguish corps than individuals, I am anxious to correct the mistake. General Miller on that day commanded the remains of the 9th and 11th infantry, and a detachment of the 19th. Of three field officers who were attached to them, two were severely wounded; lieutenant-colonel Aspinwall, of the 9th, gallantly leading his men to the attack upon the enemy's entrenchments; and major Trimble of the 19th, who was shot within their works, conducting with great skill and bravery. A detachment of the 17th regiment was attached to the 21st.

Very respectfully, your most obed^t serv^t.

JACOB BROWN.

Hon. secretary of war.

Treasury Report.

Copy of a letter from the chairman of the committee of Ways and Means to the secretary of the treasury, dated

Washington, October 14, 1814.

SIR—The committee of Ways and Means have had under their consideration the support of public credit by a system of taxation more extended than the one heretofore adopted. They have determined to suspend proceeding on their report at present before the house of representatives, with a view to afford you an opportunity of suggesting any other, or such additional provisions as may be necessary to revive and maintain unimpaired the public credit.

I have the honor to be, your most obedient,

JOHN W. EPPES.

Honorable Mr. Dallas, secretary of the treasury.

THE ANSWER.

Treasury department October 17, 1814.

SIR—I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your letter, dated the 14th instant, and aware of the necessity for an early interposition of congress on the subject to which it relates, I proceed, at the moment of entering upon the duties of office, to offer to the consideration of the committee of Ways and Means, an answer on the several points of their enquiry.

Contemplating the present state of the finances, it is obvious, that a deficiency in the revenue, and a depreciation in the public credit, exist from causes which cannot in any degree be ascribed, either to the want of resources, or to the want of integrity in the nation. Different minds will conceive different opinions in relation to some of those causes; but it will be agreed on all sides, that the most operative have been the inadequacy of our system of taxation to form a foundation for public credit; and the absence even from that system of the means which are best adapted to anticipate, collect and distribute the public revenue.

The wealth of the nation, in the value and products of its soil, in all the acquisitions of personal property, and in all the varieties of industry, remains almost untouched by the hand of government; for, the national faith, and not the national wealth, has hitherto been the principal instrument of finance. It was reasonable, however, to expect, that a period must occur in the course of a protracted war, when confidence in the accumulating public engagements could only be secured by an active demonstration, both of the capacity and the disposition to perform them. In the present state of the treasury, therefore, it is a just consolation to reflect, that a prompt and resolute application of the resources of the country will effectually relieve from every pecuniary embarrassment and vindicate the fiscal honor of the government.

But it would be vain to attempt to disguise, and it would be pernicious to palliate the difficulties which are now to be overcome. The exigencies of the government require a supply of treasure for the prosecution of the war, beyond any amount which it would be politic, even if it were practicable, to raise by an immediate and constant imposition of taxes. There must, therefore, be a resort to credit, for a considerable portion of the supply. But the public credit is at this juncture so depressed, that no hope of adequate succor, on moderate terms, can safely rest upon it. Hence it becomes the object first and last in every practical scheme of finance, to re-animate the confidence of the citizens; and to impress on the mind of every man, who, for the public account, renders services, furnishes supplies, or advances money, a conviction of the punctuality as well as of the security of the government. It is not to be regarded, indeed, as the case of preserving a credit which has never been impaired, but rather as the case of rescuing from reproach a credit over which doubt and apprehension (not the less injurious, perhaps, because they are visionary) have cast an inauspicious shade. In the former case, the ordinary means of raising and appropriating the revenue, will always be sufficient; but in the latter case, no exertion can be competent to attain the object, which does not quiet, in every mind, every fear of future loss or disappointment in consequence of trusting to the pledges of the public faith.

The condition of the circulating medium of the country presents another copious source of mischief and embarrassment. The recent exportations of specie have considerably diminished the fund of gold and silver coin; and another considerable portion of that fund has been drawn, by the timid and the wary, from the use of the community, into the private coffers of individuals. On the other hand, the multiplication of banks in the several states has so increased the quantity of paper currency, that it would be difficult to calculate its amount; and still more difficult to ascertain its value, with reference to the capital on which it has been issued. But the benefit of even this paper currency is in a great measure lost, as the suspension of payments in specie at most of the banks has suddenly broken the chain of accommodation, that previously extended the credit and the circulation of the notes which were emitted in one state into every state in the union. It may in general be affirmed, therefore, that there exists at this time no adequate circulating medium common to the citizens of the United States. The monied transactions of private life are at a stand; and the fiscal operations of government labor with extreme inconvenience. It is impossible that such a state of things should be long endured; but let it be fairly added, that with legislative aid it is not necessary that the endurance should be long. Under favorable circumstances, and to a limited extent, an emission of treasury notes would, probably, afford relief; but treasury notes are an expensive and precarious substitute, either for coin or for bank notes, charged as they are with a growing interest, productive of no countervailing profit, or employment, and exposed to every breath of popular prejudice or alarm. The establishment of a national institution, operating upon credit combined with capital, and regulated by prudence and good faith, is, after all, the only efficient remedy for the disordered condition of our circulating medium. While accomplishing that object, too, there will be found, under the auspices of such an institution, a safe depository for the public treasure, and a constant auxiliary to the public credit. But whether the issues of a paper currency proceed from the national treasury or a national bank, the acceptance of the paper in a course of payments and receipts must be forever optional with the citizens. The extremity of that day cannot be anticipated, when a honest and enlightened statesman will again venture upon the desperate expedient of a tender law.

From this painful, but necessary development of existing evils, we pass with hope and confidence, to a more specific consideration of the measures from which relief may be certainly and speedily derived. Remembering always, that the objects of the government are to place the public credit upon a solid and durable foundation; to provide a revenue commensurate with the demands of a war expenditure, and to remove from the treasury an immediate pressure, the following propositions are submitted to the committee, with every sentiment of deference and respect.

PROPOSITIONS.

I. It is proposed, that during the war, and until the claims contemplated by the proposition are completely satisfied, or extinct, there shall be annually raised by taxes, duties, imports and excises, a fund for these purposes.

1. For the support of government,	dolls. 1,500,000
2. For the principal and interest of the public debt, existing before the declaration of war, and payable according to the contract,	3,500,000
3. For the interest of the public debt contracted, and to be contracted, by loans, or otherwise, from the commencement to the termination of the war calculated upon an annual principal of 72 millions of dollars,	4,320,000
4. For the payment of treasury notes, with the accruing interest,	7,400,000
5. For the payment of debentures to be issued (as is hereafter proposed) for liquidated balances, due to individuals, on account of services or supplies, authorized by law, but either not embraced by a specific appropriation, or exceeding the sum appropriated,	280,000
6. For a current addition to the sums raised by loan, or issues of treasury notes, towards defraying the general expenses of the war,	2,700,000
7. For the gradual establishment of a sinking fund, to extinguish the debt incurred during the war,	500,000
8. For a contingent fund, to meet sudden and occasional demands upon the treasury,	1,500,000

dolls. 21,000,000

II. It is proposed, that during the war, and until the claims contemplated by the preceding proposition are completely satisfied, or rather adequate funds shall be provided and substituted by law, there shall be annually raised, by the means here specified, the following sums:

1. By the customs (which cannot be safely estimated, during the war, at a higher product)	4,000,000
2. By the existing internal duties,	2,700,000
3. By the existing direct tax,	2,500,000
4. By the sales of public lands (which cannot be safely estimated, during the war, at a higher product)	800,000
5. By an addition to the existing direct tax of 100 per cent,	2,850,000
6. By an addition of 100 per cent on the present auction duties,	150,000
7. By an addition of 100 per cent on the existing duties upon carriages,	200,000
8. By an addition of 50 per cent on the existing duties on licenses to retail wines, spirituous liquors and foreign merchandise,	300,000
9. By an addition of 100 per cent on the existing rate of postage	500,000
10. By the proceeds of the new duties specified in the annexed schedule, marked A. making in the aggregate,	7,000,000

dols. 21,000,000

III. It is proposed, that a national bank shall be incorporated for a term of twenty years, to be established at Philadelphia, with a power to erect offices of discount and deposit elsewhere, upon the following principles:

- That the capital of the bank shall be fifty millions of dollars, to be divided into 100,000 shares of five hundred dollars each. Three fifths of the capital, being 60,000 shares, amounting to 30,000,000 of dollars, to be subscribed by corporations, companies or individuals; and two fifths of the capital, being 40,000 shares, amounting to 20,000,000 of dollars, to be subscribed by the U. States.
- That the subscriptions of corporations, companies and individuals, shall be paid for in the following manner: One fifth part, or 6,000,000, in gold or silver coin. Four-fifth parts, or 24,000,000, in gold or silver coin, or in six per cent stock issued since the declaration of war, and treasury notes, in the proportion of one-fifth in treasury notes, and three fifths in six per cent stock.

3. That the subscriptions of corporations, companies and individuals, shall be paid at the following periods:
20 dollars on each share, to be paid at the time of subscribing, in gold or silver coin,	1,200,000
40 dollars on each share, to be paid in gold or silver coin, one month after the subscription,	2,400,000
40 dollars on each share, in two months after the subscription, in gold or silver coin,	2,400,000
100 dollars, in specie,	6,000,000
100 dollars on each share, in gold or silver coin, or in six per cent stock, or in treasury notes, according to the preceding appointments to be paid at the time of subscribing	6,000,000
130 dollars on each share, to be paid in like manner, in two months after subscribing	9,000,000
150 dollars on each share, to be paid in like manner, in three months after subscribing	9,000,000

500 30,000,000

- That the subscription of the United States shall be paid in six per cent stock, at the same periods and in the same proportions as the payments of private subscriptions, in stock and treasury notes.
- That the United States may substitute six per cent stock, for the amount of the treasury notes subscribed by corporations, companies and individuals, as the notes respectively become due and payable.
- That the bank shall loan to the United States 30,000,000, at an interest of six per cent, at such periods, and in such sums, as shall be found mutually convenient.
- That no part of the public stock, constituting a portion of the capital of the bank, shall be sold during the war; nor at any subsequent time, for less than par; nor at any time to an amount exceeding one moiety, without the consent of congress.
- That provision shall be made for protecting the bank notes from forgery; for limiting the issue of bank notes; and for receiving them in all payments to the United States.
- That the capital of the bank, its notes, deposits, dividends, or profits (its real estate only excepted,) shall not be subject to taxation by the U. States or by any individual state.
- That no other bank shall be established by congress, during the term for which the national bank is incorporated.
- That the national bank shall be governed by fifteen directors, being resident citizens of the United States and stockholders. The president of the United States shall annually name five directors, and designate one of the five to be the president of the bank. The other directors shall be annually chosen by the qualified stockholders, in person or by proxy, if resident within the United States, voting upon a scale graduated according to the number of shares which they respectively hold. The cashier and other officers of the bank to be appointed as is usual in similar institutions.
- That the directors of the national bank shall appoint seven persons, one of whom to preside, as the managers of each office of discount and deposit, and one person to be the cashier.
- That the general powers, privileges, and regulations of the bank, shall be the same as are usual in similar institutions; but with this special provision, that the general accounts shall be subject to the inspection of the secretary of the treasury.

IV. It is proposed, that, after having thus provided for the punctual payment of the interest upon every denomination of public debt; for raising annually a portion of the annual expense, by taxes; for establishing a sinking fund, in relation to the new debt, as well as in relation to the old debt; and for securing to the public the efficient agency of a national bank; the only remaining object of supply shall be accomplished by annual loans, and issues of treasury notes; if, unexpectedly, such issues should continue to be necessary or expedient.

1. The amount of annual expenditure during the war, exceeding the sums provided for, does not admit of a prospective estimate beyond the year 1815; but for that year it may be estimated with sufficient accuracy for the general purposes of the present communication, at

- Then for the year 1815, an additional provision must be made, authorising a loan and the issue of treasury notes, to an equal amount

dolls. 28,000,000

V. It is proposed that accounts for authorised expenses being duly stated and settled, a certificate or debenture shall issue to the accountant specifying the balance; and that in all cases where there has been no specific appropriation, or the claim exceeds the amount of the sum appropriated, the balance shall bear an interest of 3 per cent, until provision is made by law for paying the amount.

VI. And finally, it is proposed to relieve the treasure from an immediate pressure, upon the principles of the following statement:

1. The amount of demands upon the treasury (exclusively of balances of appropriations for former years unsatisfied) was stated in the report of the late secretary of the treasury, of the 22d of September, 1814, to be on the 30th of June, 27,576,391 19
2. The accounts of the third quarter of 1814 are not yet made up, and the precise sums paid during that quarter cannot now be ascertained; but they amount to nearly, 8,400,000

Leaving to be paid in the fourth quarter of 1814, dis. 19,176,391 19

3. This balance, payable during the 4th quarter of 1814, consists of the following items:

Civil, diplomatic and miscellaneous expenses, about	353,292 99
Military, about	8,792,618
Naval, about	2,38,010 97
Public debt, about	7,6 8,419 73
	dolls. 19,176,391 19

4. The existing provisions by law for the payment of this balance of dolls. 19,176,391 19, may be stated as follows:

The act of the 21st of March, 1814, authorised a loan for	25,000,000
The act of the 4th of March, 1814, authorised an issue of treasury notes for	5,000,000
	dolls. 30,000,000

Under these authorities there have been borrowed on loan, about	13,895,000
There has been sent to Europe in 6 per cent stock	6,000,000
There has been issued in treasury notes	3,504,000
	20,399,000
	dolls. 9,601,000

There remains therefore an unexercised authority to borrow	8,105,000
To issue treasury notes	1,496,000
	9,601,000

The demands of the fourth quarter being then	19,176,391 19
There may be applied to meet them, the revenue accruing during the quarter from all sources, about	2,900,000
Also payments to be made on account of loans already contracted for, according to the authority above stated, about	2,500,000
	5,400,000

Leaving a balance to be provided for dolls. 13,776,391 19

By the authority remaining to borrow	8,105,000
By the authority remaining to issue treasury notes	1,496,000
By an additional authority to be granted by law to borrow, and to issue treasury notes	4,175,391 19
	dolls. 13,776,391 19

These estimates, however, it will be observed, are made with a view, simply, to the appropriations by law for the expenses of the year 1814; and do not embrace a provision to satisfy balances of appropriations made for the expenses of preceding years which have not been called for at the treasury. But it will, probably, be deemed expedient to make such provision by extending the new authority to borrow from the above balance, to 6,000,000. If the 6 per cent. stock which has been sent to Europe should be there disposed of, it will form an item in the estimates of the ensuing year.

As a portion of the amount to be provided during the present quarter, consists of treasury notes which will soon be due, it will be advisable to make them receivable in subscriptions to the loan.

It is proper to accompany these propositions with a few explanatory remarks.

1. The first proposition contemplates a permanent system; but the estimate of the particular items of claims and demands upon the public, must be regarded as immediately applying to the year 1815. In every subsequent year there will necessarily be some variation: as, for instance, the item of interest on the old debt will annually sink, while the item of interest on the new debt will annually rise during the continuance of the war.

The items for annually raising a portion of the public expenses by taxes, and for applying to the new debt a sinking fund (gradually increasing, until it becomes commensurate to its object) are essential features in the plan suggested, with a view to the revival and maintenance of public credit. The extinguishment of the old debt is already in rapid operation by the wise precaution of a similar institution.

2. The second proposition will, doubtless, generate many and very various objections. The endeavor has been however, to spread the general amount of the taxes over a wide surface with a hand as light and equal as is consistent with convenience in the process, and certainly in the result.

All the opportunities of observation, and all the means of information that have been possessed leave no doubt upon the disposition of the people to contribute generously for relieving the necessities of their country; and it has been thought unworthy of that patriotic disposition to dwell upon scanty means of supply, or short lived expedients. Whenever the war shall be happily terminated in an honorable peace, and the treasury shall be again replenished by the tributary streams of commerce, it will be at once a duty and a pleasure to recommend an alleviation, if not an entire exoneration of the burthens which necessarily fall at present upon the agriculture and manufactures of the nation.

3. In making a proposition for the establishment of a national bank, I cannot be insensible to the high authority of the names which have appeared in opposition to that measure upon constitutional grounds.

It would be presumptuous to conjecture that the sentiments which actuated the opposition have passed away; and yet it would be denying to experience a great practical advantage, were we to suppose that a difference of times and circumstances would not produce a corresponding difference in the opinions of the wisest, as well as of the purest men. But in the present case, a change of private opinion is not material to the success of the proposition for establishing a national bank. In the administration of human affairs, there must be a period when discussion shall cease and decision shall become absolute. A diversity of opinion may honorably survive the contest; but, upon the genuine principles of a representative government, the opinion of the majority can alone be carried into action. The judge who dissents from the majority of the bench, changes not his opinion, but performs his duty, when he enforces the judgment of the court, although it is contrary to his own convictions. An oath to support the constitution and the laws, is not, therefore, an oath to support them under all circumstances, according to the opinion of the individual who takes it, but it is, emphatically, an oath to support them according to the interpretation of the legitimate authorities. For the erroneous decisions of a court of law, there is the redress of a censorial, as well as of an appellate jurisdiction: over an act, founded upon an exposition of the constitution, made by the legislative department of the government, but alleged to be incorrect, we have seen the judicial department exercise a remedial power. And even if all the departments, legislative, executive, and judicial, should concur in the exercise of a power, which is either thought to transcend the constitutional trust, or to operate injuriously upon the community, the case is still within the reach of a competent control, through the medium of an amendment to the constitution, upon the proposition, not only of congress, but of the several states. When therefore, we have marked the existence of a national bank for a period of twenty years, with all the sanctions of the legislative, executive, and judicial authorities; when we have seen the dissolution of one institution, and heard a loud and continued call for the establishment of another; when under these circumstances, neither congress, nor the several states, have resorted to the power of amendment; can it be deemed a violation of the right of private opinion, to consider the constitutionality of a national bank, as a question forever settled and at rest?

But, after all, I should not merit the confidence, which it will be my ambition to acquire, if I were to suppress the declaration of an opinion, that, in these times, the establishment of a national bank will not only be useful in promoting the general welfare, but that it is necessary and proper for carrying into execution some of the most important powers constitutionally vested in the government.

Upon the principles and regulations of the national bank, it may be sufficient to remark, that they will be best embodied in the form of a bill, which shall be immediately prepared. A compound capital is suggested, with a design equally to accommodate the subscribers; and to aid the general measures, for the revival of public credit; but the proportions of specie and stock may be varied, if the scarcity of coin should render it expedient, yet not in so great a degree, as to prevent an early commencement of the money operations of the institution.

4. The estimates of receipts, from the established sources of revenue, and from the proposed new duties; and the estimates of expenditures, on all the objects contemplated in the present communication; have been made upon a call so sudden, and upon materials so scattered, that it is not intended to claim a perfect reliance on their accuracy. They are, however, believed to be sufficiently accurate to illustrate and support the general plan, for the revival of the public credit, the establishment of a permanent system of revenue, and the removal of the immediate pressure on the treasury.

Upon the whole, sir, I have freely and openly assumed the responsibility of the station in which I have the honor to be placed. But conscious of the imperfections of the judgment that dictates the answer to the important enquiries of the committee of ways and means, I derive the highest satisfaction from reflecting, that the honor and safety of the nation, for war, or for peace, depend on the wisdom, patriotism, and fortitude of congress, during times which imperiously demand a display of those qualities in the exercise of the legislative authority.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, sir, your most obedient servant,

A. J. DALLAS.

J. W. Eppes, Esq. chairman of the committee of ways and means.

Schedule of new taxes referred to in the letters of the treasury to the chairman of the committee of Ways and Means, in which the taxes proposed in the report of the committee to the House of Representatives on the 10th inst. principally adopted.

1. On spirits distilled from domestic or foreign materials 25 cents per gallon, computed on 24,000,000 gallons; provided the present tax on the capacity of the still should be continued. If it is thought best to lay the tax entirely on liquor, then the tax on the capacity of the stills to be taken off, and 30 cents per gallon to be laid on the liquor. For the present estimate, it is taken at 25 cents per gallon	$6,000,000

2. On porter, ale and strong beer, 2 cents per gallon, computed on 5,000,000 gallons	120,000
3. On manufactured tobacco and snuff, averaged at 5 cents per pound, and computed on ten million pounds	500,000
4. On leather of various kinds, averaged at 3 cents per pound, and computed on twenty million pounds	600,000
5. On pig-iron at $1 50 per ton computed on 300,000 tons	450,000
6. On paper, at various rates, averaging 7 per cent on the value of the article, computed on the annual manufacture of the value of 2,600,000 dollars	175,000
7. On playing cards, at 25 cents per pack computed on 400,000 packs	100,000
8. On counsellors and attorneys at law, process in suits at law and equity, proceedings in admiralty, arbitrations and references, and other legal proceedings in the courts of the U. States	300,000
9. On conveyances, mortgages and other contracts relating to real estate	250,000
	$8,495,000

The sum to be raised by new taxes, according to the estimates of the secretary's letter, is 7,000,000

Leaving a surplus for the expenses of collection and errors in the estimate of 1,495,000

Congress of the United States.

IN SENATE.

October 21. Mr. German submitted for consideration a motion, that it would be expedient to divide the whole militia of the United States into classes from No. 1 to 10, to be liable to be called into service at particular periods, &c.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

Thursday, October 13. The committee appointed for the purpose, reported a bill for a temporary removal of the seat of government. Which being read, was after debate ordered to lie on the table.

The house then took up the resolutions tributary to the merits of general Brown and others—ordered to be engrossed for a third reading—(they passed the next day unanimously.)

The resolutions from the senate expressive of the sense of congress of the decisive victory obtained by com. Macdonough, on lake Champlain, were taken up, and also passed unanimously.

[These two sets of resolutions shall be preserved in the Register.]

Friday, October 14. Some minor business being done, the house received a message from the president—the doors were closed and opened again at half past two o'clock, when it appeared that the message embraced the instructions to our ministers in Europe, which, with the exception of a few passages, were ordered to be printed. (See last No.)

The bill for a temporary removal of the seat of government was laid over for the next day.

Saturday, October 15. After some business—Mr. Grosvenor, of N. Y. said it would be recollected the president, in his message to congress at the commencement of the last session, informed the House that the commanding general of the Canadas had selected a number of American prisoners of war, and sent them over to England in close confinement; and that on that act a system of retaliation had been commenced. It would be recollected, also, that towards the close of the session, in consequence of a resolution passed by the senate, a statement was given of the situation of the prisoners sent to England, and of those who as hostages had been confined on either side. Many publications since made in the public prints tended to shew that the difficulty on this head had been settled—how, was not known. He deemed it all important that the public should know on what principles it had been settled. With that view he offered the following resolution:

Resolved, That the president of the United States, be requested to lay before the house, if in his opinion it will not be inconsistent with the public welfare, all communications to or from the government of England or her agents not heretofore communicated, relative to the commencement and progress of the acts of retaliation founded on or produced by the conduct of the British commander in Canada in selecting and sending to Great Britain for trial a number of individuals taken prisoners of war from the American army; also any information he may have in his possession relative to the present condition of such individuals.

The resolution was agreed to without debate or opposition, and a committee ordered to be appointed to present the same to the president of the United States.

A report was received from the commissioner of the revenue, in compliance with a resolution passed the House, on the 10th inst. embracing the amount of assessments and collections of direct tax, and of internal duties collected.

The bill to remove the seat of government was then taken up, the question being put, "shall the bill be engrossed and read the third time?" and decided as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Alexander, Alston, Baylies, of Mass. Bigelow, Boyd, Bradbury, Bradley, Brigham, Brown, Butler, Caldwell, Champion, Cilley, Clark, Condict, Conard, Cooper, Cox, of N. J. Crighton, Crouch, Davenport, Davis of Penn. Denoyelles, Desha, Duval, Ely, Fisk, of N. Y. Geddes, of N. Y. Gourdin, Grosvenor, Hasbrouck, Hurlock, Ingersoll, Irwin, Jackson, of R. I. Kent of N. Y. King of Mass. Law, Lovett, Miller, Moffitt, Moseley, Markell, Oakley, Ormsby, Pickering, Piper, Pitkin, Post, Potter, John Reed, Rea of Penn. Howell, Kilbourn, Reed, Ridgely, Sheffield, Smith of Penn. Tallmadge, Williams, Wilson of Mass. and Wood, who have not attended at the present session.]

So the House determined that the bill should not be engrossed for a third reading; in other words, that it should be rejected. Adjourned.

Monday, October 17. Mr. Jackson, of Va. made a motion to print two thousand additional copies of the instructions to our ministers to treat of peace in Europe.

Mr. Grosvenor, of N. Y. moved to amend the said motion so as to print these instructions entire, as received from the president, (that is, including the few passages not deemed proper for publication.)

The Speaker feeling a difficulty in receiving this motion under present circumstances—

Mr. Grosvenor required the galleries to be cleared, and strangers were excluded accordingly.

The doors remained closed for two hours; when it appeared that the motion of Mr. Grosvenor was rejected, and that of Mr. Jackson was agreed to.

The house resolved itself into a committee of the whole on the bill from the Senate authorising the purchase of Mr. Jefferson's library; but rose without making a decision.

Tuesday, October 18. Mr. Lewis, of Va. presented the memorial of a number of inhabitants of Alexandria, stating their indignant surprize at the slanders in circulation respecting that city, and praying a full and fair examination by congress of their conduct during the last visit of the enemy to that town. The memorial was read and referred.

After much talking and debate, which at one time was so animated as to be checked by the speaker, the resolution to purchase Mr. Jefferson's library, (with an amendment requiring that the agreement to purchase should be ratified by congress before it should be binding) was agreed to, and ordered to a third reading.

A letter was this day received from Mr. Dallas (the new secretary of the treasury) that excited great attention. The following brief outline of its contents is copied from the National Intelligencer—the entire letter is inserted in page 104, et seq.

"The present wants of the nation, the inadequacy of its present means of defraying them, and the depreciation of the public credit, are frankly exposed; the necessity for a prompt application of a remedy is stated, the extensive resources of the nation developed, and the remedy which he approves is presented in strong lines. The two principal features are, 1. A considerable increase of the present direct and internal taxes, and the imposition of additional internal taxes calculated to produce seven or eight millions a year, in order with the proceeds of the present revenue to establish a solid basis which will support the public faith in unbroken strength. 2. A bold recommendation of the establishment (at Philadelphia) of a national bank, of a capital of fifty millions of dollars, two thirds of the capital to be subscribed by individuals, the remainder by the U. States—payments on the stock to be made partly in specie, partly in stock of the United States at 6 per cent, &c.—the bank to be obliged by law to loan to the United States, when required, at an interest of six per cent. any sum not exceeding thirty millions of dollars. Such are the most prominent features of this important report."

Wednesday, October 19. The resolution respecting the purchase of Mr. Jefferson's library was passed. Another, presenting the thanks of congress to capt. Warrington, &c. of the Peacock, for the capture of the Epervier, was passed unanimously. Progress was made in other business which shall be noticed as it comes to maturity.

Thursday, October 20. A committee was raised for the purpose of enquiring into the expediency of repairing or rebuilding, the capital, president's house, &c. burnt by the Gothic invaders.

In committee of the whole a bill was agreed to for the relief of the officers and seamen of Barney's flotilla—to indemnify them for the loss of their clothes, &c. by the destruction of the barges in the Patuxent. On this bill considerable discussion took place in the house, and it was laid on the table.

Friday, Oct. 21.—The house on motion of Mr. Eppes of Va. resolved itself into a committee of the whole. Mr. Nelson in the chair, on the report of the committee of ways and means, and the subsequent letter from Mr. Secretary Dallas.

Mr. Eppes stated that since the receipt of the secretary's letter, the committee had revised their report, and had determined to recommend its modification so as to correspond, in so far as they believed consistent with the public good, with the last report from the treasury department.

The report of the committee having been read over, the first resolution having been read, which proposes to continue the direct tax, and to increase the same 100 per cent. Which was agreed to, though opposed by Mr. Oakley, who proposed to increase it 150 per cent.

The additional tax on Whiskey next came under consideration—Mr. Eppes proposed to add to the duty on the capacity of the still, fifteen cents per gal. on the quantity distilled—Mr. Fisk of N. Y. moved 25—after discussion, the subject was laid over for further consideration, but previous to the rising of the committee

Mr. Eppes laid upon the table resolutions embracing the further amendments which the committee of ways and means proposed to make to their report, viz: a combination of a tax on paper and an increase on the carriage tax to produce double the present amount of the carriage tax; a classification of the licences to retailers, and an increased duty thereon; and the establishment of a national bank.

Saturday, Oct. 22.—Mr. Eppes reported a bill to authorise a loan not exceeding dollars.

The house went into committee of the whole on the report of the committee of ways and means—the increase of the tax on whiskey being under consideration. After debate, (which chiefly hinged on the question whether the duty on the capacity of the still should be retained, which was agreed to, as greatly facilitating the collection of the tax) it was resolved to levy 15 cents on each gallon distilled—ayes 69, nays 62; and the committee rose—25 and 20 cents had been severally proposed, and lost.—A general disposition prevails to vote the necessary supplies; though differences of opinion will exist as to the best means of furnishing them.

Monday October 24. After other business, the report of the committee of Ways and Means was taken up in committee of the whole. The third resolution "to add 100 per cent. to the duty on auctions," was agreed to, after debate. The 4th was amended so as to lay 100 per cent. on the postage of letters, and agreed to without debate. The next for increasing the carriage tax was also agreed to; as was also that for classing the retailers of wines, spirituous liquors and foreign merchandize and imposing on them an additional duty of 50 per cent.

The next, enumerating a variety of articles (see page 77) such as manufactured tobacco, cotton yarn, &c. being under consideration—Mr. Eppes moved that "cotton yarn" be stricken out, which was agreed to—76 to 46; as was also the article "shoes;" the tax on paper was changed so as to make it chargeable with a duty of 5 per cent. a motion to strike out lotteries was negatived without debate. Mr. Goldsborough moved to strike out furniture, and his motion was supported by several gentlemen, but finally rejected,—51 to 69—so the tax was retained.—Mr. Oakley then moved to strike out candles—negatived. Mr. Bigelow proposed to strike out leather—negatived, only 30 rising in favor of it. The next and last resolution was in the following words:

"Resolved, That it is expedient to establish a national bank, with branches in the several states," which was agreed to without debate; for it 66, against it 40.

The committee rose and reported the several resolutions, as amended—

The first to increase the direct tax 100 per cent. instead of 50 as originally proposed, was agreed to, 100 to 38. Mr. Oakley proposed to increase it 150 per cent. For his motion, ayes 20. The resolution being now on its passage, Mr. Webster explained at considerable length the motives and feelings with which he should vote, &c.

Tuesday October 25. The house resumed the consideration of the report of the committee of Ways and Means, as decided in committee of the whole.

The first resolution to double the present direct tax was taken up. Mr. Rhea, of Tennessee, spoke in favor of the resolution; and in reply to some of Mr. Webster's remarks. He was eloquently followed by Mr. Calhoun on the same side. Mr. Webster briefly explained. Mr. Fisk, of Vermont, spoke in a spirited manner in favor of the tax, and Mr. Shipperd warmly against it. The main question, to continue the direct tax with an increase of 100 per cent was carried by the great majority of 89 to 38. [Yeas and nays hereafter.]

The next, to increase the tax on whiskey, coming up, Mr. Fisk of Vermont, renewed his motion to levy 25 instead of 15 cents on the gallon. Adjourned without a decision.

Events of the War.

HEADS OF NEWS.

General McArthur appears to have arrived at Detroit in good season. The red allies were numerous in the immediate neighborhood of the place, and had committed many murders. They will, probably, soon be chastised for their crimes. His force is respectable and would be immediately increased.

In the Chesapeake, the small force that remains under command of commodore Barrie, is distinguishing itself by its depredations on the Eastern shore of Maryland—performing the part of mere robbers. They lately carried off an unarmed citizen, and Barrie is said to have said, that he would make prisoners of all he could—and also, that he daily expected lord Hill in the Chesapeake, to attack Baltimore. If the latter be true (though we believe it will not be realized) his lordship will not catch us napping. Our commander Scott is all vigilance and activity. Perry is also here to aid and assist.

Lake Huron. There is every reason to believe, by statements in the Montreal papers, that the two schooners left in lake Huron, to blockade Michilimacinae by commodore Sinclair, have been surprised and captured by the enemy, in boats and canoes. A letter from a William McCay is published, dated at La Cloche Sept. 17, in which he says he is there on his way to Montreal with the prisoners taken in those vessels.

Pennacola. There are many reasons to believe that general Jackson has attacked and we trust carried the nest of mischief in the south, before now. It is notoriously the rallying point of the enemy, and has long since lost all pretensions to the character of a neutral place. Powerful reinforcements from Tennessee must have joined him—2,000 mounted volunteers, under general Coffee, marched from Fayetteville on the 3d instant: He has with him 1,000 Indians.

The Niagara frontier and Ontario. Our accounts from this frontier are not so distinct as we could wish them. Izard, with a handsome force, had crossed at Buffalo, to pursue Drummond. A battle was expected. Our army was in the best order to beat the enemy. Chancey was in Sacket's Harbor with his fleet—it is not absolutely certain that the British fleet is yet on the lake. Our advices are to the 19th.

MISCELLANEOUS.

MASSACHUSETTS.—The legislature of Massachusetts has had its extraordinary session. The governor's speech will be inserted in our next, but the documents accompanying the same, and the proceedings and resolves of the legislature must lay over for some time and give way to other objects more important, though very interesting to record. Among other things done, they have appointed a committee of twelve persons to meet such others as may be appointed by the New-England states, at Hartford, (Conn.) on the 15th day of December next, to confer respecting the public grievances, &c. They have also authorised the governor to borrow money—and directed the raising of 10,000 infantry and artillery to serve for one year or during the war, to receive the same pay as the troops of the United States, and the officers to be appointed by the governor with the advice of council.

NEW-YORK.—The extraordinary session of the legislature of New-York is about to close. Their proceedings have been extensively patriotic, and are worthy of that great and wealthy state. Governor Tompkins was expected to leave Albany the beginning of this week to take command at New York, and he had ordered all officers on parole to their stations.

FEMALE PATRIOTISM.—About 200 ladies at Charleston South Carolina, after presenting an elegant standard, with Fame sounding the trumpet; on one side this motto:—"God for us, and we for God and our country." On the other—"Let Fame the deed proclaim to future ages," went to work on the fortifications and labored manfully. They concluded the day's service by offering to make 100 suits of clothes for the soldiers to be brought to the defence of the city.

INFAMOUS. While Mr. Keene, an agent from our consul appointed to Tunis, was at Algiers, to effect the release of some American captives there, four impressed American seamen were put on shore there from a British frigate, having obstinately refused "to do duty." He fortunately heard of this before it was known in the city, and had them smuggled to Gibraltar, where, doubtless, they will be retained as prisoners! The name of the captain of this frigate ought to be given to detestation, and the hate even of Winebaggers. Algiers is at war with the United States, and it was the design of the wretch that our people should have been made slaves to the other day. Perhaps, however, their condition might have been bettered by the change. Slavery at Algiers is not more severe than on board a British vessel of war, and less hazardous.

Mr. Keene failed in his mission, though he was authorised to give $3000 each for our citizens. The number is not stated, but is presumed not large.—The dey said he would not let them go, as he wished to add to his American captives.

The old Algerine war had its origin in "British influence"—and the present, doubtless, grows out of the same fruitful source of misery and distress to mankind.

EXCHANGE.—Com. Barney went down to the British fleet some days ago and effected an exchange for all the prisoners taken at Bladenburg or Baltimore, by either party—the balance against the British government to be carried to the general account.

THE CARTEL Analoestan, Smith, has arrived at Providence, R. I. She carried about 100 prisoners from Savannah to Halifax, but brought back only a few prisoners—6 or 8. She was ordered from Halifax in a hurry (Sept. 28) and could not obtain any papers of the place. Indeed, they were refused. The British, it is stated, will not exchange any more prisoners at present. Though the balance is in our favor, many had been sent to England and others were expected to go. Thus, by all possible means, does it appear that the enemy is determined to give barbarity to the war. About 900 Americans remained at Halifax.

The Analoestan, was boarded from a frigate, whose captain said to capt. Smith, "your countrymen have given us a h—l of a drubbing" on Champlain.

Irish papers had been received at Halifax giving some account of the proceedings of the Peacock.—She has certainly sunk a sloop of war, after a very short action, and every soul perishing, supposed to be the Columbine. It is further reported that she had destroyed "at least one hundred British vessels on the coasts of Great Britain!"

GOTHIC.—Among the few persons who returned in the Analoestan cartel from Halifax, was a person fifty-three years old, who had been captured in one of Cockburn's plundering and burning expeditions on the Yecocomo river. They had gallantly made him (unarmed) a prisoner, set his house in flames, and sent him to Halifax. But getting ashamed of the business, (and it is pleasant to observe the enemy has some sense of shame) he was released and sent home, without exchange.

NEW-YORK.—The committee of defence inform the citizens that they have reason to believe that that "city is in great danger of an attack from the enemy," and invite the people to a renewal of their labor in adding strength to the works.

COCKBURN.—The military character of this "Great Bandit" has, we suspect, been overrated. With a fine field for genius and enterprize, he has yet distinguished himself for nothing but pitiful pilfering of the country people, and savage burnings of their houses and property. It would be a pity that a wretch so lost to honor and humanity should have the reputation of a brave man. He appears to be a ruffian or bully.

LAW OF NEW-YORK.—Who would have thought it necessary that a law like the following should be passed? Who would have believed that our country sustained wretches so venal, so base and unprincipled as to return to the enemy the materials with which he would have desolated our country? Yet such knaves there are. The extinction of this devotion to the Goths would itself repay the inconveniences of many years war; and of the good that may be expected to result from it, this is, perhaps, among the most important things I hope for.

Be it enacted by the people of the state of New-York, represented in senate and assembly, That if any person or persons within this state shall apprehend, arrest or detain, or assist, aid or abet, in the apprehension, arrest or detention, of any British deserter or deserters, knowing him or them to be such, and with intent to return him or them to the enemy, such person or persons, on being thereof convicted, shall be deemed guilty of felony and shall be sentenced to imprisonment in the state prison for the term of ten years.—Passed, October 11, 1814.

CASTINE.—Letters have been received in Newburyport from Castine, stating that a British collector had opened the custom house; that all vessels which belonged there previous to its surrender, were restored to their original owners, and allowed a clearance to and free intercourse with New-Brunswick, and all the British provinces.

THE NEW TERRITORY!—"General Order.—Endymion at Sea, Sept. 15, 1814.—The territory lying between the bay of Passamaquoddy and the Penobscot river having been taken possession of by H. M.'s forces: All vessels clearing out from any port of H. M.'s North American provinces, for any port or place within the territory, including the port of Castine, and the ports and places situated on the east side of the Penobscot river, are to pass free and unmolested, to bring back return cargoes of lumber and provisions; also any vessels being from the port of Castine with a license from the commanding officers of H. M.'s land and naval forces at Castine.

EDW. GRIFFITH.

GENERAL HAMPTON.—James M. Connel (says a Boston paper) has lately recovered by the circuit court of the United States now sitting at Albany, of major-general Wade Hampton, a verdict of $9000 damages, for abusive treatment under color of military authority, while he was in command of the army of the north, last summer.

From Halifax we learn that admiral Cochrane left it apparently in a great hurry on the 12th inst. supposed for the Chesapeake, taking with him a quantity of light artillery, but unaccompanied by any other ship than his own. The papers intimate that he came there with a view of drawing off all the regular troops, and to have the forts garrisoned by militia, but that sir J. Sherbrooke would not accommodate him. The opinion prevailed that the admiral had a new expedition in view, and left Halifax to meet a force at some particular place to execute it.

MILITARY.

The president has conferred the brevet rank of major-general on brigadier-general Macorn, for the brilliant defence of Plattsburg against the powerful force of the enemy under the governor-general of the Canadas.

Assistant-adjutant-general Roger Jones, captain in the corps of artillery, is brevetted a major, to rank from the 15th of August, and major J. Hixman, of the same corps, has been brevetted a lieutenant, to rank from the 15th of August also.

The president has conferred a second brevet on that uniformly distinguished officer, captain Nathan Towson, of the corps of artillery. He is now a lieutenant, to rank from the 15th August.

Such men will establish a precedent for promotion according to merit, without regard to seniority.

It is stated that major-general Lewis, of U. S. A. has been directed by the secretary of war, to give up the command of the state of New-York to gov. Tompkins. This arrangement, we presume, will be very satisfactory to the people at large, exceedingly interested in repulsing the enemy at New-York, if he shall attack that most important city.

Private letters say that the captures made by captain Patterson, at Barrataria, are worth $500,000.

The army on the Niagara, under general Brown, has, since it crossed at Buffalo, killed, wounded or taken of the enemy, or caused to desert from his standard, twice and one half of the number it has wholly consisted of. This is true and perhaps unparalleled. Icard's troops are equal to like splendid exploits, and we look with confidence to their movements.

Major-general Smith, of the Maryland militia, has resigned his commission.

A fine body of Virginians under general Madison, have arrived in the neighborhood of Baltimore. We understand that 5000 men from that state, under major-general Pegram, are collected to act together for the defence of Baltimore and Washington.

The governor of this state has been called upon by the secretary of war to furnish 4000 men for the service of the United States, to rendezvous in a direction towards Baltimore. They will be drawn from the 5th and 9th divisions. Corps of infantry and riflemen from the 12th, 13th, 14th and 15th divisions, are invited to tender their services.

Penn. Repub.

When the militia of Washington and Warren counties (N. Y.) were ordered to march en masse to the northern frontier, there appeared under arms 250 men more than had ever mustered at an inspection or review. The surplus was made up of exempts and volunteers.

Extract of a letter from major Peter Dudley, to his excellency governor Shelby, dated Head-Quarters, Urbana, September 21.

"I have the honor of informing you, that since my arrival at this place, a different result has been given the expedition recently abandoned by general McArthur. I am now engaged in organizing and equipping the Kentucky corps under my command for immediate service, which, when united with the Ohio volunteers and friendly indians, will compose a considerable force, to be employed on an expedition which military propriety forbids my divulging, but which I presume will be disclosed to you by general McArthur.

GENERAL ORDERS. Head-Quarters Philadelphia, October 7, 1814. Major-general Gaines takes command of the fourth military district.

The troops will remain in the positions which they at present occupy, until circumstances shall require a change—and will be reviewed by the major-general on their respective parades, between 10 and 2 o'clock on the following day, viz:

- At Fort Mifflin, on the 9th.
- At Marcus Hook, on the 12th.
- At Brandywine camp, on the 13th.
- At New Castle, on the 14th—and
- Billingsport, on the 15th.

The major-general feels much satisfaction in announcing to the army he has the honor to command, that he has received from the committee of defence, representing the citizens of Philadelphia, the most cordial assurance of co-operation and support in whatever measures may be necessary for the destruction of the enemy, should his temerity drive him hither—and it is confidently expected that every officer and every man will hold himself ready to meet and resolved to beat the invading foe.

EDMUND P. GAINES, maj. gen. by brevet. Plattsburg, Oct. 1.—When the enemy first took possession of his part of the village, they broke open the goal and let out two persons confined for murder, one for stabbing with intent to murder, one for counterfeiting, and four for larceny and other offences.

Much injury has been done to the buildings on the north side of the river by the shots from our forts and block houses. Scarce a house has escaped, and many are completely ridled. The enemy's batteries and the buildings in their rear evince the skill and judgment of captain Alexander Brooks, commanding officer of the artillery, and of the excellent corps under his command. The enemy declared we had French artilleryists. Nine dwelling houses, 13 stores and shops, and two barns, together with the court-house and jail, were burned—some of them on account of their covering the enemy's advance, and others by accidental shots.

Erie, Oct. 14. On Sunday the Lawrence, Lady Prevost and Porcupine sailed for Portage river. They will transport about 1000 prisoners (those taken by Perry and Harrison last fall) from that place to Canada.

BRITISH ACCOUNT OF THE ATTACK ON BALTIMORE.

Halifax September 28.

This morning arrived his majesty's ships Tonnant, vice-admiral sir A. Cochrane; Surprise and Diomedea from the Chesapeake.

An officer of one of the ships has obligingly favored us with the following interesting account of an attack made by the British forces upon Baltimore.

Sir Alexander Cochrane and major general Ross, having resolved upon making a demonstration on the city of Baltimore, which might if circumstances justified it, be converted into a real attack—on the 11th inst. the fleet entered the Patapsco, and the frigates, smaller ships of war, and transports, proceeded up the river, to an advantageous situation for landing the troops, &c. Early on the morning of the 12th the disembarkation took place, without opposition, of the army, 600 seamen, the 2d battalion marines, and those of the squadron—the whole under the command of general Ross, who was accompanied by rear-admiral Cockburne—soon after the landing was effected, sir A. Cochrane shifted his flag from the Tonnant to the Surprise, and followed by the bombs, rocket ships, &c. passed up the river, with the view of co-operating with the troops. At day-light on the 14th the melancholy intelligence of the death of general Ross was announced on board the Surprise, he received his fatal wound from a musket ball, while engaged with a small party, in reconnoitering the positions of the enemy, and closed his valuable life before he could be brought off to the ship. Colonel Brook succeeded to the command, and immediately pushed on to within five miles of Baltimore, where the enemy (about 6 or 7000) had taken up an advanced and strong position; here the enemy was attacked with an impetuosity that obliged him to give way, and retreat rapidly in every direction, leaving on the field of battle a considerable number of killed and wounded and two pieces of cannon.

At the dawn of the next day, the bomb vessels having taken their stations, supported by the Surprise and the other frigates, opened a heavy fire (within shell range) upon the fort that defended the entrance of the harbor of Baltimore, which had the effect of shewing the strength and fortifications of the enemy; on the land side the town was defended by a chain of redoubts connected by a breastwork, a large train of artillery, and a force apparently of from 15 to 20,000 men; the entrance of the harbor was obstructed by a barrier of sunken vessels, defended by gun-boats, and flanked by powerful batteries.

These circumstances preventing any effectual co-operation from his majesty's ships, and it being considered that without it there was too great a disparity of force to justify an attack by the army upon the above positions of the enemy—and as a primary object of the expedition had been accomplished—it was thought proper to withdraw the troops—and the next morning they embarked without the least annoyance from the enemy.

The result of the demonstration has been the defeat of the army of the enemy—the destruction by themselves of a quantity of shipping; of an extensive rope-walk, and other public erections—harrassing the armed inhabitants of the surrounding country, and drawing off their attention from other important points.

Our loss on the occasion we are happy to learn, did not exceed, in killed and wounded 250 men.

[A letter from Washington says general Ross was killed by a shot from a boy behind a tree.]

About 250 American prisoners had been lately sent to England. Several hundred negroes arrived in the last vessels from the Chesapeake.

The preceding is what admiral Cochrane's seamen will call a "tough yarn," and is essentially false in many of its particulars. But it is useless to point them out—we have already given a full and faithful account of the affair; and the citizens may compare the one with the other. The thing is expressly calculated to throw a veil over the matter, and John Bull (who believes any thing) will swallow it as the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth—though it is neither of the three.

The following amount of property was taken from on board the enemy's fleet recently captured by com. Macdonough on lake Champlain—11,800 wt. of powder, exclusive of fixed ammunition.

Between 80 and 90,000 wt. of balls.

600 suits sailors clothing.

And the winter clothing of the whole of the land army.

These are glorious and important spoils.

New Bedford—From the New Bedford Mercury—"Mr. LINDSEY is requested by one of his subscribers to insert in his paper, that the doctor of the privateer Saratoga (now fitting for a cruise at Fairhaven) applied some days since, to several apothecaries of this place for a medicine chest; all of whom peremptorily refused supplying him with that article, or with any drugs or medicines for the use of the privateer."

We think the gentlemen did themselves much credit; and we hope their example will be followed by the citizens of this place generally. Let it be distinctly understood, that privateers cannot obtain supplies of any kind at this place, and we shall no longer be infested with those nuisances. Let them fit and refit from that sink of corruption, that Sodom of our country, called Baltimore, and not by seeking refuge here, put in jeopardy our shipping and our town, and necessitate our yeomanry at this busy season to leave their farms uncultivated to defend our harbor, which were it not a place of refuge for what has been emphatically denominated "licensed pirates," would not need a soldier to insure its safety.

A SHIP OWNER.

The enemy himself, (as indeed do all civilized people) so far respects the character of a surgeon as to give up his person, without exchange. But Americans to Americans refuse even medicines for the sick!—These folks profane the name of Washington—let us hear what he said on such things—"The very idea of 'the power and the right of the people to establish government (said president Washington) pre-supposes the duty of every individual to obey the established government. All obstructions to the execution of the laws—all combinations and associations, under whatever plausible character, with the real design to direct, controul, counteract, or awe, the regular deliberation and action of the constituted authorities, are destructive of this fundamental principle and of fatal tendency."

Legislature of Massachusetts.

GOVERNOR'S MESSAGE.

Gentlemen of the senate, and gentlemen of the house of representatives—Since our late a lournment, such important changes have taken place in the state of our public affairs, and the war in which we have been unhappily involved, has assumed an aspect so threatening and destructive, that the council unanimously concurred with me in their opinion that an extraordinary meeting of the legislature was indispensable.

At different times, and for short periods some of the troops of the United States, had been stationed within this commonwealth; but most of them having been withdrawn for the purpose of aiding in the operations against Canada, it was found necessary in the course of the last session of the general court, and afterwards, to call out a number of the militia for the protection of the most exposed places of our maritime frontier, and to furnish their inhabitants with such other means of defence as the circumstances of the state would authorize.

Brigadier general Cushing, while he was superintendant of this military district, informed me that he expected an order from the president of the United States to request a detachment from the militia of this commonwealth for the defence of the sea-coast, and particularly of this town; and stated that the number of the United States' troops in the two forts in this harbor was not more than sufficient to man one of them. He proposed that one of the forts should be occupied by the militia, and agreed that when called out they should be subject to the command of no officers of the United States' army, except the superintendant of this military district. Though it was supposed that in ordinary cases the militia were not liable by the constitution to do garrison duty in the forts of the United States, yet as the defence of this town was a primary object with the government of the state, and we possessed no other means of strengthening the forts at the entrance of the harbor, I agreed that the proposed detachment should be made upon the terms before mentioned.

After I had left Boston. I received a letter from major general Dearborn, who had succeeded general Cushing as superintendant of this military district, dated on the 8th of July, in which, by order of the president, he requested me to detach eleven hundred of the militia to occupy the forts in the harbor of Boston and other points on the sea-coast of the state. I immediately wrote to the adjutant general requesting him, if he could make such arrangements with general Dearborn as had been proposed by general Cushing, to issue the necessary orders for making the detachments. A general order was accordingly issued for that purpose on the 18th July.

On the 4th of September I received a letter of that date from general Dearborn, stating that he had received information of the enemy's having taken possession of Castine with a formidable force, and that it was not improbable his views might extend to our principal towns on the sea-coast, and requesting me to order out for the service of the United States, two thousand infantry and two hundred artillery of the militia of this state exclusive of the town of Boston, for the defence of this harbor, town and vicinity, and the same numbers for the defence of Portland and its vicinity and the sea-board between Kennebec and the Penobscot rivers; and two hundred infantry and fifty artillery from Kittery, Berwick and York to aid in the defence of the harbor and the public ships in the harbor of Portsmouth. But such objections and complaints had arisen in executing the general order of the 18th of July, and the whole number proposed to be called out, was so great that the council, whose attention was requested to this subject, unanimously advised me to issue the general order of the 6th of September, and to place the detachment made by virtue of it, under the immediate command of a major general of the militia. The alacrity with which this and other similar orders were obeyed, has been highly honorable to the militia of the state. Measures were also taken to call out for the protection of the towns on the sea-coast in the district of Maine a part of the militia of that district. I immediately addressed a letter to Mr. Monroe, the acting secretary of war, inclosing the last mentioned general order, and requesting to be informed whether the expense thus necessarily incurred for our protection would be ultimately reimbursed to this state by the United States. A copy of this letter, and the secretary's answer to it, and of the general order of September 6th, with such official information as I have received concerning the capture of Eastport and Castine, and other hostile events which have taken place in the eastern parts of the state since the capture of Eastport, and also a letter from the governor of Rhode-Island and the reply to it will be laid before you by the secretary.

In the defensive measures which have been adopted, and which for the most part have been under the immediate direction of the commissioners for the defence of the sea-coast, we have been solicitous to avoid unnecessary expense. But the apprehensions of an attack in every part of our coast, and the pressing calls for the means of defence from the exposed towns through an extent of five or six hundred miles, have made it necessary to call out a greater number of our militia than have been in service at any former period. It is an obvious reflection, that the limited sources of revenue which the state has retained in its own power, bear no proportion to the expenses hereby incurred, and if those efforts are much longer required, the state will find it extremely difficult, if not impossible, to provide even in the first instance for the requisite expenditures.

By a law of congress, passed at their last session, it is enacted, that in addition to the officers of the militia which had before been provided for, there shall be in each division one division inspector, and one division quarter master, to each brigade, one aid-de-camp. But no provision has been made directing the manner in which those officers shall be appointed.

The situation of this state is peculiarly dangerous and perplexing. We have been led by the terms of the constitution to rely on the government of the Union to provide for our defence. We have resigned to that government the revenues of the state, with the expectation that this object would not be neglected. But the government has declared war against the most powerful maritime nation, whose fleets can approach every section of our extended sea-coasts and we are disappointed in our expectations of national defence. But though we may be convinced that the war in its commencement was unnecessary and unjust, and has been prosecuted without any useful or practicable object with the inhabitants of Canada, while our sea-coast has been left almost defenceless; and though in a war thus commenced we may have declined to afford our voluntary aid to offensive operations, yet I presume there will be no doubt of our right to defend our dwellings and possessions against any hostile attack by which their destruction is menaced. Let us then, relying on the support and direction of Providence, unite in such measures for our safety, as the times demand, and the principles of justice and the law of self-preservation will justify. To your wisdom and patriotism the interests of the state are confided, and the more valuable those interests are, the more solicitous you will be to guard and preserve them. CALEB STRONG.

Cruise of the Wasp.

Copy of a letter from captain Johnson Blakeley to the secretary of the navy.

U. S. S. Wasp, L'Orient, 3d July, 1814.

SIR—On Tuesday the 28th ult. being then in lat 48, 36, N. and long. 11, 15, W. we fell in with, engaged, and after an action of 19 minutes captured his Britannic majesty's sloop of war the Reindeer, William Manners, esq. commander. Annexed are the minutes of our proceeding on that day, prior to and during the continuance of the action.

Where all did their duty and each appeared anxious to excel, it is very difficult to discriminate. It is, however, only rendering them their merited due, when it is declared of lieuts. Meily and Bury, 1st and 3d of this vessel, and whose names will be among those of the conquerors of the Guerrier and the Java; and of Mr. Tillinghast, 2nd lieut. who was greatly instrumental in the capture of the Boxer, that their conduct and courage on this occasion fulfilled the highest expectation and gratified every wish. Sailing-master Carr is also entitled to great credit for the zeal and ability with which he discharged his various duties.

The cool and patient conduct of every officer and man while exposed to the fire of the shifting gun of the enemy and without an opportunity of returning it, could only be equalled by the animation and ardor exhibited when actually engaged, or by the promptitude and firmness with which every attempt of the enemy to board was met and successfully repelled. Such conduct may be seen, but cannot well be described.

The Reindeer mounted sixteen 24 lb. carronades, two long six or nine pounders, and a shifting 12 pound carronade, with a compliment on board of one hundred and eighteen men. Her crew were said to be the pride of Plymouth.

Our loss in men has been severe, owing in part to the proximity of the two vessels and the extreme smoothness of the sea, but chiefly in repelling boarders. That of the enemy, however, was infinitely more so as will be seen by the list of killed and wounded on both sides.

Six round shot struck our hull, and many grape which did not penetrate far. The foremast received a 24lb shot, which passed through its centre, and our rigging and sails were a good deal injured.

The Reindeer was literally cut to pieces in a line with her ports; her upperworks, boats and spare spars were one complete wreck.—A breeze springing up next afternoon her foremast went by the board.

Having received all the prisoners on board, which from the number of wounded occupied much time, together with their baggage, the Reindeer was on the evening of the 29th set on fire and in a few hours blew up.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully,
your most obedient servant,

J. BLAKELEY.

Secretary of the navy.

Minutes of the action between the United States' S. Wasp, and H. B. M. S. Reindeer, on the 28th June, 1814, lat. 48, 36, N. long. 11, 15, W.

At 4 A. M. light breezes and cloudy; at 4-4 after 4 discovered two sails, two points before the lee beam, kept away in chase, shortly after discovered one sail, on the weather beam; altered the course and hauled by in chase of the sail to windward. At 5 sail to windward bore E. N. E. and very light; at 10 the stranger sail bearing E. by N. hoisted an English ensign and pendant, and displayed a signal at the main (blue and yellow diagonally.) Meridian light airs and clouds, at half past 12 P. M. the enemy showed a blue and white flag, diagonally, at the fore, and fired a gun, 2 h. 15 m. called all hands to quarters and prepared for action. 2 h. 22 m. leaving we could weather the enemy, tacked ship and stood for him, 1 h. 50 m.—the enemy tacked ship and stood from us, 1 h. 56 m.—hoisted our colors and fired a gun to windward, which was answered by the enemy with mortar to windward. 2 h. 20 m.—the enemy still standing from us—set the royals, 2 h. 25 m.—set the flying jib, 2 h. 29 m.—set the upper staysails 2 h. 33 m.—the enemy having tacked for us, took in the staysails 2 h. 47 m. fired the royals, 2 h. 51 m. seeing that the enemy would be able to weather us, tacked ship, 3 h. 3 m.—the enemy hoisted his flying jib, braked up our mizen, 3 h. 15 m.—the enemy on our weather quarter, distant about 40 yards, fired his shifting gun, a 12 pound carronade at us, loaded with round and grape shot from his top-gallant fort-castle, 3 h. 17 m.—fired the same gun a second time, 3 h. 19 m.—fired it a third time, 3 h. 21 m.—fired it a fourth time, 3 h. 24 m.—a fifth shot, all from the same gun. Finding the enemy did not get sufficiently on the beam to enable us to bring our guns to bear, put the helm a-lee, and at 26 minutes after 3, commenced the action with the after carronade on the starboard side, and fired in succession 3 h. 4 m.—hauled up the mizen, 3 h. 49 m. the enemy having his larboard bow in contact with our larboard quarter endeavored to board us, but was repulsed in every attempt—at 3 h. 44 m. orders were given to board in turn, which were promptly executed, when all resistance immediately ceased, and at 3 h. 45 m. the enemy hauled down his flag.

U. S. S. Wasp, L'Orient, 8th July, 1814.

Sir—I have the honor to announce to you the arrival of this ship to-day at this place.—By the pilot who carried us out of Portsmouth N. H. I had the satisfaction to make you acquainted with our having left that place, and again had the pleasure of addressing you by the French national brig Olive, and which was the first vessel we had spoken since our departure from the United States. From the time of our sailing I continued to follow the route pointed out in your instructions until our arrival at this place, during which we have been so fortunate as to make several captures; a list of which will accompany this.—These with their cargoes were wholly destroyed, with one exception. This was the Galliot Henrietta, which was permitted to remain with the prisoners, thirty-eight in number, after throwing overboard the greater part of her cargo, leaving only a sufficient to ballast her. When arrived on our cruising ground I found it impossible to maintain any thing like a station, and was led, in chase, farther up the English channel than was intended. After arriving on soundings, the number of neutrals which are now passing kept us almost constantly in pursuit. It gives me much pleasure to state to you the very healthy condition of the crew of the Wasp during the cruise. Sometimes without one on the sick list and at no time any who remained there more than a few days. Great praise is due to Dr. Clark for his skill and attention at all times; but particularly after the action with the Reindeer, his unwearied assiduity to the necessities of the wounded was highly conspicuous.

The ship is at present under quarantine, but we expect to be released from it to-morrow, when the wounded will be sent to the hospital, and every exertion made to prepare the Wasp for sea.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully,
your most obedient servant,

J. BLAKELEY.

U. S. S. Wasp, L'Orient, 10th July, 1814.

SIR—After the capture of his Britannic majesty's sloop of war the Reindeer, it was my wish to have continued the cruise as directed by you. I was however necessitated to relinquish this desire after a few days, from a consideration of the wounded of our crew, whose wounds had at this season become offensive, and aggravated by the number of prisoners on board at the time, being seventy-seven in number. Fearing, from the crowded state of the Wasp, that some valuable lives might be lost if retained on board, I was compelled though with reluctance to make the first neutral port. Those belonging to the Reindeer, who were dangerously wounded, were put on board a Portuguese brig bound to England three days after the action, and from the winds which prevailed arrived probably in two or three days after their departure. Their surgeon, the captains clerk, with the captains and officers servants, and the crew of the Orange Boven, were put on board the same vessel to attend upon them. Since our arrival at this place we have experienced every civility from the public authorities, our quarantine was only for a few hours, and our wounded, fourteen in number, were carried yesterday to the hospital where they were comfortably situated. Our foremast although badly wounded can be repaired, and will be taken on shore as soon as possible. All the other damages sustained can be repaired by ourselves.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, your most obedient servant, J. BLAKELEY.

Mr. Jefferson's Library.

TH. JEFFERSON'S OFFER OF CONGRESS OF HIS LIBRARY. Monticello, September 21, 1814.

DEAR SIR—I learn from the newspapers that the vanquishment of our enemy has triumphed at Washington over science as well as the arts, by the destruction of the public library, with the noble edifice in which it was deposited. Of this transaction, as of that of Copenhagen, the world will entertain but one sentiment. They will see a nation suddenly withdrawn from a great war, full armed and full handed, taking advantage of another whom they had mercenily forced into it, unarmed and unprepared to indulge themselves in acts of barbarism which do not belong to a civilized age. When Van Ghent destroyed their shipping at Chatham, and De Ruyter rode triumphantly up the Thames, he might, in like manner, by the acknowledgment of their own historians, have forced all their ships up to London bridge, and there have burnt them, the tower, and city; had these examples been then set. London, when this menaced, was near a thousand years old; Washington but in its teens.

I presume it will be among the early objects of congress to recommence their collection. This will be difficult while the war continues, and intercourse with so much risk. You know my collection, its condition and extent. I have been 50 years making it, and have spared no pains, opportunity, or expense to make it as is. While residing in Paris I devoted every afternoon I was disengaged for a summer or two, in examining all the principal book-stores turning over every book with my own hands, and putting by every thing which related to America, and indeed whatever was rare and valuable in every science; besides this, I had standing orders, during the whole time I was in Europe in its principal book-marts, particularly Amsterdam, Frankfort, Madrid and London, for such works relating to America as could not be found in Paris. So that, in that department particularly, such a collection was made as probably can never again be effected; because it is hardly probable that the same opportunities, the same time, industry, and perseverance and expense with some knowledge of the bibliography of the subject would again happen in concurrence. During the same period, and after my return to America I was led to procure also whatever related to the duties of those in the highest concerns of the nation, so that the collection, which I suppose is of between 9 and 10,000 volumes, while it includes what is chiefly valuable in science and literature generally, extends more particularly to whatever belongs to the American statesman; in the diplomatic and parliamentary branches, it is particularly full. It is long since I have been sensible it ought not to continue private property, and had provided at my death, congress should have the refusal of it, at their own price; but the loss they have now incurred makes the present, the proper moment for their accommodation without regard to the small remnant of time, and the barren use of my enjoying it. I ask of your friendship, therefore, to make for me the tender of it to the library committee of congress, not knowing myself, of whom the committee consists; I enclose you a catalogue, which will enable them to judge of its contents, nearly the whole are well bound, abundance of them elegantly, and of the choicest editions. They may be valued by persons named by themselves, and the payment made convenient to the public; it may be for instance, in such annual instalments as the law of congress has left at their disposal, or in stock of any of their late loans, or of any loan they may institute at this session so as to spare the present calls of our country, and await its days of peace and prosperity. They may enter nevertheless, into immediate use of it, as 18 or 20 waggons would place it in Washington in a single trip of a fortnight. I should be willing, indeed, to retain a few of the books to amuse the time I have yet to pass, which might be valued with the rest, but not included in the sum of valuation until they should be restored at my death, which I would carefully provide for, so that the whole library, as it stands in the catalogue at this moment, should be theirs, without any garbling. Those I should like to retain would be chiefly classical and mathematical, some few in other branches, and particularly one of the five Encyclopedias in the catalogue: but this, if not acceptable, would not be urged. I must add, that I have not revised the library since I came home to live, so that it is probable some of the books may be missing, except in the chapters of law and divinity, which have been revised, and stand exactly as in the catalogue which will of course be needed, whether the tender be accepted or not. I do not know that it contains any branch of science which congress would wish to exclude from their collection. There is in fact no subject to which a member of congress may not have occasion to refer. But such a wish would not correspond with my views of preventing its dismemberment. My design is either to place it in their hands entire, or preserve it so here. I am engaged in making an Alphabetical Index of the authors' names to be annexed to the catalogue, in order to facilitate the finding their works in the catalogue, which I will forward to you as soon as completed. Any agreement you shall be so good as to take the trouble of entering into with the committee, I hereby confirm. Accept the assurance of my great esteem and respect.

(Signed)

TH. JEFFERSON.

The new British Dominion!

GOVERNOR SHERBROOKE'S PROCLAMATION.

From the Halifax Royal Gazette of Sept. 24.

By Lieutenant general sir John Coape Sherbrooke, knight of the most honorable order of the Bath, lieutenant governor and commander in chief in and over his majesty's provinces of Nova Scotia, commanding a division of his Britannic majesties' forces; and by Edward Griffith, esquire, rear admiral of the white, commanding a squadron of his Majesty's ships of war, employed in taking possession of the eastern side of Penobscot river, and all the country lying between the same river and the boundary line of the the Province of New Brunswick, &c. &c.

A PROCLAMATION.

Whereas we have taken formal possession, for his majesty, of all the eastern side of the Penobscot river, and all the country lying between the same river and the boundary line of the Province of New-Brunswick, including Long-Island, and all the other Islands near and contiguous to the shores thereof:

And whereas it is expedient and necessary that a provisional government be established in that country until his majesty's pleasure shall be known—we do therefore order and command, for the present, and until further orders to the contrary, all judges, justices of the peace, and other officers duly commissioned and appointed to keep the peace, and administer justice and who were acting under the authority of the government within that country, still to continue in authority until his majesty's pleasure shall be further known, and to administer justice and preserve peace and good order within the same country, and every part thereof, agreeably to the laws, usage and customs in force at the time we took possession of that country; subject, however, to such future orders and alterations as may be expedient. And we have appointed Gerard Gosselin, esq. major-general in his majesty's service, or whoever may succeed to the military command in case of his death or departure, to command and govern that country, until his majesty's pleasure shall be further known, or until the commander in chief of his majesty's forces shall make other order to the contrary. And we strictly enjoin and command all persons of every description, dwelling and residing within the limits of the before described country, to pay obedience to this Proclamation, and to the said Gerard Gosselin, or to the senior officer commanding that country for time being, and to conduct themselves peaceably and quietly. And if any person or persons, residing or inhabiting within the country before described, shall hereafter be found in arms against his majesty, or aiding or assisting his majesty's enemies in any other shape, either by conveying intelligence, or otherwise, such person or persons shall be immediately brought before a court martial, and on conviction, shall be punished agreeably to military law. And all collectors and receivers of the public revenue of that country, are enjoined and commanded immediately to render to the proper officer of his majesty's customs, appointed for that purpose at Castine, a true and exact account of all and every sum or sums of public money in their hands at the time possession was taken of that country for his majesty, and to pay over the same to the said officer of the customs: and all such collectors and receivers are to account for, and pay over in the same manner all monies by them collected or received since possession of that country was taken by us as aforesaid. And all persons inhabiting within the said country and islands are required to appear, before the proper officers appointed for that purpose, as speedily as possible after the publication hereof, and to take an oath to behave peaceably and quietly, and while inhabiting and residing within that country, not to carry arms, or in any respect act hostile against his majesty, or any of his subjects. And such inhabitants, taking such oath shall be protected in their persons and properties, until his majesty's pleasure shall be known; nothing however, herein contained, is to extend to any property seized and taken as prize previous to the publication hereof, or to the security of the persons or property of those who refuse to take the oath before mentioned. And all and every person or persons not being an inhabitant or inhabitants of that country, at the time it was taken possession of by his majesty's forces, whether such person be a British subject or otherwise, who shall be found sojourning in that country, within the said limits, or passing or re-passing within the same without a proper pass, and licence granted, either by the governor in chief of British North America; or by the admiral commanding in chief his majesty's ships on the coast of North America, or by the lieutenant-governors, or commanders in chief for the time being, of the provinces of Nova Scotia, or New-Brunswick, or by the admiral commanding for the time being at Halifax, or from the said Gerard Gosselin, or whoever may succeed him as senior officer commanding within the said country, shall be immediately apprehended and brought to trial before a court martial, and punished as for a breach of orders, according to militia law; and full power and authority is hereby granted to the said Gerard Gosselin, or whoever may hereafter be commander in that country, until his majesty's pleasure be known, to compel any person or persons, who may hereafter be guilty of any hostile, disorderly, or disobedient conduct, or who refuse to take the oath before directed, to be removed from that country, and to punish such person or persons, who may return to the same, after such removal, according to military law, as for a breach of orders. And all persons inhabiting or residing within that country, being owner or owners of any ship or ships, vessel or vessels, and who shall have taken the oath of allegiance to his majesty, shall be entitled to receive from the officer of the customs appointed at Castine, a certificate, and coasting licence, countersigned by the military officer commanding in that country for the time being, which shall protect such ships or vessels respectively, in fishing or coasting from one harbor or river to the other, within the limits of the country aforesaid; and it shall be lawful for such vessels when furnished with coasting clearances, and permits from the proper officer of the customs at Castine aforesaid, to carry without molestation, from one harbor to another within said district, the produce of that country, or any goods, wares or merchandize, lawfully imported into Castine. Provided always that if any ship or vessel so licensed for fishing or coasting shall be found at the distance of ten leagues from the shore of said country, or to the southward, or westward of the eastern side of Monhegan island, or shall be found to the northward or eastward of the line of the province of New-Brunswick, the licence of such vessel or vessels, shall be null and void, and it shall be lawful to seize and make prize of such vessel or vessels, the same as if owned by the enemy.

And it shall and may be lawful, until his majesty's pleasure shall be known, for any British subject, or person inhabiting within the said country, who shall be admitted to the privilege of a British subject, to import and bring from the united Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, or any of the colonies or plantations thereto belonging into the port of Castine, and no other port or place within the said district, in British ships, owned and navigated according to law, all goods, wares and merchandize, which can be lawfully exported from Great Britain and Ireland, to the British colonies; and all goods, wares and merchandize, which can be lawfully imported from one British colony to another; and to export in like manner, in British ships only, from the port of Castine, any goods, wares or merchandize, the produce of the said country, or goods condemned as prize, and to carry the same to Great Britain or Ireland, or any of the British colonies. Provided always, that any British ship, entering or attempting to enter, any other port, harbor or place, within the limits of the said country, save said port of Castine, shall be liable to be seized as prize, and condemned as a British ship trading with the enemy; And provided also that nothing herein contained shall authorise British subjects, or persons trading to that country under the authority of this proclamation, to take up a residence in said country unless specially licensed for that purpose, as aforesaid.

And all goods imported, and exported, into, or from, the said port of Castine, or carried coastwise or otherwise, shall be subject to all the duties, rules, orders and regulations, which the laws of trade and navigation, and the British acts of parliament regulating the trade and fisheries of the British colonies appoint: and which duties shall be collected, and laws of trade, rules and regulations executed, after the same manner as at the custom-house in Halifax, in the province of Nova Scotia.

And we do assure, and promise the inhabitants of the country taken possession of by us as aforesaid, that so long as they shall conform to this proclamation, and behave themselves peaceably and quietly, and shall take and subscribe either the oath of allegiance to his majesty, or the oath by this proclamation appointed, they shall be protected both in person and property, until his majesty's pleasure shall be known; and as far as possible, shall have the laws which were in force at the time we took possession of that country, carried into execution by the judges, magistrates and peace officers who were in authority at the time we took possession of said country: subject, however, to such alteration and ordinances, as the officer commanding for the time being, may deem necessary and expedient to enable him to support and maintain the power and authority of his majesty, in and over that country, and subject to the authority of that summary and military course of proceeding which the defence of the country may render necessary, and which the laws of war among civilized nations authorise. And we hope that the peaceable demeanor, and behavior of the inhabitants, under present circumstances, will be such as will enable the officer commanding for the time being, to carry into effect every measure necessary to promote their present security and happiness; but nothing contained in this proclamation is to extend, or be construed to extend, to the establishment of any form of government that shall exist longer than until his majesty's pleasure shall be known, and subject to all such orders and regulations as the prince regent of the united kingdom, acting in the name and on the behalf of his majesty, may think expedient to appoint and establish for the permanent government of that country; until which period we promise to carry into effect this proclamation, in every way that will best conduce to the safety and prosperity of the inhabitants of the country, provided they contribute by their peaceable demeanor to the measures necessary and expedient to be taken to hold possession of the country against his majesty's enemies, to which object the officer commanding in that country, for the time being, is to employ his whole force, and any opposition from the inhabitants of that country to the measures necessary to accomplish that object, will render this proclamation null and void.

Given under our hands and seals at arms at Halifax, this 21st day of September, in the 54th year of his majesty's reign, Annoque Domini 1814.

JOHN COAPE SHERBROOKE,
Lieutenant-general commanding.
EDWARD GRIFFITH, rear admiral.

1157. Brig Dover, of London, captured by the same and ditto.

1158. Brig Pickle, captured by the Pike of Baltimore and burnt.

1159. Schooner ———, from St. Johns, divested of her valuable articles, by the same, and made a cartel of.

1160. Schooner Industrious Bee, captured by the same and burnt.

1161. Schooner Venus, captured by ditto and do.

1162. Schooner Lord Nelson, captured by ditto and ditto.

1163. Schooner Hope, captured by ditto and ditto.

1164. Brig Jane, with provisions and dry goods, divested of part of her cargo, by the same, and made a cartel of.

1165. Brig Orient, from Portsmouth, (Eng.) for Teneriffe, with some dry goods, captured by the same, divested and scuttled.

1166. Brig John, from London for Teneriffe, captured by the same and burnt within gun shot of a British man of war brig.

The Pike captured several other vessels which she released, or made cartels of—two or three valuable prizes are yet to be heard of—but the privateer ran ashore on the southern coast, and was taken possession of by some of the enemy vessels. A part of the crew escaped—43 were made prisoners. She parolled 250 prisoners during her cruise.

1167. Brig Kingston Packet, with oil and fish, sent into Portland, by the Fox of Portsmouth.

1168, 1169, a brig and a schooner sent into Ocracoke, laden with fish, by the Herald of New-York.

1170. Ship Samuel Cummings, 400 tons, laden with sugar and coffee—captured by the Pike of Baltimore, but wrecked on the southern coast—part of the cargo saved.

1171. Ship Five Sisters, captured by the letter of marque schooner Dash, divested of 206 puncheons of Jamaica rum, and permitted to proceed.

1172, 1173, 1174, 1175, 1176, 1177, 1178—seven vessels, viz. 1. bark Neptune, 207 tons, from Cork for Halifax, with a cargo of sundries; 2. brig William, laden with barley, from Limerick for Lisbon; 3. brig Pallas, 2 guns, 131 tons, from Magadore, for London, richly laden with skins, &c. 4. galliot Henrietta, from Belfast for Guadalupe, laden with provisions; 5. ship Orange Boven, 8 guns, 325 tons, full of sugar and coffee, from Bermuda to London; 6. brig Regulator, 112 tons, laden with port wine, from Oporto to London; 7. schooner Jenny, 151 tons, with a cargo of sweet oil, from Leghorn to London—all captured by the U. S. sloop of war Wasp, on the British coasts, and burnt or scuttled, except the Henrietta, made a cartel of.

1179. "His majesty's" sloop of war REINDEER, 21 guns, 118 men, from Plymouth on a cruise, captured by the same, after a short but sharp action, and burnt. See official account.

1180. Schooner ———, captured by the Leach of Salem, and ransomed.

1181. Brig ———, of 200 tons, with a cargo of rum, sugar, molasses, lime-juice and lignum-vita, estimated to be worth $30,000, sent into Newbern, by the Hero of that place.

1182. Brig Mars, from Mogadore, captured by the David Porter, of Boston, (the Whig of Baltimore in company) divested of a considerable part of her cargo and ordered in.

1183. Brig Cornwallis, captured as above, divested and made a cartel of. She was laden with Barilla.

1184. Ship Vester, from Rio Janeiro for England, 6 guns, captured by the David Porter, divested of her least bulky and most valuable articles and ordered into port.

1185. Brig Horatia, from the same for the same, captured by the same, and ransomed for a bill of $25,000—cargo, hides and tallow.

☞ The D. P. has several fine prizes yet to be heard of.

1186. Ship Liddle, from Liverpool for Maramichi, captured by the Amelia of Baltimore, divested and given up to release her prisoners.

1187. Ship Jesse, from London for Newfoundland, captured by the same and burnt.

1188. Schooner Mink, laden with flour, a new vessel built on lake Superior, and captured on lake Huron, by the squadron under com. Sinclair, and sent to Erie.

1189. Schooner Perseverance, also laden with provisions, captured on lake Superior by the same and destroyed in attempting to get her down the Falls of St. Mary's.

1190. "His majesty's" schooner Nancy, 3 guns, a fine vessel, richly laden with valuable stores, destroyed by the same at Nautausaga, on Lake Huron.

☞ There is now no vessel beyond the size of a batteaux belonging to the enemy on the upper lakes, Huron, Michigan and Superior.

1191. Brig Endeavor, a transport vessel, laden with sails, anchors, army stores and coal, captured by the Surprise, of Baltimore, and destroyed on Rockaway beach, near New-York, by the British. Cargo, &c. partially saved.

1192. Cutter Jubilee, from Teneriffe with wine, captured by the Whig of Baltimore, divested of part of her cargo and made a cartel of.

1193. Schooner Alexandria, in ballast, captured by the same and burnt.

1194. Brig Irish Miner, with coal, captured by the same and made a cartel of.

1195. Brig Princess Mary, from Ireland for London, with government provisions, captured by the same and destroyed.

1196. Brig Eliza, from the same to the same, with stores, captured by the same—cargo thrown overboard and vessel made a cartel of.

1197. Schooner Esperance from Chalon Bay for Corunna, captured by the same and destroyed.

1198. Ship London, from Merimachi for Liverpool, with timber, captured by the same and burnt.

1199. Ship Postethwell, from Cork for Merimachi, in ballast, captured by the same and burnt.

The Whig, made several prizes yet to be heard of, and has arrived at New-York, with some goods and 23 prisoners; she also made some prizes in co. with the David Porter, mentioned above.

1200. Brig Nancy, from Liverpool, for Halifax, laden with dry goods, captured by the Portsmouth, of Portsmouth, divested of 318 bales and packages of goods invoiced at £27,000 sterling, and ordered in. This is a great prize, well accounted for, as the privateer with her rich spoils has safely arrived.

1201. A sloop from Halifax, captured by the same, divested of her valuable goods, and given up to the prisoners.

1202. Schooner Columbia, from Halifax for Barbadoes, with fish and lumber, worth $4,000 captured and sent into Newburyport, by the same.

1203. Brig Fire Fly, from Smyrna for London, with a full cargo of drugs, wines and silks, brought into Wilmington, N. C. by the Sabine of Baltimore.

☞ The privateer has safely arrived and has on board the optima spolia of the enemy's vessels she took, worth $100,000.

1204. Brig Mary and Eliza, from Halifax, laden with lumber, &c. captured by the Argo of Baltimore, and chased ashore off Buregat, where she was burnt, or "satisfactorily accounted for."

1205. Schooner ———, with a cargo of provisions, sent into an eastern port by the Portsmouth of Portsmouth, N. H.

1206. Brig Argo, from Dublin, with 100 puncheons Irish whiskey, a quantity of port wine and provisions, sent into Portland, by the Surprise of Baltimore.

1207. Brig ———, laden with rum and molasses, sent into ———, by the Grampus of Baltimore.

1208. "His Majesty's" frigate La Confiance, 39 guns, captured on Lake Champlain, by com. Macdonough!!!

1209. "His Majesty's" brig Linnet, 10 guns, captured on the same by com. Macdonough!!!

1210. "His Majesty's" sloop Chub, 11 guns, captured on the same by com. Macdonough!!!

1211. "His Majesty's" sloop Finch, 11 guns, captured on the same by com. Macdonough!!!

1212, 1213, 1214. Three of "his majesty's" galleys, of 2 great guns each, sunk in the same by com. Macdonough!!!

1215. Sloop Farmer, with provisions, captured by the Mammoth of Baltimore, off Nova Scotia and sunk.

1216. Brig Britannia, from St. Andrews for Liverpool, with lumber, captured by the same and burnt.

1217, 1218, 1219. Three other brigs in ballast, bound to Picton and Maracaibo, captured by the same and burnt.

1220. Privateer Fortune of War, 3 guns, 40 men, captured in Sapelo Sound, by two of the U. S. gun boats.

1221. East India company's ship Coronantol, of 2 guns, 65 men, from Batavia for London, with 50 tons of coffee and sugar, and 50 tons of sundries, including £,000 sterling worth of silks, &c. divested of her rich goods, and ordered into port, by the York of Baltimore.

1222. Brig Ceres, of Glasgow, with brandy, &c. divested and given up to release the prisoners, by the same.

☞ The York also captured and ordered in.

1. The brig Harvest, with flour, oil and salmon.

2. The brig William, 10 guns, 11 men, from Rio Janeiro, with 350 tons, sugar and coffee and 50 tons sundries.

3. The brig Rover, from Havana for Guernsey, laden with sugar and coffee.

4. Sloop Regulator, of Nantucket, recaptured with a handsome cargo—arrived at Chatham.

☞ The cruises of our privateers, as in a voice of thunder, tell congress how the enemy should be assailed. The prizes of the York are worth, at least, a million and a half of dollars. It is a chance if either of them arrives; and the proceeds of the cruise may be regained to the enemy, except that part of the richest spoils she is laden with. Let the navy department be directed to fit out

50 such vessels, and, during the coming winter, they will, though "Britain rules the main," sink, burn and destroy, enemy property to the value of 15 or 20 millions of dollars, perhaps. This is the way to fight the English at sea. We have reaped a full harvest of naval glory—and we should now attack the foe in the way that we can do him the most "essential injury." The York did not lose a man during her cruise! She was out 13 weeks.

1243. Brig Queen Charlotte, from St. John's for Yarmouth, divested of a few bales of goods, and destroyed by the Surprise of Baltimore.

1244. Ship Millers, 2 guns, 15 men, from Cork for Quebec, in ballast, captured by the same and burnt.

1245. Brig Lively, from Marinsche for Scotland, with lumber captured by the same and burnt.

1246. Schooner Prince Regent, from Quebec for Scotland, laden with lumber, captured by the same and burnt.

1247. Ship Doris, from Cork for Quebec, in ballast, captured by the same and burnt.

1248. Brig Willing Maid, from Cork for Marinsche, by ditto and ditto.

1249. Brig Polly, 4 guns, 15 men, from ditto for ditto, by ditto and ditto.

1250. Schooner Sally, from St. John's for Picton, by ditto and ditto.

1251. Privateer Lively, 1 gun, 17 men, captured by ditto and brought into Salem.

1252. Ship Caledonia from Cork for Quebec, with dry goods, rum, &c. worth 150,000 dollars, captured by the same, divested of goods to the value of 50,000 dollars, but afterwards retaken by the enemy.

1253, 1254, 1255, 1256, Brigs Eagle, Traveller, Wilmington (4 guns, 15 men) and Eniza, captured by the same and made carrels of or given up to release the prisoners.

1257. The Surprise also captured the Endeavor and Argo. (See Nos. 1191 and 1206.) arrived—the ship Young William, of 10 guns and 17 men, with a full cargo of bread, &c. the brig Albion with wine and fish, and schooner Charlotte Ann, with sugar and wine, which she manned and ordered in, and recaptured the boat Aim. The Surprise has arrived at Salem, with 114 packages of dry goods, besides other articles—her cruise was only of one month—prizes 20; prisoners brought in 37—released 160, total 197; tons of shipping taken 3,760. The day of her arrival she recaptured her prize the Caledonia in the bay, (she had been retaken by the prisoners) took out 60,000 dollars worth of goods and ordered her in again.

A St. John's, N. E. paper, of Sept. 8, mentions the capture of several vessels by the Surprise, and adds:

"Captain Sexton of the Endeavor, M^rFarlane of the Caledonia, and Reid, of the Millers, with their crews, were landed this morning from the brig Traveller.—They speak in the kindest terms of the politeness and attention they experienced from capt. Barnes and his officers, during the time they were on board the privateer."

1257. Transport ship Stranger, from England for Quebec, laden with 60 pieces of cannon (42 3's and 22 2's) 370 boxes ammunition, and a great quantity of blankets &c. designed for the enemy's fleet on Ontario, captured by the Fox of Portsmouth and sent into Salem. This prize is indeed, of great value.

1258, 1259, &c. Three vessels captured by the Spark of New York, off the coast of Portugal, &c. and burnt of little value, given up. Two others were manned and ordered for the United States.

1241. Ketch Expdition, with 75 pipes of wine and 1150 quintals Barilla, sent into New York by the Grampus of Baltimore.

1247. Schooner Charlotte Ann, laden with sugar, wine, &c. sent into Saco, by the Surprise of Baltimore.

1243. Schooner —, with some dry goods, &c. sent into Salem, by the Viper of that port.

1244. Brig Eclipse, from Buenos Ayres for Liverpool, laden with 17,000 hides, 16 boxes Nazi skins, 60 tons pig iron, horns and specie, armed with 14 guns, 9 pounders, sent into New York by the Chasseur Boyle, (late of the Comet) of Baltimore.

1245. Brig Catherine and William, of London, laden with dry goods, prize to the Grampus, of Baltimore, lost near Braulfort, S. C. on the 20th ult.

1246. Schooner Retrieve, with a cargo of fish, from St. John's for Martinique, captured by the Fox of Portsmouth and burnt.

1247, 1248, 1249—the Leith Backet, from Liverpool for Dublin, the William Ann from Glasgow for Glasgow, and the Peggy and Ann from Liverpool to Liverpool, captured by the United States sloop Peacock, off the coast of Ireland, and sunk.

1250. Cutter Flying Fish, with a cargo of sweet oil, &c. captured by the Sabine of Baltimore, and sent into —.

1251. Brig Araron, with wine and codfish, captured by the same, and sent into —.

1252. Brig Harvest, laden with fish, oil, &c. from Newfoundland, sent into —, by the York of Baltimore.

1253, 1254, two ships captured by the Syren, off the British coast, and destroyed.

1255, 1256. The Stady from Bordeaux to Newfoundland, and the James, from St. Jean de Luz, taken and burnt by the Prince of Neufchatel, American privateer, owned by Americans in France, and fitted out at Cherbourg.

1257. Brig Conliers, from Cork for Quebec, with a full cargo of provisions, captured by the Amelia, of Baltimore and burnt.

1258. Brig Harmony, from Alican for Newfoundland, with salt and some wine, captured by the same, divested of the latter and made a cartel of.

1259. Brig Elizabeth, from Cork for Newfoundland, captured by the same and burnt.

1260. Ship — of 8 guns, from Greenock for Newfoundland, with dry goods, coals and wine—captured by the same, divested of her dry goods, and manned and ordered into port. The Amelia also captured and ordered in the ship Neptune and brig Ann, with valuable cargoes. She had a smart fight with the Neptune, but no person hurt on either side. When last heard of she had 32 prisoners on board, who were very troublesome—as by manning the prize she had only 58 of her crew left.

1261. Princess Mary, from Limerick for Plymouth, Eng. captured by the Whig, of Baltimore, off the British coast, and burnt.

1262. Eliza, from Limerick for London, captured by the same; cargo thrown overboard, and vessel made a cartel of.

1263. Brig Stranger (which sailed in company with the Elipse, with the same destination, from, probably, a like valuable cargo) captured by the U. S. sloop Peacock, and burnt.

1264. Schooner —, captured by the Leach, of Salem, divested and given up.

1265. We expect a long list of vessels captured or destroyed on the British coasts, where there have lately been many of our privateers.

1266. "His majesty's ship Hermes, 28 guns, blown up in Mobile Bay—see gen. Jackson's official letters.

1266. Sloop Jane, 70 tons, from St. Jean de Luz for Falmouth, with lumber, captured by the privateer Prince of Neufchatel, of New York (originally fitted out in France, by some Americans at Paris, and last from Cherbourg) and burnt.

1267. Brig Liton, 137 tons, "guns, from Cadiz for London, with a cargo of coffee and wine; captured by the same, some part of the coffee taken on, and sunk.

1268. Transport brig Aaron, 142 tons, 4 guns, from Gibraltar for Lisbon in ballast, captured by the same, and burnt.

1269. Brig Apollo, 135 tons, from St. Ubes for Riga, with a cargo of salt, captured by the same and burnt.

1270. Cutter Gen. Doyle, 37 tons, captured, from Lochlain for Bristol, with a cargo of oil, captured by the same, and burnt.

1271. Ship George, 55 tons, from Milford Haven for Plymouth, with coals, captured by the same and sunk.

1272. Brig Barewick Packet, from Cork for Bristol, in ballast with 50 passengers captured by the same and made a cartel of.

1273. Brig Sibron, 200 tons, 4 guns from Greenock for Cork, in ballast, captured by the same and sunk.

1274. Brig Nymph, 150 tons, from St. Jean de Luz for Cork, with dry goods, &c. captured by the same, divested of the dry goods, the rest of her cargo thrown overboard, and given up to the prisoners.

1275. Brig Albion, 155 tons, 4 guns, from Greenock for Cork, with dry goods, &c. captured by the same, divested of her richest articles, and burnt.

1276. Ship Harmony, 290 tons, 4 guns, from Greenock for Cork, with dry goods and other valuable articles, captured by the same, divested and ordered into port. This vessel was re-captured two or three days after.

1277. Brig Charlotte, 100 tons, 8 guns, from Rio Janeiro, with a cargo of hides, captured by the same and burnt.

1278. Brig Mary Ann, 103 tons, from St. John's for Barbadoes, with a cargo of lumber, captured by the same and burnt.

1279. The Prince of Neufchatel has made several splendid cruises since the war, causing great loss to the enemy. She belongs to the estate of Mrs. Clayton of New York, but is deceased. She has been chased by 17 different men of war, during the present cruise—mounted 17 guns, is 315 tons burthen, and hermaphrodite rigged. The goods she has brought in are estimated as worth from 1 to 300,000 dollars, and it was represented she also had a large sum in specie on board. The damage done by her to the enemy during this cruise is equal to a million of dollars at least. She arrived at Boston on the 15th inst. after a desperate battle of which we have the following highly interesting account—showing it to have been one of the most splendid victories and hardest fought triumph that has been achieved since the war, for the numbers engaged.

"On the 14th, Nantucket bore N. about 1-4 miles distant from the land—discovered a frigate, off Gay Head, which gave chase and came up very fast, with a fresh breeze, while we were becalmed. At 3 P. M. we took the breeze and took the Douglas, [one of her prizes] in tow, the frigate then about 4 leagues from us. At sun set it fell calm. At 7 P. M. was obliged, on account of the current, to come to anchor about musket shot of our prize; and supposing the frigate would send her barges to attempt to capture us, called all hands to quarters and there kept them. At half past 3, P. M. a signal was made from the prize, that the barges were coming, prepared for them. Soon after discovered them and commenced firing, which they disregarded and were soon alongside—they were five in number, one on each side, one on each bow, and one on the stern. A warm action was then kept up with muskets, pistols, cutlasses, &c. and in every attack the enemy made to board, we was promptly met and repulsed. About 20 minutes after the commencement, the enemy cried out for quarters, which were granted, and then ended. Of the five barges and launches, (which contained 104 men including officers at the commencement of the action) one was sunk, (with 43 men & only of which were saved) 3 drifted off from alongside, apparently with no living man on board, and one was taken possession of. She contained 36 men at the commencement of the action, 8 of which were killed, 20 wounded, and 8 missing. It was then ascertained they were from the Endymion and were all armed with pistols, boarding pikes, muskets, cutlasses and blunderbusses. The 2d lieutenant of that frigate, (F. Ormond, who was unhurt) 3 midshipmen, 2 of which were severely wounded, and one masters' mate also wounded, were permitted to come on board, the remainder of the prisoners, (15 seamen and marines) was put in the launch astern all night, after taking out the arms, ears, &c. as the commander dare not trust them on board, having only eight men left fit for duty.

The Prince of Neufchatel had only 33 men, including officers, at quarters at the commencement of the action, and had on board 37 prisoners. After the action it was ascertained, that 6 of her crew were killed, (as well as Mr. Charles Hilburn, of Nantucket, a pilot, taken out of a fishing vessel) 15 severely wounded, 9 slightly, and 8 un hurt. The next morning the lieutenant, midshipman and master's mate, signed a paper in behalf of themselves, and even a sailor, pledging their honors, not to serve against the United States during the war, unless exchanged; and were towed ashore to Nantuxet in the launch, by the Prince of Neufchatel's boat. Shortly after, captain Ordreux sent 15 of his other prisoners and his fifteen severely wounded men also on shore, and placed the former at the disposal of the marshal, as he did not care to trust them on board in his then enfeebled situation and soon after got under weigh.

The Prince of Neufchatel has brought in 140 bales, 164 boxes, and 156 barrels of dry goods, 23 cases and 170 boxes sweet oil, and a large quantity of coffee, rice and various other articles, and 20 passengers. (She arrived at Boston, Oct. 10, 1852.)

On the 7th inst. further, 4 persons from Nantuxet, that the British acknowledge a loss of 35 killed, 37 wounded, and 39 prisoners among the killed was the first lieutenant of the Frigate Union, and a masters mate, the 3d lieutenant, 2 masters mates and 1 midshipman wounded. The commander of the frigate said he had lost as many men as he should have done if engaged with a vessel equal to his own, and gave great credit to the officers and crew of the privateer, for their gallant deed. They had 111 men in the attack— one of them was wounded by twenty eight musket balls! They said that a part of their men succeeded in gaining the deck of the Prince of Neufchatel, but that the Americans yet rallied and drove them off-board!

1270. Ship Dolphin, 15 guns, from Jamaica for England, captured by the same and run ashore on Nantuxet, where the cargo was saved. It consisted of 421 hbls, 2 tierces of 1 hbl, sugar; 190 puncheons rum; 6 hbls molasses; 25; bales cotton; 422 bags coffee; 3 bales ginger, and 8 logs of mahogany.

1280. Brig Stary, 17 tons, 4 guns, of Hull, from London and from St. Johns, N. F. with provisions and bale goods—captured by the same and divested of the dry-goods and burnt.

All the prizes of the Prince of Neufchatel were made in the British and Irish channels, one or two excepted: She also made another 1 tier of marque brig strike, but let her go without taking possession; being engaged in securing a part of the Harmony's cargo; some suspicious vessel was also in sight.

1301. Ship Neptune, from Gloucester for Newfoundland, 40 tons, 8 guns, captured by the Anchra, of Baltimore, and sent into New-York, her cargo consists of 322 tons sea-coal; 128 boxes, 19 cases, 6 baulds, 4 bales, 3 trunks, 2 hbls, and 1 hamper dry goods; 34 hbls, claret 15 pipes of gin; 10 pipes wine; 60 barrels of pork; 50 du. breif 48 coils of rope, and 20 barrels of flour.

1287, 1-83, 1234, 1235, 1286, 1287. Six boats, with 37 armed men captured by a gig of the United States ship Superior, with six men, on lake Ontario; laden with wine, brandy, crates, &c. These boats would not have been mentioned but for the value of their cargo, which is estimated at 2,500 dollars.

1283. Schooner Ann, with sugar and molasses, from Halifax for the new British port of Castine, captured and sent into— as follows: When she sailed, she had on board 4 American seamen, who shipped in Halifax; and when off the mouth of the Penobscot, they rose upon the capt. and remainder of the crew, (6 in number,) confined them below, secured all the fire arms on board, and arrived in safety.

1289. Brig Susan and Jane, from Halifax for Sidney, captured by the Fox of Portsmouth, and burnt.

1290. Ship Jawes, from London for Quebec, with dry-goods, &c. captured by the Portsmouth, of Portsmouth, and divested of 250 bales and cases of goods valued at from 2 to 300,000 dollars, and then ordered in. The privateer, with her rich spoils, has safely arrived. The cargo of the Jawes was invoiced at 100,000 pounds sterling. She has since arrived at Portsmouth, N. H.

On the sale of the goods at Durham, captured by the Portsmouth on her former cruise (says a Boston paper) amounted to, over 19,000 dollars and allowing the goods she now brought in, to averages much in the sale as those at Durham, (and there is no doubt they will more, as they are better adapted to the season) they will amount to upwards of 362,000, thus netting to the owners and all concerned in that vessel, upwards of 552,000 dollars, in the short space of thirty-three days.

1291. Brig —, captured by the Dash of Portland, and divested of 150 hbls. rum, and given up. The Dash has arrived at Wiscasset, to keep us in spirits.

1292. Schooner —, from Halifax, laden with salmon and herrings, sent into Wilmington, N. C. by a letter of marque schooner from that port.

 We have about forty additional vessels for lists, which must lie over for the next insertion.

Brown and Chauncey.

Copy of a letter from major-general Brown, to commodore Chauncey, dated Head-Quarters, Buffalo, Sept. 4, 1814.

SIR—Your letter of the 10th ult. after going the rounds, was delivered to me a few days since, on my way to this place.

The exception you take at my letter to the secretary, would be very reasonable and proper, provided the fleet of lake Ontario was your private property, over which the government had no control. But as I have been induced to believe that it was the property of the nation, subject to the orders of the government; and as the government led me to believe that the fleet under your command would be upon lake Ontario, to co-operate with my division of the army, the first week in July, I have deemed it right and proper to let the nation know, that the support I had a right to expect was not afforded.

I consider my conduct towards yourself and the navy, as not only honorable, but, sir, as being very liberal and friendly, from the date of my report of the battle at Sackett's Harbor to the present hour. The troops under my command have always been disposed of so as to meet your views to the extent of my power and authority; and as far as was consistent with the rights and the honor of the army.

Your information appears very incorrect as to the situation of the army previous to the arrival of reinforcements with it, gen. Drummond. From the 10th of July to the 24th, the whole country was in our power from St. George to Burlington Heights; and could the army have been supplied with provisions from the depots provided on the shores of lake Ontario, we should not have doubted our ability (without reinforcements or additional guns) to carry the Heights: when we could have returned upon Forts George and Niagara, or advanced upon Kingston, (as might have been thought most advisable) with the co-operation of the fleet.

You speak of responsibility. I do not desire you, or any man, to be responsible for me. I have endeavored to execute the orders given me; success has not attended my endeavors; but I humbly trust in Heaven that the honor of the brave men entrusted to my command has been and will be preserved, let what may happen.

It will be very difficult to retire from Fort Erie, pressed as the remains of my gallant little army are, by a superior force of the enemy. But no other alternative will be left us, unless reinforcements speedily arrive. The militia are coming in in very considerable numbers, but it is not yet ascertained how many of them will cross. The secretary has given me so understand, that general Izard would move to the St. Lawrence, with a view of attacking Kingston, (should he and you deem that measure advisable.) Should you decide otherwise, that general Izard would come with, or send to me a reinforcement of from two to three thousand men.

I have not heard from general Izard, and begin to apprehend that something has occurred to retard or prevent his movement. I will thank you for any information you can give me on this subject.

I am, sir, with great consideration and respect, your most obedient servant,

JAC. BROWN,

Commodore Isaac Chauncey.

Events of the War.

MISCELLANEOUS.

ENGLISH NEWS.—We have, via Halifax, London dates of Aug. 25, one vessel of a fleet of 38 sail (including 8 transports with 2000 troops for Quebec) had arrived at Halifax, being separated in a gale.—It is stated, that lord Hill was expected to sail from Cork about the 15th of Sept. with a force of from 15 to 20,000 men. Some of the regiments that are to accompany him are designated. That the British envoys were expected from Ghent; in consequence of which the stocks had experienced considerable depression. Some great mercantile houses, and extensive dealers in stock, have failed. An order from lord Bathurst's office, prohibits all Americans from returning to that country in British packets without permission. British goods are a mere drug, apparently sacrificing for much less than prime cost, throughout the continent of Europe, and also in India.

BRITISH MANUFACTURES are not received on the continent much more abundantly now, than when Buonaparte's "continental system" was at its height. France utterly refuses them; Germany will export rather than import, and the industry or poverty of other countries, refuses to receive them in competition, or is unable to meet the payment of them.

BRITISH DISGRACE. The result of the expedition to Plattsburg, excites great sensibility in Canada—the papers teem with bold censures on the conduct of Sir George Prevost—the army, in the plainest and fullest meaning of the word, was disgraced; more pitifully disgraced than any part of our forces ever has been, the affair at Detroit not excepted. If such a disaster had happened us, what a clamor would have been raised about the incompetency of our generals and of our government to carry on the war, by men who feel sorry to notice the "retrograde movement" of "Wellington's invincibles!"

We have laid by and shall publish Sir George's "official" story of the matter—it is a queer article. He would make us believe, if we could believe his tale, that he had great difficulty to prevent his troops from capturing Maccomb's whole force in rather less time than the "twinkling of an eye!"—but that, for some strangely-magnanimous purpose, he permitted us to retain for further use, the great quantities of ordnance and stores deposited at Plattsburg. Now, this was very clever in Sir George. Nay, so considerate was he, that at the very moment we were about to give up our fortifications, and our immense train of artillery, he "thought it necessary to restrain the ardor of his troops!" Risum teneatis amici?

The articles that have appeared on this subject in the Canadian papers are very interesting, and shall also be inserted. The writers dolefully complain that such a formidable expedition should have been so ignominiously foiled, by a handful of regulars and a few militia, they affected so much to despise.—When it is known that Sir George thought he might march to ALBANY when he started from Canada, and was compelled to run back from Plattsburg at the very onset of his career, we may judge of the deep mortification that afflicts the "invincibles." One of these writers says—"Would that a veil could be drawn over the scene on shore! but it must afford a sad tale in the page of British history." Another observes—"The retreat from Burgos was disastrous, but witnesses to both are induced to believe it not so much so as the one under immediate view [from Plattsburg] which cannot fall short of 75 or £100,000 sterling, in stores, &c. In men no one dare mention. His wounded sensibility reminds him he is a British soldier unwilling to tell too sad tales."

To crown the tough stories, one fellow, making out a left-handed victory for the British, puts down their whole loss at 170 men! Maccomb gives it at 2,500. Now, though it may appear strange to some, I would as soon believe Maccomb as the prince regent himself!—perhaps rather sooner!! But as the writer quoted above observes, of the loss "in men no one [Englishman] dare make mention."

Maccomb's general order (page 44) must have stung the presuming enemy to the soul. It is a fine composition, and one of the severest lampoons on Sir George and his army that we ever saw, having its merits in a combination of ridiculous facts belonging to the approach and retreat of the British army.

REINFORCEMENTS. The officers of the valuable ship James, lately captured by the Portsmouth privateer, stated they had formed part of a convoy which sailed from Spithead, September 1st, with 3000 troops on board, from which they had parted in a gale. Lord Hill had not then sailed.

ROSS AND PARKER. The bodies of major general Ross, and captain sir Peter Parker, of the navy, killed on the Chesapeake, were brought to Halifax, in the Tonnant, preserved in spirits. The former was buried there with military honors—the latter sent to England for interment.

"DEMONSTRATION on Baltimore." The quizzical account of the enemy's attack (which he calls a "demonstration," on Baltimore,) was inserted in our last. "The primary object of the expedition was accomplished," says the account—we suppose this was to have general Ross and at least 500 men killed and wounded, on land, and in the attack by water, to expend 1800 bombs, about 30,000lb. of powder, besides a multitude of rockets and round shot; and to be wretchedly mauled when their courage or enterprize led them within range of our brave little fort, at which they threw one hundred and sixty tons of iron and stuff. This is by fair calculation—say 160 tons! All this, to "demonstrate" the strength of the place.

FLYING DESTRUCTION. There is a bill now before the senate designed, I hope, to meet a favorite idea held out in the REGISTER for the last two years—which is to fit out, in the best possible manner, some 30 or 50 small vessels—"Baltimore flyers"—of from 6 to 12 guns, having from 50 to 100 men, to attack the commerce, nay, the very COASTING TRADE of the enemy; and make him feel, as he ought, the superior skill, enterprize and gallantry of our seamen. Without saying more than we can do; let us shew Europe, that Britain, who pretends to blockade the whole world at will, cannot defend her own coasts. The effect of this demonstration will be exceedingly powerful, as well on the interests of the enemy as on the opinions of the continent; and may essentially contribute to strengthen a prevailing opposition to the enemy's unlawful and haughty principle of blockade. By referring to the "prize list" inserted in the present number, some calculation may be made of the probable consequences of adopting the plan. Imagine that 50 vessels, such as many famous on our lists, fitted out in perfect trim for sailing, and charged not to make prizes or lumber themselves with goods, so as to impede their progress were sent to fly around the British coasts—to attack all things "assailable," and fly off and on, with the rapidity that belongs to them—laughing at the heavier vessels of the enemy and beating all of equal force (as they would do)—and say, what the probable effect would be? During the coming winter they might destroy one thousand vessels at least, and perhaps not more than five or six of them be taken. And this may be done without much fighting. Several of our privateers have taken 15 or 20 prizes in twice as many days, without firing a gun, or losing a single man during their cruise. As national vessels, they may enter the French and other ports, to deposit prisoners and light rich spoils collected—or may "quarter on the enemy" altogether for the whole season—from the ships they take supplying themselves with provisions and water, or by occasionally landing on some of the numerous islands, or unfrequented parts of the coast of Scotland or Ireland; on which there are hundreds of towns, as important as Havre-de-grace, that one of these vessels might burn, if they shall so be directed; though, to destroy a village, here, is the business of a vice-admiral.

The London M. Chronicle raves at the American sloop of war Peacock sailing round Ireland with impunity and making captures. It says the Irish ports are in a state of Blockade.

NEW NOTIONS.—We are indebted to the gallantry of our army and navy, for the opinion conveyed in

The following article from the Halifax Journal:—"We will venture to say that lord Wellington could not march from Plattsburg to New York, with less than 30,000 men."

CHARLESTON.—We are happy to observe that many troops from the interior have arrived at Charleston, S. C. for the defence of that city. The fortifications have been wonderfully strengthened, and the fire of revolution burns bright among its patriotic inhabitants. The old leaven of resistance has excited the whole to animation.

TREASON.—A certain Tyler Porter Shaw, charged with high treason, being on his way from Ipswich to Boston, under charge of a deputy marshal, was rescued at Wenham by a mob of "peace party" men. If this had happened in Baltimore!—The marshal has offered 300$ reward for his apprehension.

SPIES. A person has been taken up at New-York, as a spy. He had an old British commission in his pocket, and was committed. Two British officers, lieutenants in the navy, were arrested at Saybrook, Conn. They stated they were a part of the 24 hostages sent from Pittsfield to Lancaster, and had been exchanged. They remain in custody of the marshal, who has taken the proper steps to ascertain their true character.

Gen. Brown. The common council of New-York, has passed the following resolve:

Resolved, That as a tribute of respect, to a gallant officer and his intrepid associates, who have added such lustre to our arms, the freedom of the city be presented in a gold box to general Jacob Brown; that his portrait be obtained and placed in the Gallery of Portraits belonging to this city, and that the thanks of this corporation be tendered to the officers and men under his command.

COLUMBIA RIVER. We learn by way of Barbadoes, that the Raccoon sloop of war, after parting with the Platbe and Cherub in the South sea, proceeded to the Columbia river, on the N. W. coast—which establishment (we suppose) she broke up. It is stated that she had captured some American vessels in those seas. The Raccoon had 21 men wounded by an accidental explosion, seven of whom died; she also struck on a bar and was considerably damaged.

SPAIN. The story that Spain has declared war against the United States is reiterated in accounts from Pensacola. We care not if it be true. This much is pretty certain, that we shall make war on Spain, so far as to expel the British allied force from Pensacola. A Kingston (Jam.) article of September 7th, states, that general Balesteros with 10,000 men had sailed from Cadiz for Santa Martha. General Capons was ready to embark with 20,000 Spanish and Portuguese troops for Louisiana, and that general Lacy was shortly after to leave Spain with an equal number of men for La Plata and Chili.

To which, however, we attach no belief. The transportation of fifty thousand men is immensely beyond the means of Spain.

NEW-YORK. The following resolution passed both houses of the legislature of New-York, on the 22nd Oct. Resolved, unanimously, That the house of assembly of the state of New-York, view with mingled emotions of surprise and indignation, the extravagant and disgraceful terms proposed by the British commissioners at Ghent—and however ardently they may desire the restoration of peace to their country, they can never consent to receive it at the sacrifice of national honor and dignity—that they therefore strongly recommend to the national legislature, the adoption of the most vigorous and efficacious measures in the prosecution of the war, as the best means of bringing the contest to an honorable termination, and of transmitting unimpaired to their posterity their rights, liberty and independence.

Resolved, That the concurrence of the honorable the senate be requested to the above resolution, and that in case of such concurrence, his excellency the governor be requested to transmit a certified copy of said resolution to the president of the United States.

☞ The assembly adjourned on the 24th, after passing several laws of great importance, generally on the principles recommended by the governor (see his speech page 97.) Among them are—

An act to raise 12,000 men, to be paid, clothed and subsisted by the United States. The men are to be raised by an equal classification, and are intended as a permanent force to relieve the militia.

An act to provide for the payment of certain monies advanced by the city of New-York, for the defence of the state.

An act to prevent the apprehension of British deserters—inserted in our last.

An act to authorise the raising of two regiments of free men of colour.

An act to give additional pay to the volunteers and militia who have been in service the last summer.

An act authorising the incorporation of the associations for the purpose of fitting out privateers.

An act to aid the apprehension of deserters from the army and navy of the United States.

An act to raise a corps of Sea-Fencibles.

When these laws are carried into effect, the state of New-York will have a permanent force of 20,000 men.

OUR ARTILLERY. The enemy has often been astounded with our artillery, as well on the land as at sea. They thought we had French artilleryists at Plattsburg. A Buffalo article of Sept. 10, says:—"After the sortie of the 17th, the British officers, prisoners, in conversation with some American officers, stated their astonishment that we should employ French artillerymen: that our chief engineer was known to the whole British army, and that he was from Paris. They said it was impossible that the artillery could be so good without old experienced officers to command. The American officers replied that the chief engineer and artilleryists were native Americans, and that they were young men, neither exceeding twenty-five years. The British officers were thunderstruck, and thought it impossible, that young men could be so scientific in war, and could not believe what was told them, until colonel McCree's engineers and maj. Hindman's artillery were pointed out to them; they then said, you are very superior to us. You proved it in the siege, and the whole British army fear and respect your discipline. So much for the confession of the enemy."

WASHINGTON CITY.—We understand that a committee of a meeting of the citizens of this city (says the National Intelligencer) is authorised to make to the secretary of war an offer of the voluntary service of the citizens in executing any project or works of defence which the department may decide on.

We are well informed also, that the banks of this vicinity, together with individuals, are contemplating, and will doubtless offer, a loan to the government for the purpose of re-building or erecting the necessary buildings for the accommodation of congress, the president and public offices, &c.

THE POTOMAC.—We understand (says the Alexandria Herald) that a deserter from the Euryalus frigate, taken below, informs that she had 5 of her crew killed and 7 wounded in passing over her battery on the Potomac, if this is correct their aggregate loss must be considerable, as she sustained but a very inconsiderable part of the firing from the batteries.

MONITORIAL.—The Western Monitor, printed at Lexington, Kentucky, says, what indeed the history of all past ages proclaims, that "the invasion of the enemy, in every wise state, has ever been considered as a signal for terminating the contests of party, and uniting its powers for self-defence; and this is the never-failing effect of invasion, if the state or nation is not ripe for ruin."

AN EMBARGO on provisions has been laid at Quebec, to continue until January—When the ice will stop the export, if not sooner.

SIR GEORGE PREVOST.—There is a monstrous clamor in Canada against the commander-in-chief—a strong party is getting up a petition to the prince regent for his removal. A counter petition is also circulated.

FEMALE PATRIOTISM.—A number of ladies of the first distinction in New York have formed themselves into an association to supply the citizens engaged in military duties, particularly on the lakes, with "cloth hoods, mockasons, socks and mittens."

PROCLAMATION by the commander-in-chief of New Brunswick.—"Whereas divers persons have come to Moose-Island since its surrender to his majesty's arms, claiming property on the same. I think it necessary hereby to declare, that no title can be given to the land and standing property of said Island in the way of barter or exchange, until the pleasure of his royal highness the prince regent is made known on the subject."

SAVANNAH.—The British off the southern coast have expressed a determination to burn Savannah; in obedience to Cochrane's orders to destroy all places "assailable." The people of that city have made an eloquent appeal to the "Georgians" for succor. We trust it will be effectual to repulse the incendiary. The legislature of Georgia was called by proclamation of the governor, to meet at Milledgeville on the 17th inst.

BRITISH TROOPS.—From the Boston Patriot.—It appears that since the arrival of the large division of British troops in Canada from Bordeaux, there has scarcely a week elapsed but what there have been arrivals of smaller detachments at Quebec, from England and Ireland. In the two last weeks in September, about 1500 arrived. There has been a regular but noiseless introduction of troops; and the fact must occasion some anxiety.

It appears that the U. S. Corvette John Adams, spoke on the 1st of Sept. a convoy from Portsmouth for Cork, with troops. At Cork the new expedition for America was to rendezvous, and may be expected to sail early in Sept. probably too late to proceed to Quebec—and therefore must be expected to act elsewhere.

GENERAL PORTER. From the Ontario Messenger. The following interesting particulars of the extraordinary adventure and escape of major-general PORTER, in the action of the 17th ult. at the batteries, we have received from our correspondent at Fort Erie, who was in the action.

General Porter's command on that day, consisted of two columns. The right column was to attack the batteries in the rear. The left, which was stationed directly back of it, was kept in reserve to meet the reinforcements which were expected from the enemy's main army. General Porter was with the right column until the block-house and third battery were carried; he then set out accompanied by only two or three persons, to go to the left column, where some skirmishing had already commenced with the reinforcements. He had proceeded but a short distance in the woods, when he found himself within a few yards of a party of 60 or 80 of the enemy who had just emerged from a ditch, and who, discovering probably that our troops were in their rear, stood formed in two lines, with their arms at rest, apparently hesitating which way to go, or how to act. General P. finding himself within their power, and seeing that the occasion required resolution and decision, instantly left his company, and running to them with the greatest boldness, exclaimed, "that's right, my good fellows, surrender, and we will take care of you!"—and coming up to the man on the left, he took his musket out of his hand and threw it on the ground, at the same time pushing him forward towards the fort. In this way he proceeded nearly through the first line, most of the men voluntarily throwing down their arms and advancing to the front, when on a sudden a soldier whose musket he was about to take, stepped back and presenting his bayonet to general P's breast, demanded his surrender. The general seized the musket and was wresting it from him, when he was assaulted by an officer who stood next in the ranks, and three or four soldiers, who, after a short scuffle, brought him to the ground. He however soon recovered his feet, when he found himself surrounded by 15 or 20 men with their guns presented to him, demanding his surrender. By this time several of our officers were advancing with their men to the scene of action, and general P. assuming an air of composure and decision, told the enemy that they were surrounded and prisoners, and that if they fired a gun they should all be put to the sword. Without venturing to fire, they still continued to vociferate, "surrender, you are my prisoner," when lieutenant Chyfffield, of the Cayuga riflemen, who had got near the spot, ordered his men to fire. This drew their attention from the general, and after a momentary scene of confusion and carnage, the enemy were all either killed or taken prisoners. In this affair captain Knapp of the N. Y. Volunteers, was badly wounded by a musket ball in the side, and general Porter in the hand by the cut of a sword.

DISTRICT GENERAL ORDERS. Head-Quarters, Camp before Fort Erie, 7th September, 1814. Major-general de Watteville having been directed to detach a party yesterday evening to endeavor to cut off the enemy's picket No. 4. reports that this service was executed by a company of the 6th regiment and one of the Glengary light infantry, joined by infantry pickets at Platows and the detachment of the 19th dragoons under captain Eustace, the whole under the command of captain Patterson of the 6th regiment and conducted by captain Powell, deputy assistant quarter-master general.

The enemy's picket was surprised at day light this morning. Of its advance party, which consisted of 21 men and an officer, not one escaped; 14 including the officer being killed, and 7 wounded and taken prisoners. The main body of the pickets fled towards the forts, pursued by our troops close under the guns of the place, and must have suffered very considerably from our fire. Our loss has been only one killed, (private 6th) and one slightly wounded.

The conduct of this little enterprize reflects great credit, not only on captain Patterson commanding the detachment, not only the whole of the officers and soldiers of which it was composed, but on captain Powell, deputy assistant quarter master general, by whom the enterprize was planned. Sergeant Powell, 19th light dragoons, has been named to the lieutenant general as having again distinguished himself on this occasion.

J. HARVEY, lieut. col. Dep. Adj. Gen.

Internal Revenue. By a report received by the house of representatives a few days ago from Samuel H. Smith, then acting secretary of the treasury, it appears that the aggregate amount of internal duties assessed, on the 10th October, 1814, to have been received by the collectors, were as follows:

DIRECT TAX.

By the collectors	721,420 07
By the assessing states	1,158,796 83
	1,880,216 90

INTERNAL DUTIES.

Received by the collectors	1,491,385 63
	3,371,602 53

British Fulshood. A Quebec paper states, that in the action on lake Champlain, the American fleet was driven for shelter under our batteries, by cannon. Downie; that the British flag ship struck on a sunken rock in rounding to for the purpose of lying her broadside to the American commodore; and that the Linnet (the enemy's 2d vessel) grounded in going in action.

The loss on board the Confidence is given at nearly 150 killed and wounded.

BARBAROUS. Frankfort, Maine, Sept. 23. "Capt. Tobias Oakman, seeing the alarmed situation of the inhabitants, with true patriotic zeal flew to meet the enemy—happening to be placed on earth on the morning of the action at Hampden, the enemy came suddenly upon him in the fog, and made him prisoner. They attempted to force him to take a gun, but he declined—he was then placed in front of their army, and attempting to escape from them, was shot dead by a ball, which fractured his skull. He lay two days unburied; after which his body was interred by the inhabitants of Hampden."—Hallowell Advocate.

AMERICANISM. The writer of the following was a colonel in the revolution. At the breaking out of the present war he was offered a brigadier general's commission, by president Madison, which he declined. In private character and public standing he was one of the first men in North Carolina.

Raleigh, October 17, 1814.

Sir—It is known to you that at an early period of the present war with Great Britain, I was appointed to an high and honorable command in the army of the United States. It is also within your knowledge as well as that of many other of my fellow citizens, the reasons which influenced me in the non-acceptance of that appointment.

Having discharged no small portion of that duty which every citizen owes to his country, in a service of seven years in the revolutionary army, having subsequently performed the duties of a laborious office under the general government, being somewhat advanced in life, the fire of youth and with it ambition having ceased to exist, I had determined some time past not again to engage in public employment and particularly in the army—long since having known, that to avoid slander and the reproaches of bad and ambitious men, was to live unsolved, and that to enjoy peaceful repose was to be a private citizen. This determination would have been scrupulously and finally adhered to had I not seen the degrading conditions demanded by the British commissioners from the American government as the price of peace—conditions as new as they are humiliating; in a boissable and circumstances far more perilous than the present, and such as no American ought to accede to. And whilst these terms are contended for and made the sine qua non to an adjustment of our differences, I hesitate not to declare my intention to unite with and support the government in such a system, as shall compel the enemy to respect our rights and bring the war to an honorable termination. In making this declaration, it is not, however, to be understood, that the avowed cause for the war or the manner in which it has been conducted, have ever met my approbation. My objections are well known, and in this communication it is unnecessary if not improper to state them. The crisis has arrived when it would be useless to enquire what were the causes or who were the authors of the misfortunes which have overtaken the country. It is enough to know that dishonorable conditions have been demanded, and that danger does exist. It now behoves us to show to the world that there is firmness enough in the nation to reject the one and spirit sufficient to meet the other.

With these sentiments I offer to your excellency my services, inefficient as they are, with a hope that you will employ them in that situation which you may deem them most useful.

With sentiments of much respect, I am your most obdt. servt.

WILLIAM POLK.

His Excellency William Hawkins,
Governor, of N. C.

PUBLIC FEELINGS. We are laying up, and sometime hence may publish a great variety of articles to shew the public feeling as to the propositions, &c. at Ghent. However strange it may appear, writers in the Boston newspapers are laboring "with might and main" to shew that we may subscribe to the British conditions without sacrificing our honor—and insisting that we ought to do it. We were not prepared for this—yet we do not believe the people of Massachusetts are ready to surrender one third of their territory.

The publication of the papers connected with the negotiations at Ghent is powerfully "separating the wheat from the tares," and bringing about a real union of honest men. But "an angel from Gabriel's bosom," would not reform the manners of the faction; which I have once before likened to the culprit soldier, who being flogged by an Irish drummer, cried out, "a little higher if you please, sir—a little lower, if you please, sir"—until the latter, wearied with his exclamations, said "By—let me strike where I will there is no such thing as pleasing you." Some grumble because the whole of the despatches and instructions are not published—and, in the part that remains, they insinuate is contained vastly important things, favorable to the enemy; while others are vociferous because they were published at all.—There is "no such thing as pleasing" these men by any measure that may shew the justice and moderation of their own government, or the rapacity and ambition of England; and he is a fool that attempts it.

ORDERS FROM GOVERNMENT. We understand, have been received in town this morning, prohibiting the cartel, which is soon to sail from this port for England, from receiving a passenger on board, either American citizens, or British subjects.

New-York paper.

MILITARY.

Governor Tompkins, agreeably to the request of the general government, arrived at New-York, on the 20th Oct. to take command at that post. He has under him about 17,000 militia and 3,000 regulars, besides the New-Jersey line, a numerous and gallant body of men.

Buffalo, Oct. 18.—Brig. gen. James Miller, has left the northern army and gone on to Boston, there being, as we understand, no command, for the general in this army at present.

A Frankfort, Ky. paper says—We understand that the secretary at war has ordered 2500 of the drafted militia of this state to be marched to general Jackson, and to be placed under his command without delay.

Tennessee. A letter to the editor of the Register, from an intelligent friend at Nashville says, "Besides the requisition of the president, 2000 mounted men have tendered their services and marched for head quarters—a new requisition has been made for 5000 more, so that from 12 to 14,000 men will join Jackson from Tennessee alone. It is presumed we shall have hot work about Mobile and New Orleans this winter."

A Nashville paper says "government have received advices that the enemy intend the conquest of Louisiana."

If he attempts it, we venture to say that the people of the west will not let him hold peaceable possession as they do in the east. Such a proclamation as sir John Sherbrooke's (see page 117) would be replied to by 40,000 rifles and muskets, at a very short notice.

Nagara frontier and Ontario. We are yet without any news of importance from that quarter.—There has been some skirmishing on the Chippewa; and on the 19th general Bissel forced the pass with the loss of 68 men, 14 of whom were killed; Izard's main force moved forward the next day. He has lately received some handsome reinforcements. General Winder and colonel Fenwick are among the officers that have crossed to join him. General Brown has gone to take command at Sackett's harbor. We have nothing new respecting the fleets on Ontario. Brown's army has joined Izard's force, a few left at fort Erie excepted.

NAVAL.

The greater part of our fleet on Champlain has been laid up. There is a report that the enemy has commenced the building of two other large vessels at the Isle aux Noix.

Several enemy barges entered the harbor of Brookhaven (L. I.) on the 30th ult. and carried off six small vessels, unresisted.

The Canadian editors rate commodore Yeo's new ship at 104 guns.

The Lawrence, of Baltimore, lately sailed from North Carolina, to cruise in the English channel.

A good prize on Ontario.—On the 30th Sept. a gig belonging to the Superior with an officer and 4 men only, captured near the mouth of the St. Lawrence, 6 boats manned with 35 men (armed) laden with wine, brandy, crates and dry goods, bound to Kingston, and brought them safe into the harbor; the men were paroled and landed soon after capture—the boats and their cargoes were estimated at $12,000.

Lake Huron.—Two of our sch's (says the Albany Argus) the Tygress and Scorpion, with their crews of 57 men, have been surprised and captured by the enemy in lake Huron. The enemy consisted of 130 soldiers, 20 sailors and 250 Indians. Three of our men escaped at the bay of Quinti, crossed lake Ontario in a canoe, and landed at Genesee river.

Grumbling.—An English paper of the 26th of July says "The French chasseur maree Maria Lucie, from L'Orient, has arrived at Plymouth, having on board the remaining part of the Reindeer's crew, carried into that port by the Wasp U. States sloop of war, which was put under quarantine until the following morning, when a number of French officers came off to remedy her defects. Every possible attention was paid to her wants, and she was regularly supplied with fresh beef. Two American midshipmen, one master's mate, and 17 wounded men, were taken into the hospital, and the American crew received every civility, while the British were treated with contempt and insult. A deputy American consul (a Frenchman) struck the master of an English sch. for merely asking him a simple question! The treatment of the British on board the Wasp was very indulgent, in every respect, except that the men were shackled both hands and feet. The crew of the Wasp confessed that their compliment in the late action amounted to 210, among whom are several Englishmen, some of which are personally known to the people of the Reindeer. Previous to the Wasp's getting into L'Orient, she burnt a brig, from Oporto to London, with wine, and scuttled a schooner called the Polly, of Plymouth, from Leghorn to London, laden with oil. Our blood glows with indignation at narrating the shameful conduct of the French, and we feel confident that it will not escape notice in the proper quarter. The most ample apology should be required and made for it, with promises to avoid such behaviour in future.

Another account says, they (the British prisoners) were indifferently received by the French; while the American crew were hailed as victors, tapped on the back, shaken by the hand, and complimented for their superior prowess. ¶ We really hope that, for this treatment, capt. Blakeley may not be suspected of being under "French influence!"

The papers also state that nothing "could exceed the politeness of captain Blakeley," to the crew of the Reindeer—they also speak "of the brutality and insolence of his crew," but say that capt. B. was "completely master of his ship." An Englishman may reconcile these statements as well as he can—we cannot. If Blakeley was "polite" and the "master of his ship," they certainly were politely used.—They add, that the crew of the Reindeer were "remarkably fine young men, and had sailed together six years and upwards." To cap the story they affirm, that "at least two thirds of the crew of the Wasp were Scotchmen and Irishmen"—That's a good one! But it suits the nature of John Bull's skull.

Congress of the United States.

IN SENATE.

Friday, October 28. The Senate resumed, as in committee of the whole, the consideration of the bill authorizing the president to cause to be built or purchased the vessels therein described. After some discussion and amendment, the bill was ordered to be read a third time in the following form:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America, in congress assembled; That in addition to the present naval establishment, the president of the United States be, and he is hereby authorized to cause to be built or purchased, manned, equipped and officered, any number of vessels, not exceeding _____, which, in his opinion, the public service may require, to carry not less than _____ nor more than _____ guns each, and to be manned, equipped and officered, in the manner which he shall judge most expedient.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That for the building or purchase and equipping of these vessels, the sum of _____ dollars, and the same is hereby appropriated, to be paid out of any money in the treasury not otherwise appropriated.

And the Senate adjourned to Monday.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

The following were the yeas and nays in the house of representatives, on Tuesday last, on the question to increase the direct tax 100 per cent.

YEAS—Messrs. Alexander, Anderson, Avery, Harbour, Baird, Barnett, Bowen, Brown, Burwell, Butler, Caldwell, Cannon, Clappell, Clark, Clifton, Constock, Condict, Connel, Crawford, Crichton, Crouch, Culbert, Dana, Davis of Penn. Rich, Ringgold, Robertson, Sage, Seybert, Sharp, Smith, of Virg. Strong, Tannehill, Taylor, Telfair, Truitt, Ureux, Ward of N. J. Wilson, of Penn. and Yancy—89.

NAYS—Messrs. Baylies of Mass. Bradbury, Brigham, Caperton, Cooper, Culpepper, Davenport, Franklin, Gaston, Goldsborough, Hale, Horlbert, Jackson, of R. I. King of Mass. Lovett, Macon, Moffitt, Markell, Pearson, Pickering, Pitkin, Post, Potter, John Reed, Ruggles, Schreiman, Shipyard, Smith of N. Y. Stanford, Sturges, Taggart, Thompson, Vose, Ward of Mass. Wheaton, White and Wilcox—37.

Wednesday, October 26. The house resumed the consideration of the additional tax proposed on whiskey.

Mr. Fisk's motion to levy upon it a tax of 25 cents per gallon was lost—67 to 74. He then moved to insert twenty instead of the fifteen cents, reported by the committee of the whole, which was carried as follows.

YEAS—Messrs. Anderson, Avery, Barnett, Baylies of Mass. Bigelow, Boyd, Bradbury, Bradley, Brigham, Butler, Clappell, Ciley, Constock, Condict, Connel, Cooper, Crouch, Dana, Davenport, Denoyelles, Ely, Evans, Fisk, of Vt. Fisk of N. Y. Forsythe, Gaston, Gholson, Grosvenor, Hale, Hawes, Horlbert, Ingersoll, Irving, Jackson of R. I. Kennedy, Kent, of N. Y. King of Mass. King, of N. C. Lefferts, Lovett, Lowndes, Potter, Moore, Musley, Markell, Nelson, Pickering, Pitkin, Post, Potter, John Reed, Wm. Reed, Rich, Robertson, Ruggles, Sage, Seybert, Sherwood, Skinner, Smith of N. Y. Strong, Sturges, Taggart, Taylor, Telfair, Truitt, Vose, Ward, of Mass. Ward, of N. J. Welser, Wheaton, Wilcox, Wilson, of Mass. Winter, and Wright—75.

NAYS—Messrs. Alexander, Alston, Barnoor, Baird, Bayly, of Vt. Bowen, Brown, Burwell, Calhoun, Cannon, Clark, Clifton, J. Crawford, Crichton, Culpeper, Culbert, Davis, of Penn. Desha, Duvall, Earle, Eppes, Farrow, Forsythe, Franklin, Geddes, Glasgow, Goodwyn, Griffin, Hall, Harris, Hasbrouck, Hawkins, Hubbard, Humphreys, Hungerford, Ingham, Jackson, of Virg. Johnson of Ky. Kent, of Md. Kerr, Kershaw, Kilbourne, Law, Lewis, Lyle, Macon, McCoy, McKee, McLean, Montgomery, Newton, Ormsby, Pearson, Pickens, Piper, Pleasant, Rhea, of Tenn. Ringgold, Sevier, Sharp, Smith, of Virg. Stanford, Thompson, Ureux, White, Wilson, of Penn. Yancy—69.

Mr. Yancy, then moved an amendment going to place a duty of _____ cents on every gallon of spirits distilled from domestic materials, instead of dividing it between the capacity and product of the still.

This motion was lost—yeas 55—nays 67.

Thursday, October 27. Mr. Troup, of Geo. from the military committee, reported a bill making further provision for filling the ranks of the regular army by classifying the free male population of the United States. [The bill is of some length, and contains very full provisions for carrying itself into effect.]

Mr. Troup also reported a bill "to authorise the president of the United States to accept the services of volunteers who may associate and organize themselves, and offer their services to the government of the U. States."

Mr. Troup also reported a bill "to provide for the further delivrance of the frontiers of the United States by authorizing the president to augment the present military establishment."

[This bill proposes to provide, that "in addition to the present military establishment of the United States there be immediately raised forty regiments, in such proportions of infantry, artillery, riflemen and cavalry, as the president of the United States may deem proper, to be enlisted to serve during the war, unless sooner discharged, and limited as to service to the defence of the frontiers of the U. States, &c. &c.]

The three bills were severally twice read and referred to a committee of the whole.

Mr. Troup also laid before the house a letter from the Secretary at war to the military committee.

[This letter and its accompanying papers, will be inserted in our next number.]

The house resumed the consideration of the report of the committee of ways and means.

The rates of postage were doubled—ayes 96—nays 47.

The duty on auctions was increased 100 per cent. without debate.

The next resolution was that embracing a tax, among other articles, on cotton yarn, and other manufactures, furniture, &c.

The questions to concur with the committee of the whole in striking out cotton yarn and shoes (that is, exempting them from taxation) were decided in the affirmative without debate; as also was the proposition for taxing all manufactured paper at the rate of five per cent.

The amendments of the committee of the whole to this resolution, having been gone through—

Mr. O'Key made a motion to strike out tallow candles—for it 59, against it 74. Mr. Reed moved that sperm-ceti candles be stricken out—for it 50—against it 73. Both negatived.

Mr. Bigelow moved to strike out leather—negatived.

Mr. Wheaton moved to strike out nails manufactured by machinery—negatived without a division.

Mr. Gaston moved to strike out furniture—negatived; 43 for it, 72 against it.

The question was then stated on the whole resolution (which has been published more than once, and goes to tax sundry articles of manufacture besides those mentioned in the foregoing.)

Mr. Oakley of N. Y. stated that he was friendly to some and opposed to others of the taxes embraced in this resolve, and should therefore vote against the whole, reserving the right to vote for the bills for laying some of these taxes when they should be brought.

The question on the adoption of the whole of the resolution (as amended by striking out cotton yarn and shoes) was decided in the affirmative as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Alexander, Anderson, Avery, Barbour, Barnett, Bowen, Bradley, Burwell, Butler, Caldwell, Calhoun, Cannon, Chappell, Clifton, Condit, Conrad, Crawford, Creighton, Dana, Denoyelles, Desha, Duvall, Eppes, Farrow, Fisk of Vt. Fisk of N. Y. Forney, Forsythe, Franklin, Goolson, Goodwyn, Griffin, Hall, Harris, Hasbrouck, Hawes, Hawkins, Hopkins of Ky. Hungerford, Ingham, Irving, Jackson of Virg. Johnson of Virg. Kennedy, Kent, of Md. Kerr, Kerslaw, Kilbourn, King of N. C. Loeffler, Lowndes, Lyle, McCoy, McKee, McLean, Montgomery, Nelson, Newton, Pickens, Pleasant, Rhea of Ten. Rich, Ringgold, Roberts-n, Sage, Sharp, Skinner, Smith of N. Y. Smith of Virg. Tannehill, Taylor, Telfair, Troup, Udree, Ward of N. J. Wilson of Penn.—76.

NAYS—Messrs. Baylies of Mass. Bigelow, Boyd, Bradbury, Brigham, Caperton, Champion, Cilley, Cooper, Ely, Gaston, Hale, Jackson of R. I. Law, Lewis, Lovett, Mosley, Mariell, Oakley, Pearson, Pickering, Pitkin, John Reed, Wm. Reed, Ruggles, Sargent, Sherwood, Stanford, Sturge, Vose, Ward of Mass. Wheaton, White, Wilcox—34.

The next resolution, is "that it is expedient to class the retailers of foreign merchandize and add fifty per cent. to the present duty thereon."

The next resolution was so to impose a duty on plated harness, combined with the tax on carriages, as to add to the present duty on carriages 100 per cent.

The eighth and last resolution, "that it is expedient to establish a national bank, with branches in the several states," being under consideration.

On motion of Mr. Hawkins of Ky. the house adjourned.

Friday, October 28. The house resumed the consideration of the remaining part of the report of the committee of the whole—it being a resolution "that it is expedient to establish a national bank with branches in the several states."

Mr. Post called upon the chairman or some member of the committee to explain the reasons for the proposition. Mr. Clifton requested information as to that part of the constitution that authorizes the establishment of a national bank. Mr. Eppes said his opinion of the matter, had not changed—he had reported it in obedience to the directions of the committee and the reasons for it might be found in Mr. Dallas' report. Mr. Wright was in favor of establishing a national bank, but would locate it in the district of Columbia. Mr. Burwell was entirely hostile to the establishment, on the principles laid down by the secretary of the treasury. Mr. Duvall resumed his observations, and at considerable length supported the constitutionality and propriety of establishing a national bank. Mr. Grosvenor had not a doubt that such a bank might be constitutionally raised. He was in favor of the general proposition, but hoped that many of its features would not be sanctioned. Mr. Hawkins thought that congress had not power to establish such a bank; but if it was to be established he hoped it would be established on general principles. Mr. Clifton, replied to Mr. Duvall, and contended the house could not constitutionally act on the matter before them. Mr. Wilson spoke in favor of the establishment, generally; Mr. McKee expressed his surprise at the opposition to this proposition. He had no doubt of the power of congress to establish a national bank—it was proper and expedient. He was opposed to Stanford's motion. The question in the motion to strike out the words "with branches in the several states" was taken—for it 14, against 138.

The question being stated on the passage of the resolution—

Mr. Post of New York said, under present impressions, he should vote against it, because the idea it embraced was illusive, and its object impracticable at the present moment; to shew which he made a number of remarks going to establish the insufficiency of such a measure to remedy the general want of confidence among individuals as well as in the banks, which at present prevailed.

The question on the adoption of the resolution was decided by the following vote:

YEAS—Messrs. Alexander, Alston, Anderson, Archer, Avery, Barnett, Bayly, of Va. Bradley, Brown, Butler, Caperton, Caldwell, Calhoun, Cannon, Chappell, Clark, Comstock, Conner, Conner, Creighton, Crouch, Culpeper, Cuthbert, Dana, Davis, of Penn. Denney, Duffall, Earle, Farrow, Frost, J., Fisk, of N. Y. Forsyth, Forsyth, Gaston, Geddies, Gourdin, Griffin, Grosvenor, Hanson, Harris, Hasbrouck, Hayes, Hopkins, of Ky. Hubbard, Harburt, Ingalls, Ingham, Irving, Kent, of N. Y. Kent, of Md. Kerr, Keshaw, Kibbourn, King, of N. C. LaBarts, Lewis, Lovett, Lowides, Lyle, McKee, McKim, McLane, Montgomery, Moore, Markell, Oakley, Ormsby, Parker, Pearson, Pickens, Piper, Rea, of Pen. Rich, Robertson, Sage, Sevier, Sherwood, Shipherd, Skinner, Smith, of N. Y. Strong, Sturges, Tannehill, Taylor, Telfair, Thompson, Cure, Ward, of N. J. Webster, Wilson, of Pen. Winter, Wright, Yancey, —.

N. Y.—Messrs. Barbour, Bard, Baylies, of Mass. Bowen, Boyd, Bradford, Barry II, Champion, Cill y, Clifton, Crawford, Davenport, Cassin, Ely, Eppes, Evans, Franklin, Gholson, Glasgow, Goodway, Hale, Hall, Hawkins, Humphreys, Hungerford, Jackson, of R. I. Johnson, of Va. Kennedy, King, of Mass. Law, Mason, Mosley, Nelson, Newton, Pitkin, Phasants, Post, Potter, John Reed, Vm. Reed, Rich, of Tenn. Ringgold, Ruggles, Schureman, Seybert, Sharp, Smith, of Vir. Stanford, Taggart, Vose, Wheaton, Wilcox, Wilson, of Mass.—54.

So the resolution was agreed to, and this together with the other resolutions, were referred to the committee of Ways and Means, to bring in the bills

Note from the Editor.

The irregular manner in which the REGISTER has appeared for some time past, and the long delay of the index for the 6th, or last volume, is more unpleasant to the editor than it can be to any other person. But the good old homely proverb says, "what cannot be cured must be endured"—every person in the employ of the office being "in the service of the United States," without the possibility of obtaining others in their places, or auxiliary to the labor they had time to perform on the Register. For the future, we hope to get along more harmoniously—there are now three extra hands in the office, and it so happens that they are exempt from military duties; and the index may be expected within the coming fortnight. The friends of the United States will appreciate the difficulties we have laboured under, and excuse irregularities which it was impossible to avoid—the enemies of the United States (if any such there are among the readers of my paper) may condemn or extenuate—just as they please.

The pressure of official documents and facts has monopolized our pages for some time past, and will chiefly occupy them for some time to come. The will to give "something new" is ever uppermost in our mind, but the first object of this work—to make it a faithful record of the times—checks the desire to give our own articles in preference to those that belong to the history of our country. We have many things in manuscript on hand—some finished for the press, and others digested and arranged, which we believed to be curious, important and interesting, especially in statistics—but they must lie over for the present. During the winter months we trust to furnish much amusement for the fire sides of our friends.

POSTSCRIPT.

The U. S. sloop of war Peacock, has arrived at New York from a cruise on the coasts of England, Ireland, &c. during which she made 14 prizes—burnt or sunk all but two of little value that were made cartels of. Damage to the enemy estimated at between 6 and 700,000 dollars, particulars hereafter. It appears that she did not sink a sloop of war, as was so variously reported as to obtain entire belief.

The privateer Chasseur, of Baltimore, has also arrived at New York, from a similar cruise, during which she made 18 prizes, laden with choice spoils, among which is some specie. Capt. Boyle issued his proclamation, in the most formal manner to blockade all the bays, rivers and creeks, outlets and inlets &c. of the United kingdoms, which with some account of his cruise shall appear in our next.

The privateer Harpy, of Baltimore, has also arrived at New York, after a cruise of 20 days, during which she made 5 valuable prizes.

The rich ship James, with a cargo invoiced at 100,000 pounds sterling, from England for Quebec, has arrived at Portsmouth, N. H. a prize to the Portsmouth privateer. This probably is the most valuable capture made since the war.

A vessel belonging to New York, with a full cargo of teas, &c. worth half a million; has arrived at Newport, R. I. from Canton.

A schooner with a large quantity of specie, has reached New Orleans, from Vera Cruz.

The news of the arrivals noticed above, with some others we might mention, reached us in the space of 24 hours—yet

"The winds and waves are Britains wide domain,
And not a flag without permission spreads!"

The steam frigate "Fulton the first," was launched at New-York, Oct. 31. She will soon be ready for service; and is cannon proof. She is to carry thirty 32 pound carronades, and two 100 pound Columbiads, to fire hot shot. The gallant Porter commands her. This frigate is 145 feet deck, 55 feet in breadth, and draws only eight feet water. We expect much from her.

By this morning's mail (Nov. 2) we learn that the British fleet (10 sail) were near the head of Ontario—that they had reinforced Drummond, and that Izard was expected to retire, or was retiring.

An idea prevailing that the British force coming out is destined for the south-west, the governor of Georgia, at the request of the secretary of war, has detached 2500 men, for the disposition of general Jackson. We have no fear from this quarter; and almost wish that lord Hill with his 15 or 20,000 men was furly in the country.

"Important if true." It is stated that Russia and Sweden have protested against the principle of the blockade of the American coast. And accounts from Halifax intimate that the neutrals sent there in the early part of the war, for a pretended breach of blockade will proceed to the ports of their original destination.

THE ENEMY IN THE CHESAPEAKE

Have taken possession of Tilghman's island (about 30 miles below Annapolis) with the apparent view of fixing winter quarters there, for a part of their force. The force in the neighborhood consists of 4 ships, 1 brig and 2 schooners. On the 27th October they crossed the bay and came ashore at Tracy's Landing, and soon went to work carrying off tobacco, &c. [fully says a left there] demolishing the houses. But they remained not long—a small party of militia appeared and the robbers fled to their vessels.

Accounts received at head-quarters, (Baltimore, Nov. 1.) state that the British again landed yesterday morning at Deep Creek, and proceeded to Kirby's Wind Mill, capt. Burd, of the U. S. dragoons having reconnoitered and ascertained the enemy's position, determined on an attempt to cut off his retreat back to his shipping. Capt. B. accordingly made a gallant charge, under a severe fire from the enemy's cannon and musketry. But brig. general Madison had not yet reached the scene of these operations, with his infantry from the camp near the Potomac; and capt. Burd not being so well supported by his own men as he had expected, the charge was not successful as he had anticipated. He, however made two prisoners. Capt. B. was severely wounded in the hand, narrowly escaped being himself taken. Our artillery is said to have galled the enemy while moving off in his barges.

Another account says, that at 10 o'clock, (Nov. 1.) the enemy was under full sail standing down the bay—that in the gallant attack made by capt. Burd, himself and three of his men were slightly wounded, and 9 horses killed. Loss of the enemy in killed and wounded unknown—we took five prisoners.

Supplement to Volume VII.

The quantity of matter, useful and necessary to a work of such very extensive reference as the WEEKLY REGISTER, that present itself in times like these, cannot be compressed in our numbers, even by the aid of those gratuitous supplements that the Editor has delighted to publish, or may publish, as soon as his workmen are relieved of the duties they owe, and perform, in the defence of their country.

It has been, and shall be, our fixed practice, first to insert the documents that are most important, accompanying them with the details, events, &c. that give life and spirit to history. But a great body of all descriptions of articles lies over, and must lie over forever, except by some extraordinary exertion we give them to future perusal and remembrance. We live in a busy age.

And, believing that the proposition will be sufficiently patronized, the editor has already made some needful arrangements for putting to press, by the first of January next, and to be completed by the middle of March, at the furthest, a SUPPLEMENT for the 7th, or present volume of the Register, to consist of twelve sheets, for one dollar.

The primary object of this supplement is to add to the value and perfection of the REGISTER. Pecuniary considerations have little weight with the Editor; for he does not expect to receive for it but little more than will meet the disbursements and indemnify his labor, the cost of materials, and especially of paper, being greatly enhanced.

The editor's time is too severely occupied to afford much exertion to obtain subscribers for this supplement. Those who desire it will immediately, or as soon as may be, pay over or transmit to the nearest of his agents, or to himself, their money; and, on the same being received, the proper receipt will issue, as directed. But the agents are enjoined not to receive any one as a subscriber for the supplement who has not also paid the current year's subscription to the REGISTER—say, up to Sept. 1814. This is a rule absolute.

And, having suffered considerable disadvantage by deviating from the plan of the other extra supplement, (from the shortness of the notice and on the suggestion of several respected friends) which was—to print no more than were actually engaged—that plan will be pursued on this occasion, and no more will be printed than are ordered, except an allowance of a few copies for those who, engaged in the service of their country, may not have opportunity to see and comply with the terms.

Many will be ready to ask—"what is the supplement to contain?" In truth, I cannot tell. I have yet little idea of it—but my best judgment shall be exerted to give it all the interest I can, by inserting the most important and interesting documents (domestic and foreign) speeches, proceedings, incidents, narratives and things that necessity has compelled, or may compel me, to exclude from the usual numbers of the REGISTER, and which would be inserted if the space were allowed. From the general contents of the REGISTER, therefore, an idea may be formed of the supplement.

Returns must be made by the middle of December next. Ample time is allowed, and no one should calculate on receiving this addition without giving due notice of his wishes.

For the convenience of subscribers, resident at places where there are no regular agents, the editor recommends that they address the following gentlemen, whose receipts will be valid. They are selected for their locality.

Or, may address the editor himself, at Baltimore, the postage of the letters being paid.

Defence of Stonington.

The following has been in type about two months, and would have been yet longer deferred had not national convenience urged its insertion now. But the redoubtable exploit of the great Nelson's capture could not have been suffered to pass away—due record of the grand affair must have been made.

New London, August 17.

Record of the extraordinary attack on Stonington.

On Tuesday the 9th instant, at 5 P. M. the Ramities 74, Pactolus 38, a bomb ship and the Dispatch 22 gun brig, arrived off Stonington, and a flag was sent on shore with the following note—

On board his majesty's ship Ramities, Stonington, Aug. 9.

Gentlemen—one hour is allowed you from the receipt of this communication for the removal of the unoffending inhabitants

THOMAS M. HARDY.

This notification was received by two magistrates, and Lieutenant Hough of the drafted militia who went off to meet the flag. The officer was asked whether a flag would not be received on board. He said no arrangements could be made. They inquired whether com. Hardy had determined to destroy the town. He replied that such were his orders from the admiral, and that it would be done most effectually.

When the gentlemen reached the shores, a croud waited with great anxiety for the news; which being stated, consternation flew through the town. An express was dispatched to general Cushing, at New London. A number of volunteers hastened to collect ammunition; others ran to the battery which consisted of two 18 pounders and a 4 pounder, on field carriages, with a slight breast work, 4 feet high. The sick and the aged were removed with haste; the women and children, with loud cries, were seen running in every direction. Some of the most valuable articles were hastily got off by hand, others placed in the gardens and lots, or thrown into wells, to save them from impending conflagration. The 60 minutes expired, but the dreadful moment did not bring the attack.—Nelson's favorite hero and friend, was seized with the compunctions of magnanimity—he remembered what ancient Britons were; he remembered that something was due to the character of Thomas M. Hardy. Three hours in fact elapsed, when at 8 in the evening the attack was commenced by a discharge of shells from the bomb ship, several barges and launches had taken their stations in different points from whence they threw Congreve rockets, and carcasses. This mode of attack was continued incessantly till midnight; and the fire was returned occasionally from the battery as the light of the rockets gave opportunity, without any chance of success.

The few drafted militia, which had been sometime stationed there, under command of lieutenant Hough, were placed in the best directions to give an alarm in case a landing should be attempted. During the night the volunteers and militia had assembled in considerable numbers; and the non-combatant inhabitants had generally removed to the neighboring farm-houses in the momentary expectation of seeing their abandoned dwellings in flames. It was a night of inexpressible anguish to many a widow and orphan, to many aged and infirm, whose little pittance they were now apparently to lose forever. But Providence directed otherwise. This compact little village of 100 buildings, had been for four hours covered with flames of fire and bomb shells, and not a single building was consumed nor a person injured.

At the dawn of day on the 10th, the approach of the enemy was announced by a discharge of Congreve rockets from several barges and a launch, which had taken their station on the east side of the town, and out of reach of the battery. Several volunteers, with small arms and the four pounder, hastened across the point, supposing the enemy were attempting a landing. Colonel Randall of the 13th regiment, who at the time was moving towards the battery with a detachment of militia, ordered them to assist the volunteers in drawing over one of the 18 pounders to the extreme end of the point; the fire of which, in a few minutes, compelled the barges to seek safety in flight. During this time the brig was working up towards the point, and soon after sunrise came to anchor, short of half a mile from the battery, or more correctly the breastwork. Our ammunition being soon exhausted, the guns were spiked, and the men who fought them, being only 15 or 20, retired leaving them behind for want of strength to drag them off.

The brig now continued deliberately to pour her 32 pound shot and grape into the village, without our having the power of returning a shot, for an hour, and the bomb ketch occasionally threw in shells. A fresh supply of ammunition being obtained the 18 pounder was withdrawn from the breastwork, the vent drilled and the piece taken back again, when such an animated and well directed fire was kept up, that at 3 o'clock the brig slipped her cable and hauled off, with her pumps going, having received several shots below her water line and considerable damage in her spars, &c

During this action between the eighteen pounder and the brig, Mr. Frederick Denison was slightly wounded in the knee by a fragment of a rock, and Mr. John Miner, badly burnt in his face by the premature discharge of the gun. The flag, which was nailed to the mast, was pierced with seven shot holes, the breast-work somewhat injured and 6 or 8 of the dwelling houses in the vicinity essentially injured. At this time a considerable body of militia had arrived, and brigadier general Isham, had taken the command; the inhabitants had recovered from the consternation of the first moments; and were deliberately moving off their furniture and goods. At 1 o'clock the Ramilies and Pactolus had taken stations about two and a half miles from the town; when resistance appearing hopeless, the magistrates as a last resort applied to the general for permission to send a flag off, being impressed with the opinion that there must exist some latent cause of a peculiar nature to induce a commander who had heretofore distinguished himself for a scrupulous regard to the claims of honorable warfare to induce him to commit an act so repugnant to sound policy, so abhorrent to his nature, so flagrant an outrage on humanity. The general, we understand, would not sanction, nor did he absolutely prohibit a flag being sent. They, therefore, on their own responsibility, sent on board the Ramilies, Isaac Williams, and Wm. Lord, esqrs. with the following letter.

(COPY.)

Stonington, August 10.

To sir Thomas M. Hardy,

SIR—Agreeable to notice received from you yesterday, this town is now cleared of 'unoffending inhabitants' and they feeling anxious about the fate of their village are desirous to know from you, your determination respecting it. Yours, &c.

Amos Denison, Burgess,
William Lord, magistrate.

The deputation proceeded on board the Ramilies and shortly after an officer informed the boatmen that they might return to the shore as the gentlemen would be landed in a boat from the ship; and that captain Hardy had declared that no further hostilities would be committed against the town. After remaining on board an hour, or more, the deputation were conveyed in a flag from the ship which was met by one from the shore. They brought with them a very singular and extraordinary communication. An exact copy cannot at present be obtained, as official etiquette will not permit; but having read it when it was received on shore, as far as memory will serve us it was as follows:

On board H. M. ship Ramilies, off Stonington, Aug. 10.

Gentlemen—You having given assurances that no torpedoes have been fitted out from Stonington; and having engaged to exert your influence to prevent any from being fitted out or receiving any aid from your town: If you send on board this ship to-morrow at eight o'clock Mrs. Stewart, wife of James Stewart, esq. late his majesty's consul at New London, and their children, I engage that no further hostilities shall be committed against Stonington; otherwise I shall proceed to destroy it effectually. For which purpose I possess ample means.

T. M. HARDY, capt

This letter was received indignantly. No answer was given. It was a fact well known that no torpedoes have been fitted at Stonington, and that the inhabitants are unfriendly to the system; but neither individuals nor the town have power to prevent their resorting to that place. The condition sine qua non is truly tragi-farical. Neither the town of Stonington or the state of Connecticut, had any legal power to comply with it, which capt. Hardy well knew. And if Stonington Point with its rocky foundations had been in danger of being blown up, scarcely a voice would have been raised to have saved it upon such disgraceful terms. The first duty of a citizen, we are taught in Connecticut, is to obey the laws. Mrs. Stewart is under the protection of the government of the United States, and the petition of her husband for a permission for a departure is in the hands of a proper authority, who will undoubtedly decide correctly in the case.

Our countrymen at a distance, from the importance capt. Hardy has attached to the circumstance of Mrs. Stewart's being sent off to the British squadron, may possibly apprehend that she has received insult, or signified some fears for the personal safety of herself and children.—So far from this being the fact, no lady ever experienced greater civilities from the citizens: as no one has better deserved them. And her feelings during the proceedings at Stonington, demanded the sympathy of her friends.

By the terms offered by capt. Hardy, it was impossible to discover whether he was most doubtful of his ability to accomplish the destruction of the town, or desirous of a pretext to save it. He assured the gentlemen who accompanied the flag that this was the most unpleasant expedition he had ever undertaken.

The truce on the part of the enemy having expired at 8 o'clock on Thursday morning, a flag, was soon after observed at the battery to be coming on shore, and there not being sufficient time to give information of the fact at head quarters and receive instructions, it was determined by the officer then commanding to send a boat off to receive the communication. Mr. Faxon, of Stonington, took charge of the boat, and offered to convey the dispatch agreeable to its directions. The British officer, lieut. Claxton, questioned his authority to receive it. Enquired whether Mrs. Stewart would be sent off; and said he would go on shore. Mr. Faxon replied, that he knew nothing of Mrs. Stewart, and that if he attempted to proceed for the shore he would undoubtedly be fired on. He continued his course, when a centinel was directed to fire forward of the boat, but the ball passed through the after sail. They immediately put about and steered for the ship; the lieutenant swearing revenge for what he termed an insult to his flag.

An explanation of the circumstance was immediately transmitted by general Isham to captain Hardy, which he received as satisfactory.

At the moment a flag had started for the Ramilies from the civil authority of the town; which was received on board, by which was sent the following letter.

Stonington-Boro', Aug. 14, 1814.

To Thomas M. Hardy, Esq. commander of H. B. M. ship Ramilies.

SIR—Since the flag went into New London for Mrs. Stewart, and family, general Cushing who commanded at New London, has written, we are informed, to the secretary of war on the subject, and it is our opinion that the request will be complied with. But whatever may be the result of the communication from gen. Cushing, you will be satisfied it is not in our power to enter into any arrangement with you respecting her.

From yours, &c.

Isaac Williams,	} Magistrates.

Alex. G. Smith,
John Smith,	warden.
Geo. Hubbard,	} Burgess.
Amos Denison,

To this letter, capt. Hardy replied verbally, that he should allow till 12 o'clock for Mrs. Stewart to be brought on board. At this time the principal part of 3 regiments of militia had arrived, and the town was perfectly secure against a landing.

At 3 o'clock, the bomb-ship re-commenced throwing shells into the town; and being out of the reach of our cannon, the general withdrew the militia excepting a guard of 50 men, who were ordered to patrol the streets for the extinguishment of fire, should any happen.—The bombardment continued till evening.

On Friday morning the bomb-ship renewed her operations a little before sun rise, while the Ramilies and Pactolus were warping in. At eight o'clock the frigate opened her fire, and was soon followed by the Ramilies. At this time the cannon were ordered to be moved to the north end of the town, where they would have been serviceable if an attempt had been made to land under cover of the ships. This was a very hazardous service as the party would be entirely exposed to the fire of the enemy. Volunteers in sufficient numbers instantly offered their services; among them were upwards of twenty of the Norwich artillery. The command of the party was entrusted to lieutenant Lathrop, of that corps. They marched to the battery and brought off the pieces without the smallest accident; exhibiting all the steadiness which characterises veteran soldiers.

This tremendous cannonade and bombardment continued till nearly noon, when it ceased; and about four o'clock the ships hauled off to their former anchorage.

During the succeeding night a large force was kept on guard; in the expectation and hope that a landing would be attempted. The militia during this afflicting scene discovered the very best disposition, and were eager to take revenge of the enemy or sacrifice their lives in the contest.

It may be considered miraculous that during the several attacks, while so many were exposed to this terrible and protracted bombardment and cannonade, not a person was killed, and but five or six wounded, and those slightly. Among the wounded is lieutenant Hough of the drafted militia.

On Saturday morning the enemy relinquished the hope of burning the town, weighed anchor and proceeded up Fisher's island sound.

The volunteers who so gloriously fought in the battery, deserve the thanks of their country. No men could have done better. Their example will have the happiest influence.

About 40 buildings are more or less injured; 8 or 10 essentially so; and two or three may be considered as ruined. The damage was principally done by the brig. Many shells did not explode, several were extinguished. The Congreve Rockets which were frightful at first, soon lost their terrors, and effected little.

The inhabitants fearing another attack, have not returned to their dwellings; and their desolate situation calls loudly upon the philanthropy of their fellow citizens. If a brief should be granted for collections in the churches of the state, we trust very essential aid will be furnished. Nineteen-twentieths of the inhabitants, it is said, have no other property than their buildings.

A Nantucket man has been on board the British fleet to redeem his boat and learnt that the Dispatch had 2 men killed and 12 wounded; her loss was undoubtedly much greater.

An article signed by the magistrates, says "During this protracted bombardment, nothing more excites our astonishment and gratitude than this, that not a man was killed on our part. We understand from good authority, the enemy had a number killed and several badly wounded. In this unprovoked attack upon us, we have made some estimate of the number of shells and fire carcasses thrown into the village, and we find there has been about three hundred. The amount of metal fired by the enemy, will exceed we think fifty tons, about three or four tons of bombs, carcasses and shot, have been collected.”*

FROM THE COLUMBIAN.

THE BATTLE OF STONINGTON.

Three gallant ships from England came,
Freighted deep with fire and flame,
And other things we need not name,
To have a dash at Stonington.

Now safe arrived—their work begun—
They thought to make the yankees run,
And have a mighty deal of fun,
In stealing sheep at Stonington.

A yankee, then, popp'd up his head,
And parson Jones' sermon read,
In which the reverend doctor said,
That they must fight for Stonington.

The ships advancing several ways,
The Britons soon began to blaze,
And put the old women in amaze,
Who fear'd the loss of Stonington!

The yankees to their fort repaired.
And made as though they little cared,
For all their shot—though very hard
They blazed away on Stonington,

The Ramilies began the attack,
And Nimrod made a mighty crack,
And none can tell what kept them back,
From setting fire to Stonington.

The old Razee, with red hot ball,
Soon made a farmer's barrack fall,
And did a cow-house sadly maul,
That stood a mile from Stonington,

The bombs were thrown, the rockets flew,
But not a man of all their crew,
(Though every man was full in view)
Could kill a man at Stonington.

To have their turn they thought but fair—
The yankees brought two guns to bear,
And, sir, it would have made you stare,
To see the smoke at Stonington!

They bored the Nimrod through and through,
And kill'd and mangled half her crew,
When riddled, crippled, she withdrew,
And cursed the boys of Stonington.

The Ramilies gave up the fray.
And with her comrades sneak'd away—
Such was the valor on that day,
Of British tars at Stonington.

But some assert, on certain grounds,
Beside the damage and the wounds,
It cost their king ten thousand pounds,
To have a dash at Stonington.

*Some respectable citizens from motives of curiosity weighed several shells, &c. and found their weight to be as follows:

One of the largest carcasses partly full of the combustible,	216 lb.
One of the smallest sort do.	103
One of the largest kind empty,	189
One of the largest bomb shells,	189
One of the smallest do.	90
One marked on it (fire 16lb)	16

One of the large carcasses partly full, was set on fire which burnt half an hour, emitting a horrid stench, in a calm the flame would rise ten feet.—Some of the rockets were sharp pointed, others not, made of sheet iron very thick, containing at the lower end some of them a fusée of grenade, calculated to burst, and if they were taken hold of before the explosion, might prove dangerous, one or two persons received injury in this way. They appear to contain a greater variety of combustibles than the fire carcasses.

British Proclamations, &c.

The following proceedings were had by the Hon. William Henry Percy, a captain in "his majesty's" navy—and lieut. col. Nicholls, commanding "his majesty's" forces in the FLORIDAS, before they got their drubbing at Fort Bowyer—which has, perhaps, changed their tone. Their impudence is equalled only by their folly.

Though we have laughed heartily at the appeal of the gallant colonel to the people of Kentucky, &c. and his story of "French influence"—the base, villainous and unprincipled application to the celebrated pirate Lafitte, for his ALLIANCE—a man who, for about two years past, has been famous for crimes that the civilized world wars against—who is supposed to have captured one hundred vessels, of all nations, and certainly murdered the crews of all that he took, for no one has ever escaped him—who was known to the HON. captain Percy, "his Britannic majesty's senior officer, &c."—indubitably known, as such an outlaw, pirate and murderer—is of a character so infamous and detestable, that in the strong language of an anonymous writer on another occasion, we would "with trumpet lungs, call upon heaven and earth to punish the offence!"

Gracious Providence!—are such men the "bulwarks of religion and liberty."

These fellows have been handsomely beaten by less than 100 men at fort Bowyer, with all their spouting. The poor creature Nicholls, had only about 200 marines, and as many indians, of whom, and to whom, he speaks so pompously!

Head-quarters, Pensacola, August 26, 1814.

Order of the day for the first colonial battalion of the royal corps of marines.

You are called upon to discharge a duty of the utmost peril. You will have to perform long and tedious marches through wildernesses, swamps and water courses; your enemy from long habit inured to the climate, will have great advantages over you. But remember the 21 years of toil and glory of your country, and resolve, to follow the example of your glorious companions, who have fought and spilt their blood in her service. Be equally faithful and strict in your moral discipline, and this the last and most perfidious of your enemies, will not long maintain themselves before you. A cause so sacred as that which has led you to draw your swords in Europe, will make you unsheath them in America, and I trust you will use them with equal credit and advantage. In Europe your arms were not employed in defence of your country only, but of all those who groaned in the chains of oppression, and in America they are to have the same direction. The people whom you are now to aid and assist have suffered robberies and murders committed on them by the Americans.

The noble Spanish nation has grieved to see her territories insulted; having been robbed and despoiled of a portion of them while she was overwhelmed with distress and held down by the chains which a tyrant had imposed on her glorious struggling for the greatest of all possible blessings (true liberty.) The treacherous Americans, who call themselves free, have attacked her, like assassins, while she was fallen. But the day of retribution is fast approaching. These atrocities will excite horror in the heart of a British soldier, they will stimulate you to avenge them, and you will avenge them like British soldiers. Valor, then, and humanity!

As to the Indians, you are to exhibit to them the most exact discipline, being a pattern to those children of nature. You will teach and instruct them, in doing which you will manifest the utmost patience, and you will correct them when they deserve it. But you will regard their affections and antipathies, and never give them just cause of offence. Sobriety, above all things, should be your greatest care—a single instance of drunkenness may be your ruin, and I declare to you in the most solemn manner that no consideration whatsoever shall induce me to forgive a drunkard. Apprized of this declaration, if any of you break my orders in this respect, he will consider himself the just cause of his own chastisement. Sobriety is your first duty; I ask of you the observance of it among your brethren. Vigilance is our next duty. Nothing is so disgraceful to our army as surprise. Nothing so destructive to our cause.

By the honorable William Henry Percy, captain of his majesty's ship Hermes, and senior officer in the gulph of Mexico.

You are hereby requested and directed after having received on board an officer belonging to the first battalion of royal colonial marines, to proceed in his majesty's sloop under your command, without a moment's loss of time for Barataria.

On your arrival at that place, you will communicate with the chief persons there; you will urge them to throw themselves under the protection of Great Britain; and should you find them inclined to pursue such a step, you will hold out to them, that their property shall be secured to them, that they shall be considered British subjects, and at the conclusion of the war, lands in his majesties colonies in America, will be allotted to them. In return for these concessions, you will insist on an immediate cessation of hostilities against Spain; and in case they should have any Spanish property not disposed of, that it is to be restored, and that they put their naval force into the hands of the senior officer here, until the commander in chief's pleasure is known. In the event of their not having inclined to act offensively against the United States, you will do all in your power to persuade them to strict neutrality, and still endeavor to put a stop to their hostilities against Spain; should you succeed completely in the object for which you are sent, you will concert such measures for the annoyance of the enemy as you judge best from circumstances, having an eye to the junction of their small armed vessels with me, for the capture of the Mobile, &c. You will, at all events, yourself, join me with the utmost despatch at this post, with the account of your success.

Given under my hand, and on board his majesty's ship Hermes, at Pensacola, this 30th day of August, 1814.

By the honorable William Henry Percy, captain of H. M. S. Hermes, and senior officer of the Gulf of Mexico.

Having understood that some British merchantmen have been detained, taken into, and sold by the inhabitants of Barataria, I have directed captain Lockyer, of H. M. sloop Sophia, to proceed to that place, and to inquire into the circumstance, with positive orders to demand instant restitution, and in case of refusal, to destroy to his utmost, every vessel there, as well as to carry destruction over the whole place, and at the same time to assure him of the co-operation of all H. M. naval force on this station. I trust at the same time that the inhabitants of Barataria consulting their own interest, will not make it necessary to proceed to such extremities.—I hold out at the same time to them, a war instantly destructive to them, and on the other hand, should they be inclined to assist Great Britain, in an unjust and unprovoked war against the United States, the security of their property, the blessings of the British constitution, and should they be inclined to settle on this continent, lands will at the conclusion of the war, be allotted to them, in his majesty's colonies in America. In return for all these concessions, on the part of Great Britain, I expect that the direction of the armed vessels will be put into my hands, (for which they will be remunerated) the instant cessation of hostilities against the Spanish government and the restitution of any undisposed of property of that nation shall be made. Should any inhabitants be inclined to volunteer their services into H. M. force, either naval or military, for limited service, they will be received, and if any British subject being at Barataria wishes to return to his native country, he will, on joining his majesty's service, receive a free pardon.

Given under my hand, on board his majesty's ship Hermes, Pensacola, the 1st day of Sept. 1814.

Head-quarters, Pensacola, August 31st, 1814.

SIR—I have arrived in the Floridas for the purpose of annoying the only enemy Great Britain has in the world. As France and England are now friends, I call on you, with your brave followers, to enter into the service of Great Britain, in which you shall have the rank of captain—LANDS will be given to you all in proportion to your respective ranks, on a peace taking place, and I invite you on to the following terms:—your property shall be quartered to you, and your person protected. In return for which I ask you to cease all hostilities against Spain or the allies of Great Britain. Your ships and vessels to be placed under the orders of the commanding officer on this station until the commander in chief's pleasure is known; but I guarantee their fair value to you at all events.

I herewith enclose you a copy of my proclamation to the inhabitants of Louisiana, which will, I trust, point out to you the honorable intentions of my government; you may be a useful assistant to me in forwarding them; therefore if you determine, lose no time; the bearer of this captain M^r Williams will satisfy you on any other points you may be anxious to learn, as will capt. Lockyer of the Sophia, who carries him to you. We have a powerful reinforcement on the way here, and I hope to cut out some other work for the Americans than oppressing the inhabitants of Louisiana. Be expeditious on your resolves and rely upon the veracity of

Your humble servant,

(Signed) EDWARD NICHOLLS,
Lt. col. com. H. B. M. forces in the Floridas.

To Monsieur La Fete, or the commandant at Barataria.

By lieut. col. Edward Nicholls, commanding H. B. M. forces in the Floridas.

Natives of Louisiana, on you the first call is made to assist in liberating from a faithless and imbecile government, your paternal soil. Spaniards, Frenchmen, Italians and British; whether settled or residing for a time in Louisiana, on you also I call to aid me in the just cause. The American usurpation in this country must be abolished, and the lawful owners of the soil put in possession. I am at the head of a large body of Indians, well armed, disciplined, and commanded by British officers. A good train of artillery with every requisite, seconded by the powerful aid of a numerous British and Spanish squadron of ships and vessels of war. Do not alarm the inhabitants of the country, at our approach; the same good faith and disinterestedness, which has distinguished the conduct of Britons in Europe accompanies them here. You will have no fear of litigious taxes imposed on you for the purpose of carrying on an unnatural and unjust war; your property, your laws, the peace and tranquillity of your country, will be guaranteed to you by men who will suffer no infringement of theirs; rest assured that these brave men only burn with an ardent desire of satisfaction, for the wrongs they have suffered from the Americans, to join you in liberating these southern frontiers from their yoke, and drive them into the limits formerly prescribed by my sovereign.—The Indians have pledged themselves, in the most solemn manner, not to injure in the slightest degree, the persons or properties, of any but enemies to their Spanish or English fathers. A flag over any door whether Spanish, French or British will be a certain protection. Nor dare any Indian put his foot on the threshold thereof, under penalty of death from his own countrymen. Not even an enemy will an Indian put to death, except resisting in arms, and as for injuring helpless women and children the red men by their good conduct and treatment to them, will, if it be possible, make the Americans blush for their more than inhuman conduct, lately on the Escombria, and within a neutral territory.

Inhabitants of Kentucky, you have too long borne with grievous impositions. The whole brunt of the war has fallen on your brave sons; be imposed on no more; but either range you selves under the standard of your forefathers, or observe a strict neutrality. If you comply with either of these offers, whatever provisions you send down, will be paid for in dollars, and the safety of the persons bringing it, as well as the free navigation of the Mississippi guaranteed to you. Men of Kentucky, let me call to your view, and I trust to your abhorrence, the conduct of those factions, which hurried you into this cruel, unjust and unnatural war, at a time when Great Britain was straining every nerve in defence of her own, and the liberties of the world; when the bravest of her sons were fighting and bleeding in so sacred a cause; when she was spending millions of her treasure in endeavoring to pull down one of the most formidable and dangerous tyrants that ever disgraced the form of man: when groaning Europe was almost in her last gasp, when nations alone shewed an undaunted front, basely and these assassins endeavor to stab her from the rear; she has turned on them, renovated from the bloody, but successful struggle. Europe is happy and free, and she now hastens justly to avenge unprovoked insults. Show them that you are not collectively unjust, leave that contemptible few to shift for themselves; let those slaves of the tyrant send an embassy to Elba, and implore his aid; but let every honest, upright American spurn them with merited contempt. After the experience of 21 years, can you any longer support those brawlers for liberty, who call it freedom, and know not when themselves are free; be no longer their dupes, accept of my offer; every thing I have promised in this paper I guarantee to you on the sacred honor of a British officer.

Given under my hand at my head-quarters, Pensacola, this 29th of August, 1814.

Recent omissions—miscellaneous.

It is stated that the privateer Midas, of Baltimore, lately from Savannah, has made a Cockburn descent on Harbor Island, one of the Bahamas, and burnt or plundered twenty seven houses, taking from one person 740 doubloons. The destruction of the capitol was assigned as a reason for this proceeding.

It is a fact that eleven-twelfths of the towns and settlements in the West Indies might be burnt or plundered by our armed vessels—the whole British navy cannot defend them—and there are hundreds of small places in England, Ireland and Scotland, far more important than Havre de Grace, Fredricktown, &c. &c. which the enemy has destroyed, that might be retaliated upon as easily by a privateer or small armed schooner, as a ship of the line—yet we hope and trust it may not be done. It may, perhaps, be well enough to shew the barbarian enemy that we can do it; but let us refrain from doing it. Such excursions cannot have any national effect, and are condemned by the laws and usages of all civilized nations, the British excepted, if they deserve to be so called. Our forbearance may bring them to a sense of shame for their conduct,—and, though it should have no good effect in this way, must be pleasing in the sight of God, and will strengthen us in a consciousness of our own rectitude, and secure us the good opinion of the world.

Mr. STEWART, formerly British consul at New London, since known as an agent for procuring specie for the enemy, &c. and who has long been on board the fleet off New London, was lately made prisoner on Plumb Island, and remains so on board the U. S. sloop Hornet.

"THE TUNE CHANGED." From the Albany Argus, Sept. 30. The official paper of the government at Quebec, which lately held up the idea, that Great Britain would insist on the exclusive jurisdiction of the lakes, the establishment of a new boundary line on our northern and western frontier, which should give her a large district of our territory, our abandonment of the fisheries, and the East India trade as the price of peace—in an article of the 23d ult. condescends to say, "If, in addition to their [the Americans] being shut out from the East India trade, they should be, in some degree curtailed in the fisheries, we fear it is as much as we can look for." This official paper pays no mean compliment to the valor of our troops, when in the same article it admits, "with all our strength, it would be rashness to penetrate to any considerable distance into the enemy's country. Such a measure would infallibly expose our army to be taken in the rear and produce perhaps another Saratoga disaster." Again—"They [the British troops on the Niagara frontier] have at present an enemy to contend with not to be contemned by them."

[The affairs at Plattsburg and Baltimore, not known at Quebec when the article alluded to was written, will very strongly confirm the positions of the writer.]—REG.

SINGULAR CIRCUMSTANCE. There are some facts relating to the capture of general Riall which may not be uninteresting. On the day of the memorable battle of Bridgewater, capt. Ketchum, of the 25th infantry, in conversation with one of his brother officers, observed, that in 24 hours he would return with gen. Riall and suit prisoners. During the evening of that day capt. Ketchum, with a small body of men, circumvented the British army, and got in their rear. Gen. Riall, supposing them to be a body of his own men, ordered them to charge upon them. Captain Ketchum coolly replied—"Sir I receive no orders from you—I command here—please to dismount."—

Gen. Riall after a slight resistance, in which one of his aids was killed, surrendered.

BRIG. GEN. RIPLEY.—It is stated in a letter received at Pittsfield in Massachusetts, from an officer, who was by the side of gen. Ripley in the battle of the 17th ult. that all the troops participated in the action, and that towards the close of it, as the general was at the head of the 23d regt. then closely engaged at the distance of twenty yards from the enemy, he received a musket shot, which penetrated through his neck between the throat and the spine, entering in front of the right artery and passing out behind the left artery. His aid conveyed him from the field of battle, insensible through the loss of blood. On the 20th his recovery was considered as doubtful. — By subsequent accounts we have the pleasure to hope the early return of this gallant officer to the service of his country.

The Boston Palladium of the 23th Oct. says: "It was reported a few days since, that several of the neutral nations of Europe had complained to the British government of the extent of the blockade of the ports of the United States.

And yesterday it was reported that an order had been received at Halifax, permitting the neutral vessels which have been sent in there and not adjudicated, to sail for their original ports of destination in the United States, not known to them to be blockaded at the time they commenced their voyages, and to return with cargoes.

No doubt there has been a negociation in England on the subject of neutral vessels turned off from ports not known by them to be blockaded, when they sailed; and the above is possibly the result. To take a return cargo under such circumstances, would be among their rights.

A considerable number of neutrals have been waiting at Halifax the issue of the despatches sent to England.

VERMONT VOLUNTEERS.—To the editors of the Burlington Gazette.—SIRS—On my arrival at this place last evening, I found a false and disgraceful report in circulation respecting the Vermont troops. It is stated, that while fighting the enemy at Plattsburgh, in their attack on Sunday last, we refused to give them quarters after they had surrendered. In the part of the line occupied by col. Lyman's regiment, a number of the enemy surrendered, and a captain and several others were killed. But col. Lyman asserts with confidence, that no person fell after quarters were asked, although there were several guns fired in consequence of a large number of the enemy making their escape. This may, perhaps, account for the misrepresentation. I hope that no person will undertake to disgrace such brave men as ours appeared to be on that occasion, with imputations of such base and savage conduct, as I am certain colonel Lyman acted with all the bravery, skill and magnanimity of an experienced veteran.

By order of SAMUEL STRONG, gen. of Vermont volunteers. R. D. HOPKINS, A. D. C.

BRUTALITY OF THE ENEMY.

Messrs. Gales and Seaton—Having seen the following publication in the Alexandria Herald, of the 19th October with horror, as capping the climax of atrocity—

To the Editors of the Herald. Gentlemen, I have no recollection of having seen any account of the conduct of the enemy at Chaptico published in any of the public prints; you are at liberty to publish the following extract of a letter to a friend, written shortly after that affair. It is a very imperfect account written in a hurry amidst the bustle of a camp, but contains most of the facts. My name is enclosed, which you are at liberty to make public, if any respectable person should deny the truth of the following statement.

A Citizen of Maryland.

"I passed through Chaptico shortly after the enemy left it, and I am sorry to say that their conduct would have disgraced Cannibals; the house was torn to pieces, the well which afforded water for the inhabitants was filled up, and; what is still worse, the church and the ashes of the dead shared an equally bad or worse fate. Will you believe me, when I tell you, that the sunken graves were converted into barbaque holes! The remaining glass of the church windows broken, the communion table used as a dinner table and then broken to pieces! Bad as the above may appear, it dwindles into insignificance, when compared with what follows: the vault was entered and the remains of the dead disturbed. Yes, my friend, the winding sheet was torn from the body of a lady of the first respectability, and the whole contents of the vault entirely deranged! The above facts were witnessed by hundreds as well as myself, and I am happy to say, that but one sentiment pervaded our army."

I immediately shewed it to general Philip Stewart, lately commanding the American troops at that place, who read and declared it strictly true; that Cockburn was at the head of it; that they also destroyed the organs; that judge Key's lady who had been last put into the vault was the person alluded to, that her winding sheet was torn in pieces, and her person wantonly exposed; and that his men were exasperated to desperation by his conduct. You will publish this. Yours, &c.

ROBERT WRIGHT.

N. B. I hope every American printer will also publish it. R. W.

WORSE AND WORSE.

The Boston Patriot noticing this brutal transaction, adds—

"The above facts, detailed by governor Wright, were confirmed by general Philip Stewart, who lately commanded the American troops at that place; who declared the statement to be every way correct. But this, horrible as it was, was nothing to what followed. We are authorized to state, that general Stewart informed a member of the senate of the United States, that the BRITISH OFFICERS STRIPPED YOUNG LADIES ENTIRELY NAKED, and obliged them to stand before them in that condition for an hour and an half; when they, the British officers, at length permitted these distressed females again to clothe themselves!"

FURTHER!

The general fact stated in the following is abundantly confirmed by captain Campbell's letter to the secretary of the navy, inserted below.

A letter from the southward says, the British are as savage in their warfare now, as in the days of ou revolution: it is their character in all their wars; cruel in victory, and fawningly supple when they are conquered. The fate of sailing-master Paine is illustrative of this fact. A grape shot passed through his thigh, and he fell—he had discharged his cannon and small arms with good effect; was boarded, and cheered his men as he lay—was stabbed by a pike—cried out for quarters, and afterwards received two deep wounds on the back of his head and neck by a cutlass, supposed to be mortal. Several of the enemy were counted, dead in one barge. Paine was carried off; and the other wounded and sick were left on a sand bank, dry at low water in the midst of the sound, surrounded by 18 feet water, without a boat, in order that they might perish by flow of tide, when it was equally convenient to have landed them at Cumberland High-point, or on little Cumberland beach—the sand bank lies about midway between!!! Such is “the Bulwark of our Religion.”

There are letters in town which state that sailing-master Paine expired about 15 minutes after the action.

Copy of a letter from com. Campbell, to the secretary of the navy, dated St. Mary's, October 8th, 1814.

SIR—I have the misfortune to inform you of the loss of gun vessel, No. 160, commanded by Thomas Paine, jr. sailing master. He was from from Savannah with convoy, and about eight leagues from this place when taken. The enemy had ten boats of different descriptions, and a sloop fitted out as a tender full of men. They were manned from the frigate Lacedemonian, and other vessels, names unknown, having on board about 200 men. They entered St. Andrew's Sound on the night of the 5th inst. came up with the gun boat about 3 o'clock in the morning of the 6th, and carried her by boarding, after a distant cannonade, and a discharge of musketry for 20 minutes. Four of the convoy were likewise taken, two of which they destroyed, in consequence of their running on shore. Mr. Paine had but 30 souls on board, of which 16 only were fit for duty, the residue on the sick list. The enemy landed all the sick and wounded except Mr. Paine, 16 in number, on a sand bank near the bar of St. Andrew's Sound, a situation from which they could not extricate themselves, but at the risk of their lives, and one of them was drowned in the attempt; those that could not swim were obliged to remain on the bank, and must have drowned had not timely relief been given them by a few inhabitants formerly of this place, who had lately settled on Cumberland, who took them off at the moment, when a few minutes would have terminated their existence. They all declare that they could have survived but a few moments longer. Eleven of these unfortunate men have arrived at this place; by their statement of the action I have reason to believe that every man did his duty on board the gun boat, yet strange to tell, we had but 3 men wounded, Mr. Paine included, who fell early in the action. The enemy's loss, as far as I can learn is about twenty killed and wounded, of the latter a lieutenant with the loss of his arm, and two midshipmen with the loss of a hand each. The enemy was in sight yesterday. Their orders are I understand to destroy the inland trade between this place and Savannah.

I have the honor to be, with great respect, sir, your obedient servant,

HUGH G. CAMPBELL,

Hon. Wm. Jones, secretary of the navy.

To the Editors of the National Intelligencer.
Among the deeds of Vandalism committed during the late invasion of the city, by the enemy, I know of none more base and wanton than the mutilation of the monument at the navy yard.

This elegant monument of the liberality and gallantry of our naval heroes, has been shamefully defaced by the hand of some barbarian. On the base the genius of America is represented by a female figure pointing to an inscription and raising a view of the battle before Tripoli, instructing her children who are standing beside her—the pointing finger and thumb have been cut off. History, a female figure, who is represented as recording the event, has been robbed of her pen—and a figure of fame, who is represented as descending in a cloud covering the deeds of her sons with the palm and crown of glory, has been robbed of the palm at the expense of the hand that held it. From every enquiry it is possible to make, there is no reason to doubt but that it was the deliberate act of some of the British officers, as several of them were seen to be on the base of the monument, by the neighbors around the yard.

The deed itself appears to have some allusion to the time when it was perpetrated; but poor indeed must have been the inspiration of the poet not to have foreseen, in the victories of McDonough, Warrington and Blakely, how soon history might resume her employment, and fame cover our heroes with, I trust, an imperishable palm of victory.

AN OBSERVER.

New Military Force.

Department of war, October 17.

SIR—The great importance of the subject, and the other duties of the Department, which could not fail to be very sensibly felt, at so interesting a period, by a person who had just taken charge of it, are my apology for not answering your letter of the 24th of September at an earlier day, on the defects of the present military establishment.

Due consideration has been bestowed on the subject matter of that letter, and I have now the honor to submit to the committee the following report:

1. That the present military establishment, amounting to 62,448 men, be preserved and made complete, and that the most efficient means authorised by the constitution and consistent with the general rights of our fellow-citizens be adopted, to fill the ranks, and with the least possible delay.

2. That a permanent force consisting of at least 40,000 men in addition to the present military establishment be raised for the defence of our cities and frontiers, under an engagement by the executive with such corps that it shall be employed in that service within certain specified limits, and that a proportional augmentation of general officers of each grade, and other staff be provided for.

3. That the corps of engineers be enlarged.

4. That the ordnance department be amended.

Respecting the enlargement of the corps of engineers, I shall submit hereafter a more detailed communication.

For the proposed amendment of the ordnance department, I submit a report from the senior officer of that department in this city, which is approved.

I shall be ready and happy to communicate such further remarks and details on these subjects as the committee may desire, and shall request permission to suggest hereafter the result of further attention to, and reflection on, our military establishment generally, should any thing occur which may be deemed worthy its attention.

I have the honor to be, &c.

JAS. MONROE.

Honorable G. M. Troup, chairman, military committee, house of representatives.

EXPLANATORY OBSERVATIONS.

Accompanying the letter from the secretary of war to the chairman of the military committee of the house of representatives.

In providing a force necessary to bring this war to a happy termination, the nature of the crisis in which we are involved, and the extent of its dangers, claim particular attention. If the means are not fully adequate to the end, discomfiture must inevitably ensue.

It may be fairly presumed, that it is the object of the British government, by striking at the principal sources of our prosperity, to diminish the importance, if not to destroy the political existence of the United States. If any doubt remained on this subject, it has been completely removed by the despatches from our ministers at Ghent, which were lately laid before congress.

A nation contending for its existence against an enemy powerful by land and sea, favored in a peculiar manner by extraordinary events, must make great sacrifices. Forced to contend again for our liberties and independence, we are called on for a display of all the patriotism, which distinguished our fellow-citizens in the first great struggle. It may be fairly concluded, that if the United States sacrifice any right, or make any dishonorable concession to the demands of the British government, the spirit of the nation will be broken, and the foundations of their union and independence shaken. The United States must relinquish no right, or perish in the struggle. There is no intermediate ground to rest on. A concession on one point, leads directly to the surrender of every other. The result of the contest cannot be doubtful. The highest confidence is entertained that the stronger the pressure, and the greater the danger, the more firm and vigorous will be the resistance, and the more successful and glorious the result.

It is the avowed purpose of the enemy to lay waste and destroy our cities and villages, and to desolate our coast, of which examples have already been afforded. It is evidently his intention to press the war along the whole extent of our seaboard, in the hope of exhausting equally the spirit of the people, and the national resources. There is also reason to presume, that it is the intention to press the war from Canada on the adjoining states, while attempts are made on the city of New-York, and other important points, with a view to the vain project of dismemberment or subjugation. It may be inferred likewise to be a part of the scheme, to continue to invade this part of the union, while a separate force attacks the state of Louisiana, in the hope of taking possession of the city of New-Orleans, and of the mouth of the Mississippi, that great inlet and key to the commerce of all that portion of the United States lying westward of the Alleghany mountains. The peace in Europe having given to the enemy a large disposable force, has essentially favored these objects.

The advantage which a great naval superiority gives to the enemy, by enabling him to move troops from one quarter to another, from Maine to Mississippi, a coast of two thousand miles extent, is very considerable. Even a small force moved in this manner for the purposes avowed by the British commanders, cannot fail to be sensibly felt, more especially by those who are most exposed to it. It is obvious, if the militia are to be relied on principally for the defence of our cities and coasts against their predatory and desolating incursions, wherever they may be made, that by interfering with their ordinary pursuits of industry, it must be attended with serious interruption and loss to them, and injury to the public, while it greatly increases the expense. It is an object, therefore, of the highest importance, to provide a regular force, with the means of transporting it from one quarter to another along our coast, thereby following the movements of the enemy with the greatest possible rapidity, and repelling the attack wherever it may be made. These remarks are equally true as to the militia service generally under the present organization of the militia, and the short terms of service prescribed by law. It may be stated with confidence, that at least three times the force in militia has been employed at our principal cities along the coast, and on the frontier, in marching to and returning thence, that would have been necessary in regular troops; and that the expense attending it has been more than proportionably augmented, from the difficulty, if not the impossibility, of preserving the same degree of system in the militia as in the regular service.

But it will not be sufficient to repel these predatory and desolating incursions. To bring the war to an honorable termination, we must not be contented with defending ourselves. Different feelings must be touched, and apprehensions excited in the British government. By pushing the war into Canada, we secure the friendship of the Indian tribes, and command their services, otherwise to be turned by the enemy against us; we relieve the coast from the desolation which is intended for it, and we keep in our hands a safe pledge for an honorable peace.

It follows, from this view of the subject, that it will be necessary to bring into the field next campaign, not less than 100,000 regular troops. Such a force, aided, in extraordinary emergencies, by volunteers and militia, will place us above all inquietude as to the final result of this contest. It will fix, on a solid and imperishable foundation, our union and independence; on which the liberties and happiness of our fellow-citizens so essentially depend. It will secure to the United States an early and advantageous peace.

It will arrest, in the further prosecution of the war, the desolation of our cities and our coast, by enabling us to retort on the enemy those calamities which our citizens have been already doomed to suffer, a resort which self-defence alone, and a sacred regard for the rights and honor of the nation, could induce the United States to adopt.

The return of the regular force now in service, laid before you, will shew how many men will be necessary to fill the present corps; and the return of the numerical force of the present military establishment, will shew how many are required to complete it to the number proposed. The next and most important inquiry is, how shall these men be raised? Under existing circumstances, it is evident that the most prompt and efficient mode that can be devised, consistent with the equal rights of every citizen, ought to be adopted. The following plans are respectfully submitted to the consideration of the committee. Being distinct in their nature, I will present each separately, with the considerations applicable to it.

FIRST PLAN.

Let the free male population of the United States, between 18 and 45 years, be formed into classes of 100 men each, and let each class furnish men for the war, within 30 days after the classification, and replace them in the event of casualty.

The classification to be formed with a view to the equal distribution of property among the several classes.

If any class fails to provide the men required of it, within the time specified, they shall be raised by draft on the whole class: any person thus drafted being allowed to furnish a substitute.

The present bounty in land to be allowed to each recruit, and the present bounty in money, which is paid to each recruit by the United States, to be paid to each draft by all the inhabitants within the precinct of the class, within which the draft may be made, equally, according to the value of the property which they may respectively possess; and if such bounty be not paid within days, the same to be levied on all the taxable property of the said inhabitants. And in like manner, the bounty, whatever it may be, which may be employed in raising a recruit, to avoid a draft, to be assessed on the taxable property of the whole precinct.

The recruits to be delivered over to the recruiting officer in each district, to be marched to such places of general rendezvous as may be designated by the department of war.

That this plan will be efficient, cannot be doubted. It is evident, that the men contemplated may soon be raised by it. Three modes occur, by which it may be carried into effect. 1st. By placing the execution of it in the hands of the county courts throughout the United States. 2d. By relying on the militia officers in each county. 3d. By appointing particular persons in each county for that purpose. It is believed that either of these modes would be found adequate.

Nor does there appear to be any well founded objection to the right in congress to adopt this plan, or to its equality in its application to our fellow-citizens individually. Congress have a right, by the constitution, to raise regular armies, and no restraint is imposed in the exercise of it, except in the provisions which are intended to guard generally against the abuse of power, with none of which does this plan interfere. It is proposed, that it shall operate on all alike, that none shall be exempted from it except the chief magistrate of the United States, and the governors of the several states.

It would be absurd to suppose that congress could not carry this power into effect, otherwise than by accepting the voluntary service of individuals. It might happen that an army could not be raised in that mode, whence the power would have been granted in vain. The safety of the state might depend on such an army. Long continued invasions conducted by regular well disciplined troops, can best be repelled by troops kept constantly in the field, and equally well disciplined. Courage in an army is in a great measure mechanical. A small body well trained, accustomed to action, gallantly led on, often breaks three or four times the number of more respectable and more brave, but raw and undisciplined troops. The sense of danger is diminished by frequent exposure to it without harm; and confidence, even in the timid, is inspired by a knowledge that reliance may be placed on others, which can grow up only by service together. The grant to congress to raise armies was made with a knowledge of all these circumstances, and with the intention that it should take effect. The framers of the constitution, and the states who ratified it, knew the advantage which an enemy might have over us, by regular forces, and intended to place their country on an equal footing.

The idea that the United States cannot raise a regular army in any other mode than by accepting the voluntary service of individuals, is believed to be repugnant to the uniform construction of all grants of power, and equally so to the first principles and leading objects of the federal compact. An unequal grant of power gives the means necessary to carry it into effect. This is an universal maxim which admits of no exception. Equally true is it that the conservation of the state is a duty paramount to all others. The commonwealth has a right to the service of all its citizens, or rather, the citizens composing the commonwealth have a right collectively and individually to the service of each other, to repel any danger which may be menaced. The manner in which the service is to be apportioned among the citizens, and rendered by them, are objects of legislation. All that is to be dreaded in such case, is the abuse of power, and happily our constitution has provided ample security against that evil.

In support of this right in congress, the militia service affords a conclusive proof and striking example. The organization of the militia is an act of public authority, not a voluntary association. The service required must be performed by all, under penalties which delinquents pay. The generous and patriotic perform them cheerfully. In the alacrity with which the call of the government has been obeyed, and the cheerfulness with which the service has been performed throughout the United States by the great body of the militia, there is abundant cause to rejoice in the strength of our republican institutions, and in the virtue of the people.

The plan proposed is not more compulsive than the militia service, while it is free from most of the objections to it. The militia service calls from home for long terms whole districts of country. None can elude the call. Few can avoid the service, and those who do are compelled to pay great sums for substitutes. This plan fixes on no one personally, and opens to all who chuse it a chance of declining the service. It is a principal object of this plan to engage in the defence of the state the unmarried and youthful, who can best defend it and best be spared, and to secure to those who render this important service, an adequate compensation from the voluntary contribution of the more wealthy in every class. Great confidence is entertained that such contribution will be made in time to avoid a draft. Indeed it is believed to be the necessary and inevitable tendency of this plan to produce that effect.

The limited power which the United States have in organizing the militia may be urged as an argument against their right to raise regular troops in the mode proposed. If any argument could be drawn from that circumstance, I should suppose that it would be in favor of an opposite conclusion. The power of the United States over the militia has been limited, and that for raising regular armies granted without limitation. There was, doubtless, some object in this arrangement. The fair inference seems to be, that it was made on great consideration; that the limitation in the first instance was intentional, the consequence of the unqualified grant of the second.

But it is said that by drawing the men from the militia service into the regular army, and putting them under regular officers, you violate a principle of the constitution which provides that the militia shall be commanded by their own officers. If this was the fact the conclusion would follow. But it is not the fact. The men are not drawn from the militia, but from the population of the country: when they enlist voluntarily, it is not as militia men that they act, but as citizens. If they are drafted it must be in the same sense. In both instances they are enrolled in the militia corps, but that, as is presumed, cannot prevent the voluntary act in one instance, or the compulsive in the other. The whole population of the United States within certain ages belong to these corps. If the United States could not form regular armies from them they could raise none.

In proposing a draft as one of the modes of raising men in case of actual necessity, in the present great emergency of the country, I have thought it my duty to examine such objections to it as occurred, particularly those of a constitutional nature. It is from my sacred regard for the principles of our constitution that I have ventured to trouble the committee with any remarks on this part of the subject.

Should it appear that this mode of raising recruits was justly objectionable on account of the tax on property, from difficulties which may be apprehended in the execution, or from other causes, it may be advisable to decline the tax, and for the government to pay the whole bounty.

In this case it is proposed that, in lieu of the present bounty, the sum of fifty dollars be allowed to each recruit or draft at the time of his engagement, and one hundred acres of land in addition to the present bounty in land, for every year that the war may continue.

It is impossible to state with mathematical accuracy the number which will be raised by the ratio of 4 to 100 or 1 to 25, nor is it necessary. It is probable that it will be rather more than sufficient to fill the present corps. The extra number, in that case, may form a part of the local force in contemplation, a power to that effect being given to the president.

No radical change in the present military establishment is proposed. Should any modification be found necessary, on further consideration, it will form the subject of a separate communication. It is thought advisable in general to preserve the corps in their present form, and to fill them with new recruits in the manner stated. All these corps have already seen service, and many of them acquired in active scenes much experience and useful knowledge. By preserving them in their present form and under their present officers, and filling them with new recruits, the improvement of the latter will be rapid. In two or three months it will be difficult to distinguish between the new and old levies.

The additional force to be provided amounts to 40,000 men. Of this it is proposed that local corps be raised, to consist partly of infantry, partly of mounted men and partly of artillery. There is reason to believe that such corps may be raised in the principal cities, and even on the frontier, to serve for the war, under an engagement as to the limit beyond which they should not be carried. Every able bodied citizen is willing and ready to fight for his home, his family and his country, when invaded. Of this we have seen, in the present year, the most honorable and gratifying proofs. It does not suit all, however, to go great distances from home. This generous and patriotic spirit may be taken advantage of, under proper arrangements, with the happiest effects to the country, and without essential inconvenience to the parties.

The officers who may be appointed to command these corps, should be charged with recruiting them. Local defence being their sole object, it may be presumed that the corps will soon be raised. Patriotism alone will furnish a very powerful motive. It seems reasonable, however, that some recompense should be made to those who relieve others from the burthen: one hundred acres of land and fifty dollars to each recruit will, it is presumed, be deemed sufficient.

It is proposed that this additional force shall form a part of any plan that may be adopted.

SECOND PLAN.

This plan consists of a classification of the militia, and the extension of their terms of service.

Let the whole of the militia of the United States be divided into the following classes, viz :

All free male persons capable of service, between the ages of 18 and 25, into one class : all those between the ages of 25 and 32 into another class, and those between 32 and 45 into a third class:

It is proposed also that the president shall have power to call into the service any portion of either of these classes which in his judgment the exigencies of the country may require, to remain in service two years, from the time each corps shall be assembled at the appointed place of rendezvous.

It is believed that a shorter term than two years would not give to these corps the efficiency in military operations that is desired, and deemed indispensable, nor avoid the evils that are so sensibly felt, and generally complained of, under the present arrangement. It requires two campaigns to make a complete soldier, especially where the corps, officers and men are alike raw and inexperienced. In the interim, the numbers must be multiplied to supply the defect of discipline. And it requires the extension of the term of service, to avoid the additional proportional augmentation of having so many in the field at the same time, in marching to the frontier and returning from it. The inconvenience to the parties, and loss to the community in other respects, need not be repeated. It is proper to add only, that if substitutes are allowed in the service it must put an end to the recruiting of men for the regular army, especially the old corps. Of the justice of this remark what has occurred in the present year has furnished full proof. It follows that if this plan is adopted, the militia must be relied on principally, if not altogether, in the further prosecution of the war.

The additional force for local service, amounting to forty thousand men, will likewise form a part, as already observed, of this plan.

THIRD PLAN.

It is proposed to exempt every five men from militia service, who shall find one to serve for the war. It is probable that some recruits might be raised in this mode, in most or all the states. But it is apprehended that it would prevent recruiting in every other mode, by the high bounty which some of the wealthy might give. The consequence would probably be very injurious, as it is not believed that any great number could be raised in this mode.

FOURTH PLAN.

Should all the preceding plans be found objectionable, it remains that the present system of recruiting be adhered to, with an augmentation of the bounty in land. Should this be preferred, it is advised that in addition to the 160 acres of land now given, 100 be allowed annually for every year while the war lasts.

These plans are thought more deserving the attention of the committee than any that have occurred. The first, for the reasons stated, is preferred. It is believed that it will be found more efficient against the enemy, less expensive to the public and less burdensome on our fellow-citizens.

It has likewise the venerable sanction of our revolution. In that great struggle resort was had to this expedient for filling the ranks of our regular army, and with decisive effect.

It is not intended by these remarks, should the first plan be adopted, to dispense altogether with the service of the militia. Although the principal burthen of the war may thereby be taken from the militia, reliance must still be placed on them for important aids, especially in cases of sudden invasion. For this purpose it will still be advisable that the men be classed according to age, and that their term of service be prolonged. Even should this plan be attended with all the advantages expected of it, such an arrangement could not fail to produce the happiest effect. The proof which it would afford of the impregnable strength of the country, of the patient virtue and invincible spirit of the people, would admonish the enemy how vain and fruitless his invasions must be, and might dispose him to a speedy, just and honorable peace. Of the very important services already rendered by the militia, even under the present organization, too much cannot be said.

If the United States make the exertion which is proposed, it is probable that the contest will soon be at an end. It cannot be doubted that it is in their power to expel the British forces from this continent, should the British government, by persevering in its unjust demands, make that an object with the American people. Against our united and vigorous efforts, the resistance of the enemy will soon become light and feeble. Success in every fair and honorable claim, is within our easy grasp. And surely the United States have every possible inducement to make the effort necessary to secure it. I should insult the understanding and wound the feelings of the committee, if I touched on the calamities incident to defeat. Dangers which are remote and can never be realized, excite no alarm with a gallant and generous people. But the advantages of success have a fair claim to their deliberate consideration. The effort we have already made has attracted the attention and extorted the praise of other nations. Already have most of the absurd theories and idle speculations on our system of government been refuted, and put down. We are now felt and respected as a power, and it is the dread which the enemy entertain of our resources and growing importance, that has induced him to push the war against us, after its professed objects had ceased. Success, by discomfiture of his schemes, and the attainment of an honorable peace, will place the U. States on higher ground, in the opinion of the world, than they have held at any former period. In future wars, their commerce will be permitted to take its lawful range unmolested. Their remonstrances to foreign governments will not again be put aside, unheeded. Few will be presented, because there will seldom be occasion for them. Our union, founded on interest and affection, will have acquired new strength by the proof it will have afforded, of the important advantages attending it. Respected abroad and happy at home, the United States will have accomplished the great objects, for which they have so long contended. As a nation they will have little to dread, as a people little to desire.

Extract from Marshall's Life of Washington, vol. 4th, page 241.

"In general the assemblies (of the states) followed the example of congress, and apportioned on the several counties within the state, the quota to be furnished by each. This division of the state was again to be subdivided into classes, and each class was to furnish a man by contributions or taxes imposed on itself. In some instances a draft was to be used in the last resort; in others, the man was to be recruited by persons appointed for that purpose, and the class to be taxed with the sum given for his bounty."

Extract from Ramsay's Life of Washington, 2d vol. page 246.

"When voluntary enlistments fell short of the proposed number, the deficiencies, were, by the laws of several states, to be made up by drafts or lots from the militia. The towns in New-England and the counties in the middle states, were respectively called on for a specified number of men. Such was the zeal of the people of New-England, that neighbors would often club together to engage one of their number to go into the army. Maryland directed her lieutenants of counties to class all the property in their respective counties into as many equal classes as there were men wanted, and each class was by law obliged, within ten days thereafter, to furnish an able bodied recruit during the war; and in case of their neglecting or refusing to do so, the county lieutenants were authorised to procure men at their expense, at any rate not exceeding 15 pounds in every hundred pounds worth of property classed agreeably to law. Virginia likewise classed her citizens, and called upon the respective classes for every fiftieth man for public service. Pennsylvania concentrated the requisite power in the president, Mr. Reed, and authorised him to draw forth the resources of the state, under certain limitations, and if necessary to declare martial law over the state. The execution of these arrangements, although uncommonly vigorous, lagged far behind."

Proceedings of Congress.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

Saturday, Oct. 29. A letter was received from the secretary of the navy in reply to the resolve of this house of the 24th inst. stating that the whole of the official papers, books, trophies, and every thing else belonging to that office, were saved on the late incursion of the enemy into this city, and that all the books and papers relating to the office of the accountant of that department were saved, except the papers relating to accounts settled and transmitted to the treasury department.

Mr. Clifton introduced a resolution requesting the president to recommend a day of public humiliation, fasting and prayer. Twice read and committed.

The house went into committee of the whole, on the bill to authorize a loan. Mr. Eppes moved to fill the blank for the amount to be borrowed, with three millions. The secretary of the treasury had recommended, in his letter, a larger sum to be borrowed; but since that letter had been written, it was ascertained that three of the six millions of stock proposed to be sent to Europe for sale had not yet left the country, and the president had determined to retain it. The retention of this stock from the market would, by so much as its amount, reduce the additional amount necessary to be authorised. It was therefore determined to ask only for three millions on this occasion.

The blank was filled accordingly.

The bill was amended so as to limit the interest, or premium at 8 per cent. The committee then rose and reported the bill to the house—the amount proposed to be loaned was confirmed, but the amendment to limit the interest was rejected, as being unusual; for the amendment 51 against it 97. On this subject there was a considerable range of debate. Other amendments were proposed, but none approved of. The simple bill to authorize a loan of three millions, was ordered to be engrossed.

Mr. Wilson of Massachusetts offered for consideration the following resolution:

Resolved, That the committee of Ways and Means enquire into the expediency of suspending the collection of the Direct Tax and Internal Duties in those districts of the state of Massachusetts, which are in possession of the enemy.

The house agreed, 62 to 47, now to consider the resolution.

Mr. Sharp of Kentucky who had voted for the consideration of the resolution, desired that the gentleman would state his object.

Mr. Wilson, stated that the enemy having possession of Eastport and Castine, thus possesses the command of territory which belonged to two collection districts; one of the collectors of which resided within the territory thus occupied, and the other just without it, although five-sixths of the territory attached to his district was in possession of the enemy. It was the duty of those collectors, according to law, to proceed in the collection of the duties. These duties, the British governor Sherbrooke, as gentlemen had no doubt seen in the public papers, had required the collectors to pay over to his officers established at Castine or Eastport; and with this requisition the collectors must comply, or suffer confiscation of their property; on the other hand, they would violate the duty according to law, if they did not proceed in their collection. He wished to relieve them from this disagreeable alternative, and to put it out of the power of the British government to tax the people through the intervention of American officers.

Mr. Wright of Maryland said there was nothing new in this proposition, as precedents might be found for it in the journals of the old congress. Whenever a district was in possession of the enemy, some provision of this kind ought to be interposed to relieve the people as well as the collectors. Mr. Wright, was for doing equal justice to all; for considering the people of all parts of the union as one great family; and, in regard to this question, he was willing to begin with Massachusetts, any thing in her denunciations of the general government to the contrary notwithstanding.

After a few words of explanation from Mr. Wilson—

The resolution was agreed to 70 to 42.

Monday, October 27. Mr. Eppes from the committee of Ways and Means, reported a bill for authorising the secretary of State, during the continuance of the present war to give additional compensation of masters of vessels for bringing home destitute and distressed American seamen from abroad; which was read and committed.

The bill to authorise a loan of 3 millions was passed.

A bill was received from the senate entitled "An act authorising the president of the United States to cause to be built or purchased the vessels therein described." The bill provides for building or purchase and employment of any number not exceeding twenty vessels, to carry not less than 8 or more than 14 guns.]

The bill was twice read and referred to the committee on naval affairs; and

The house adjourned.

Tuesday, Nov. 1.—The Speaker laid before the house a letter from the secretary of the treasury, transmitting a report of the papers lost or destroyed from the treasury in consequence of the incursion of the enemy on the 24th day of August last; whereby it appears that no papers essential to the adjustment of pending accounts, or of material value, were lost or destroyed.

The house resumed the consideration of the bill for allowing compensation to com. Barney's officers and men, for the loss of their clothing, &c.

Mr. Pleasants of Va. took occasion to read the following letter he had received from commodore Barney since this subject was last under consideration:

Baltimore, Oct. 30. 1814.

Hon. Mr. Pleasants,

SIR—It was not until this morning that I saw a short sketch of the debate on the "Flotilla Bill." I was much surprised at what was said on that occasion; for it was well known when orders were given to blow up the flotilla, that the enemy were firing upon them from 40 barges with cannon and rockets, and had landed a body of marines at Pig Point, within a mile of the flotilla. The orders from the secretary of the navy to me, were to keep the flotilla above the enemy, and if they attempted to march for Washington to land my men, leaving sufficient to destroy the flotilla if attacked. On Sunday 21st of August, finding the enemy on the road to the Wood-Yard direct for Washington, I landed upwards of four hundred men, leaving only eight men in each barge to take care of them or destroy them as the case might be, but by no means to suffer them to fall into the hands of the enemy; most of the baggage and all the bedding of the men which were landed was left on board, not wishing to encumber my men with much baggage. On Monday morning the 22nd, we joined the army at the Wood-Yard, where I found the marine corps and five pieces of heavy artillery, which the secretary of the navy had the precaution to send forward from Washington and place under my command. I need not relate our services afterwards—but when the flotilla was blown up, we, and not the enemy "were a day's march from it," of course could not save the baggage. So far from being able to get "farther up the river," as was said, the vessels were aground and blown up in that situation; and as to having time to save the baggage, so contrary is the truth, that several of the men were taken prisoners in the act of destroying the flotilla, and still remain so. Much more might be said on this subject, but the winter coming on imperiously calls for some assistance to these unfortunate men.

I have the honor to be, sir, your obedient servant.

JOSHUA BARNEY.

The amendment pending, when this subject was last before the house, was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. J. G. Jackson, the word "officers" was stricken out of the bill 53 to 47. His reason was, that it would set a bad precedent for remuneration of officers in other cases where they should lose baggage, which frequently occurred.

The bill thus amended, was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading on to-morrow.

The resolution "requesting the president of the United States to recommend a day of public humiliation, fasting and prayer," was read a third time and passed.

Wednesday, Nov. 2. The bill for the relief of the petty officers and seamen under com. Barney was passed.

The house resolved itself into a committee of the whole on the bill to authorize the president to accept the services of volunteers. The bill provides that they shall serve nine months, which produced considerable debate; and a motion to strike out nine and insert twelve prevailed—57 to 55.

Mr. Forsythe moved to add as an amendment to the bill a new section in nearly the following words: "And be it further enacted, That the officers, non-commissioned officers and privates, whose services are accepted under the authority of this act, who shall serve for two years, shall be exempted from militia service during the present war."

Which was agreed to—54 to 51. Other proposed amendments failed. The committee rose and reported the bill to the house; when the amendments made were agreed to, as was also the proposition of Mr. Kilbourn, to extend to privates killed during the service, the same provisions for the relief of their widows and children, as is provided in the bill for officers' families.

The bill was then ordered to lie on the table.

The following resolution was submitted by Mr. Robertson, and agreed to—

Resolved, That the committee on naval affairs be instructed to enquire into the expediency of giving a bounty to the owners, officers and crews of privateers, for the vessels of the enemy destroyed at sea, and that they have leave to report by bill or otherwise.

Events of the War.

MISCELLANEOUS.

From Niagara, in the absence of official accounts, we have a multitude of rumors and reports, from all which we conclude that the campaign has closed on our part. It is certain that Porter's volunteers have been discharged with the thanks of general Izard—that Brown has gone to Sackett's Harbor—that the British fleet, including the St. Lawrence of 102 guns, has been at the head of the lake. She is said to be a very fine vessel, and "took on board at Kingston 700 barrels of pork and 1200 men, including sailors." We are without the details of Bissell's affair with the enemy on the Chippewa, though an account published in a Boston paper says he beat them with a loss on their part of 200 men—ours, 16 killed, 54 wounded. We are not certain where Izard was. It is variously reported that he has re-crossed to Buffalo, which, however, does not absolutely appear—1500 of Brown's division have marched for the Harbor, where an attack was looked for.

An idea very generally prevails that Drummond ought to have been taken, and that we had him completely in our power. One chance, it is said, was lost by the want of the co-operation of the fleet, then master of the lake; another in the time consumed by general Izard in proceeding from Plattsburg to Erie, say from August 24 to October 12.

MEANNESS. The meanness of the transaction noticed in the following correspondence, presents our enemy in a new character, infamous and humiliating to man. It should cover Drummond, and the nation to whom he belongs, so far as they sanction it, with eternal shame. When general Brown announced the exchange of gallant Spencer dead, for the Englishman living, there was something within us that would not fully believe that lieutenant-general Drummond would insist upon, or captain Loring agree to the exchange. But it seems they are as destitute of high souled honor, as Cockburn is of decency and humanity. Is this "British magnanimity?"

Copy of a letter from general Brown to general Drummond, August 2d, 1814.

SIR—A letter said to be dictated by you, but signed by lieutenant colonel Harvey has been laid before me. As it was proposed to exchange your aid for mine, I desired first to ascertain if my aid yet lived. But as it appears my flag sent direct from the American shore, for the purpose of ascertaining the fact, has been detained, I waive the objection that induced my mind at the time the proposal was received. Send me the body of my aid captain Spencer, by his brother if he is dead, and your aid captain Loring shall be returned to you. If captain Spencer is not dead, any attention that you will cause to be paid to him, will be gratefully acknowledged; but I do not desire to have him removed 'till it can be done with safety, as his life is dear to me. Of this however, I am willing his brother should be the judge; and you can pass him by the front, the flank or the rear of your army, as may by you be deemed most prudent and proper. The favor I ask is, that Mr. Spencer may be so far indulged as to be allowed to see his brother, and if dead collect his effects.

Very respectfully your humble servant.

(Signed) JACOB BROWN, maj. gen.

Lieutenant general Drummond.

Copy of the reply of general Drummond.

British head quarters, camp before Erie, Aug. 5. SIR—I am extremely sorry to acquaint you, that it has just been reported to me that captain Spencer died this forenoon. He had the melancholy satisfaction of having had his brother with him for some time previous to his death.

Mr. Spencer with the corpse of captain Spencer, shall be sent over to Schlessers, when I shall expect the fulfilment on your part of your promise to send back captain Loring.

I have the honor to be, sir, with respectful consideration, your most obedient humble servant, (Signed) GORDON DRUMMOND, lieutenant gen.

His ex. maj. gen. Brown, U. S. army.

A MESSENGER. Mr. Purviance, a bearer of despatches for our ministers in Europe, sailed from New York some days ago, in the cartel ship Fingal, for Havre de Grace. About 120 passengers went out in this ship, among whom was col. Barclay, late British agent for prisoners.

DISAPPOINTMENT. The want of correct information from the Niagara frontier appears to be owing to two failures of the mail—the first by high waters, and the second by the carelessness of some one in changing the bags, so that the one from Buffalo was sent back!

BOSTON, OCT. 24. Previous to the close of the extra session, which took place on Tuesday last, several acts were passed relative to defensive measures. It is provided, by one of these acts, that his excellency the governor shall have power to raise by enlistments, an army not exceeding 10,000 men, to consist of ten regiments of infantry, and two of artillery, to be commissioned, and clothed agreeably to his direction. The pay, rations, clothing and emoluments of these troops are to be the same as those of the United States army. Another act was also passed, authorising the governor to appoint a board of commissioners on military accounts; it is to consist of three persons with a secretary and necessary clerks: to this act is subjoined an additional one, providing for the further appointment of two other commissioners, the whole of whom are to constitute a board of war, for a regular and prompt discharge of the duties necessarily belonging to such a commission.

THE ENEMY IN THE CHESAPEAKE.

Action at Kirby's Windmill. When captain Burd with his dragoons charged on the enemy on Monday last, they were on the retreat towards their barges: the charge was made with so much spirit, that a number of the enemy had actually laid down their arms preparing to surrender, and it is probable that the whole of the party would have been captured, if the troop had continued to press on them with the same spirit and energy with which the charge was commenced. Unfortunately, some miscreant called loudly to the troop to retreat, which they mistook for an order from their officer and obeyed. Captain Burd succeeded in rallying a part of his troop as soon as he discovered the mistake and was returning to the charge—but the enemy in the mean time recovering from their consternation had rallied behind a fence which served them as a protecting breast work, enabled them to pour a very galling fire on the part of the troop which were pursuing, and finally to effect their retreat without much loss.

Accounts from Norfolk of the 1st inst. say, that a frigate with 4 transports, all full of troops, have entered the bay from Halifax, as the enemy reported to our flag that had been up to the commander; and gives the whole force then in the Chesapeake, at two 74's, 6 frigates, 1 brig, 5 transports, and 8 schooners. Whether they are the vanguard of a larger force or merely sent hither to alarm our villagers and cottagers—we shall ascertain pretty soon.

CHRONICLE.

New-York legislature was lately in session. The state of parties therein may be seen by the following vote for speaker:

Mr. Young (rep.)	61
Mr. Emott (fed.)	35

Maryland election.—The late election in this state has terminated in a considerable "federal" gain, as well of assemblymen as of congressmen. The representation in the present congress consists of 6 rep. and 3 fed.—in the next there will be 5 fed. and 4 rep. as follows—Messrs. Stuart, Goldsborough, Hanson, Baer and Herbert, federalists—and Messrs. Wright, Pinkney, Moore and Archer, republicans.

The house of representatives stands as follows:

Republican.—Annapolis city 2; Baltimore city 2; county 4; Harford 4; Queen Ann's 4; Washington 4; and in Anne Arundel 1.—Total 21.

Federal.—St. Mary's, Charles, Calvert, Prince George's, Montgomery, Frederick, Alleghany, Cecil, Kent, Talbot, Caroline, Dorchester, Somerset and Worcester, 4 each, and in Anne Arundel 3.—Total 59.

New-Hampshire election.—Federal members of congress have been chosen in this state, as usual. Highest fed. 18,126—highest rep. 16,604—the scattering votes leaves a majority of 753, for Messrs. Webster, Cilley, Hale, Atherton, Vose and Wilcox.

Pennsylvania election.—The returns of the late election in this state have not yet reached us. Governor Snyder is re-elected by 20,000—but five federal gentlemen have been elected for the next congress. The present representation is entirely republican. Particulars when all the returns are received.

Georgia election.—Six republicans have been elected to congress from Georgia without [federal] opposition.

Vermont Election. The federalists have elected their candidates for governor, congress, &c. in the state of Vermont, and had a majority, on an election for speaker of 24. Governor Chittenden had 55 votes more than Mr. Galusha (rep.) but not a majority of the whole number given, and was re-elected by a joint ballot of both houses, by a majority of 28. The votes were for M. Chittenden, 17466—J. Galusha, 17411; scattering 457.

The council (federal) had a majority of about 100 votes. The federal members of congress had a majority of about 750 votes.

Ohio election. Thomas Worthington, now a senator in congress, has been chosen governor of the state of Ohio, and the representatives in congress are republican, as usual.

South Carolina election. The elections in this state have terminated in favor of the republicans with the usual decided majorities, for congress and the state legislature, except that one federal member of congress is elected by a small majority.

Connecticut election. The old members of congress have been re-elected. The house of representatives consists of 200 members, all federalists but 39.

New Jersey election. This state is thoroughly republican, by handsome majorities, for congress and assembly. Mr. Pennington has been re-elected governor. The 6 members for congress are republican, in the present congress 4 fed. 3 republican.

Congress.—It is estimated that the next house of representatives will consist of about 114 republicans and 68 federalists.

Mexico.—We have received accounts which we think worthy of full credit, which state that on the reception of the intelligence that Ferdinand the ungrateful, had destroyed the new constitution, all parties united to establish a government for themselves—the viceroy had been deposed, and the new state of things proclaimed in all the cities of this delightful country. This is good news, indeed. It is reported that a deputation is on its way to Washington city.

An exterminating war, of various success, still prevails in the provinces of Caracas. The revolutionists under Bolivar are stated to have experienced a dreadful defeat on the 15th of June last, by which nearly the whole army was destroyed. But the cities of Caracas and Lagaira had not been taken by the royalists at our last dates.

By papers laid before parliament we have the following facts:

The bank of England notes in circulation July 3, 1813, amounted to 23,314,890£—on July 10, same year, to 24,991,308£. In circulation July 3, 1814, 26,304,308£—on the 9th July instant, 29,532,900£.

The net produce of the revenue, including customs and excise, was, for one year, ending 5th July, 1813, 58,967,864£; and for the year ending July 5, instant, 62,956,077£. [W. E. Palladium.]

The inquisition is restored at Rome.

The great military establishments kept up by the chief powers of Europe, and a restless spirit that appears to pervade all the late belligerents, strengthen the apprehension that a new war is not far distant. The British have a large force in the Netherlands.

The British are preparing to give up Martinique and Guadaloupe to the French—who are also making great preparations to repossess themselves of Hispaniola, in which they are assisted by the British, furnishing transports.

London, July 26. A terrible pestilential sickness has broken out in Hamburg, inasmuch that almost every person who has left the city has been afflicted with it.—The horrid filth which abounds in the city, in some places is several yards in height, and many in circumference, and so shocking that the inhabitants are afraid to pass near it. Trade at a stand—markets overstocked—goods selling at 35 per cent. loss.

The Algerines have taken 8 Swedish, 1 Danish, 2 Dutch, and 3 Spanish vessels. They released the first on learning that men of war was coming to negotiate about them.

Bodies of Austrian, Russian and Prussian troops have been sent to Tuscany to embark for Elba, which indicates mischief to be brewing there.

Antwerp, Aug. 11. The agents of the French navy, will on the 31st. publicly sell at the navy yard of Antwerp, nine ships of the line and two frigates, now on the stocks, viz:

2 three deckers	pierced for 110 guns each.
3 do.	do.	80	do.
4 do.	dg.	74	do.
2 frigates	dg.	44	do.

To the house of representatives of the United States

I transmit to the house of representatives a report from the department of state, complying with their resolution of the 15th instant.

JAMES MADISON.

October 28, 1814.

REPORT.

Department of state, Oct. 27, 1814.

The acting secretary of state, to whom was referred the resolution of the house of representatives of the 15th instant, has the honor of submitting to the president the accompanying papers, marked Nos. 1, 2, 3, and 4, as containing the information which is presumed to be called for by the said resolution.

Respectfully submitted.

No. 1.

Extract of a letter from Reuben G. Beasley, Esq. to the commissary general of prisoners, dated LONDON, March 18, 1814.

"Having had several conversations on the subject of retaliation, previous to the receipt of your letters of the 6th and 9th of January, I took the earliest occasion to communicate the information they contained. On the 19th ultimo, I addressed a letter to the transport board on the subject, a copy of which I have now the honor to inclose. Although I have received no reply to this letter, I have the satisfaction to inform you that I have been assured by the secretary of the board, and have found the fact confirmed by my own observation, that the treatment of the individuals sent to this country for trial, has in no respect been different from that of the other prisoners of war."

Mr. Beasley to the secretary of the transport board.

HARTLEY-STREET, Feb. 19, 1814.

SIR—In consequence of the wish which you verbally expressed to me yesterday, I now present to the board, in the form in which it has been communicated to me by the commissary general of prisoners of the United States, a statement of the various measures of retaliation which have been forced on the American government by the unwarrantable acts of the British officers. I the more readily comply with this wish, because it will lead to a proper understanding on the subject, and I persuade myself it will be followed by measures on the part of the British government, which will not only relieve the suffering individuals, but put an end to the proceedings, the very idea of which is so painful to every generous and humane feeling. I begin in the order in which they occurred.

(Here follows the statement extracted from general Mason's letter of the 6th January, 1814.)*

To the foregoing I have to add, that information has been received by the commissary general that the British commanding officer at Halifax had confined there 64 American officers, with intention to make the number 92, in retaliation for the 46 British officers confined by the American government. As soon as this should be officially communicated to the government, a correspondent and effectual measure would be adopted in the United States.

In this statement and the documents which accompany it, will be found the disposition and sentiments of the American government. It will be seen that this system was not begun by the United States. Prompt in the discharge of the duty they owe to their citizens, they have constantly lamented the necessity of the measure imposed on them, and have on every occasion shewn, as you will see exemplified in the first, second, third and fourth acts above recited, that the moment the necessity of detention ceased to exist, the persons confined have at all times been released.

The British agent in the United States, who has been regularly informed of every circumstance relative to this unpleasant subject, will no doubt have done the American government the justice to say, that the sufferings of the individuals concerned have been as little as the nature of the case would admit.

It has been thought extraordinary that contrary to the stipulations of the cartel, American prisoners have been sent to this country from Canada. This measure was strongly remonstrated against to col. Barclay some time ago; but so far from having produced the desired effect, it has been continued under circumstances of the greatest hardship and suffering. About 400 of these persons, many of whom had never before been at sea, were hurried on board ship without the least previous notice to provide themselves with necessaries; and in that situation exposed to a boisterous winter passage. The government of the United States has sought in vain for a legitimate motive for this conduct, which will necessarily lead to a corresponding measure of severity if not satisfactorily explained.

I am instructed to make enquiry relative to the situation of all the prisoners who have from time to time been sent to this country; and to give information of the places of confinement and treatment of those who were sent here for trial.

I have to remark, that while the British prisoners in the United States have been treated in exact conformity to the stipulations contained in the cartel, no change whatever has been made in the treatment of American prisoners in close confinement, nor has any satisfactory reason been given why they have not been placed on the same footing.

The situation of the British officers who are held in the U. States as hostages to answer in their persons for the safety and proper treatment of the American prisoners, will be found described in the extract of a letter herewith transmitted, dated 13th December, 1814, and it will continue the same while it is understood that American officers in the hands of the British government meet with similar treatment.

I am, sir, your most obedient servant,

(Signed)

R. G. BEASLEY.

No. 2.

Extracts of a letter of instructions from the secretary of state to colonel Tobias Lear, appointed to negotiate, on the part of the United States, an exchange of prisoners of war, with sir George Prevost, dated

WASHINGTON, June 27, 1814.

"On the subject of hostages, if any are required

* This statement contained the substance of the cases to be found in the report of the secretary of state of the 14th April, 1814, printed by order of the senate, from page 13 to 173.

on either side, it cannot be admitted, that a number of prisoners shall be left in the hands of the enemy in that state, or in any other, different from the ordinary state of prisoners of war, greater than shall be held by us to answer for their proper treatment and safety."

"You are not unacquainted with the case which induced the government to designate certain persons, prisoners of war, in our possession, to abide the fate of such American prisoners of war as the enemy had thought proper to separate from their comrades, and to transport, under severe and ignominious confinement, to England, for trial as traitors. While this treatment continued, and while there was a probability of the threatened trial and punishment, this government could not and would not have relaxed in the measures it had adopted. Information, however, having been recently received from Mr. Beasley, American agent for prisoners at London, dated on the 18th day of March last, by which it is known, that he had received assurances, and that he was satisfied of the fact, that the treatment of the individuals sent to that country, avowedly for trial, has been in no respect different from that of other prisoners of war, the president has been induced to hope, from this circumstance, as well as from the length of time which has elapsed since these persons have been in England, without having been brought to trial, that it is not the intention of the British government to take a step which would inevitably involve consequences shocking to humanity; and sincerely desirous of lessening, as much as possible, the sufferings of individuals on both sides, he has determined, that, reserving to the government the full right of replacing the hostages who may have been designated here, and retaining the power to do so, such of the prisoners taken from the command of sir George Prevost, as have been so designated, may now be exchanged. You are accordingly authorised to stipulate that the proposed release and exchange shall be without distinction of hostages, taking care that it shall be reciprocal, and that a special reservation be made of the right, which may be common, to replace them, whenever it is deemed proper to do so."

No. 3.

Extracts of such parts of a convention, for the exchange of prisoners of war, proposed on the 15th of April, 1814, and of the instrument, by which it was modified, and finally agreed upon, on the 16th July following, between agents duly authorised by the secretary of state of the United States, on the one part, and sir George Prevost, commander in chief of the British forces in the Canadas, on the other, as relates to those who had been on either side confined under the system of retaliation.

Extract of the convention of the 15th of April.

Article I. It is mutually stipulated and agreed, that all the persons belonging to the army, navy, or militia, of the united kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, or the provinces or dependencies thereof, under the command, authority, and jurisdiction of his excellency sir George Prevost, or any subjects or residents thereof, within the same command, authority, and jurisdiction, who may have been made captives during the present war, under and by the command and authority of the government of the United States, and also all persons belonging to the navy, army, or militia, of the United States, or any of them, or the territories thereof, or citizens or residents of the same, or any of them, who may have been made captives, during the present war, by and under the command and authority of sir George Prevost aforesaid; and which said persons, so respectively captured, are now held in confinement by the said respective parties, either as prisoners of war, hostages, or otherwise, shall be mutually and respectively forthwith released from confinement, and sent or permitted to proceed to the United States or Canada, respectively, in the manner hereinafter pointed out, with as little delay as may be, saving and excepting always the first three and twenty men first put into confinement on principles of retaliation, as hostages, by the United States, and the officers and non-commissioned officers put into confinement by his excellency sir George Prevost, in retaliation for the confinement of said twenty-three men, private soldiers.

Article IX. It is further mutually agreed that all the persons thus released, and sent or permitted to return to their respective countries, who are now in Lower Canada, or on the eastern side of the Alleghany mountains in the United States, and also all prisoners of war who are now on parole or otherwise in their respective countries, be and the same are hereby declared to be exchanged, and that they and every of them, from and after the 15th May next, shall be perfectly and entirely free to enter and engage in the military, naval, or other service of their respective countries, as if they never had been prisoners of war and hostages; and in like manner all the said persons who are on the western side of the Alleghany mountains in the United States, and those who are in or near Halifax, or in Nova Scotia, and who were captured by and under the command of sir George Prevost, shall be and are hereby declared exchanged and at liberty to enter into the naval, military, or other service of their respective countries, as if they had never been made prisoners of war and hostages.

Article XII. It is further mutually agreed and expressly understood, that nothing herein contained is intended or shall in any manner prevent or hinder either party from resorting to retaliation, or replacing said hostages, whenever either may deem it proper, for the past or any future act or conduct of the opposite party.

Extracts of the instrument of modification and ratification of the 16th July, 1813.

PREAMBLE.—"The following modification of the said convention of the 15th April last, have been agreed to; in consequence of which, the same is hereby ratified and confirmed, on the part of the United States, in virtue of the full powers given to the aforesaid Tobias Lear, the same having been before ratified by his excellency sir George Prevost," &c.

"Article I. The twenty-three British soldiers put into confinement as hostages by the United States, and the forty-six American commissioned and non-commissioned officers put in confinement by his excellency sir George Prevost, in retaliation for the confinement of the said twenty-three soldiers, as mentioned in the first article of the aforesaid convention, are to be immediately released and exchanged, in the same manner as other prisoners of war mentioned in the said article.

"Article II. All accounts of exchange, relative to prisoners of war, officers, non-commissioned officers and privates, of the army, navy, and militia, of the government of Great Britain, and of the United States of America, and of all other persons, subjects or residents of the one, or citizens or residents of the other, captured by the forces under the command of sir George Prevost, or from his command or authority, during the present war between Great Britain and the United States, prior to the fifteenth of April last, and for the release and exchange of whom it is stipulated, by the ninth article of the aforesaid convention of the 15th April aforesaid, and the twenty-three and forty-six hostages, before mentioned, are by this present modification definitively liquidated and settled, without either party having any pretension or right to any claim therein hereafter."

No. 4.

Extract of a letter from colonel Thomas Barclay, to the commissary general of prisoners, dated at Bladensburg, 14th June, 1814.

"Should there be any British prisoners of war remaining in these states from New-York, eastward, permit me to recommend their being released, and sent in the Matilda cartel, lately arrived at Salem, with American prisoners. In the number I hope you will include all those now held as hostages, and beg leave to assure you, I have recommended to the admiral and general, the release of all Americans held on similar principles, to the state of ordinary prisoners; and that Mr. Mitchell be informed, he is at liberty to elect them to be sent to these states, in return for British prisoners received."

Extract of a letter from the commissary general of prisoners to colonel Thomas Barclay, dated June 21st, 1814, in answer to colonel Barclay's letter of June 14, 1814.

"On the subject of hostages, I will cheerfully direct to be released, and sent to Halifax, any such as we now hold on the maritime frontier of Massachusetts; if you will engage that the persons at Halifax, on whose account they were confined, shall be immediately released and returned to the United States. I believe there are but sixteen of that description whose names are enclosed. The few then remaining, with the desire to meet the relaxation proposed by you I will direct to be confined with other non-paroled prisoners, on board the prison ship at Salem."

Bla-ensburg, June 21, 1814.

sir—I had hoped, in consequence of my having acquainted you I had recommended the naval and military commanders at Halifax to release to the state of ordinary prisoners all the Americans then held on retaliatory principles, that this government would have been induced to adopt a similar conciliatory measure, and thereby relieve the unfortunate men who have been so unpleasantly situated. You will by a re-perusal of my late letters on this subject, perceive the unpleasant consequences to which his majesty's government will be driven, if the acts above mentioned on the part of his majesty do not meet a corresponding conduct on the part of this government.

Mr. Prince, the marshal of Massachusetts has informed Mr. Simpson, that you have directed him to retain eighteen British prisoners as hostages, for a like number of men part of the 101 American prisoners sent last autumn to England.

On the 14th instant I requested you to inform me, whether you would consent that all the British prisoners who might remain in the eastern states after the departure of the Perseverance cartel to Halifax, should be sent in the Matilda cartel for Halifax, for whom I would order an equivalent to be returned. A measure of this nature must prove equally advantageous to both nations. Permit me to request your answer, and if it is the determination of this government to hold any British subjects as hostages, that you will favor me with a list of their names, the persons they are held for, and the places of confinement.

I have the honor to be, sir, your obedient servant,
(Signed) THOMAS BARCLAY.

Extract of a letter from colonel Thomas Barclay to the commissary general of prisoners, dated at Bladensburg, June 22d, 1814.

"sir—I am this moment honored with your letter of yesterday.

"I am pleased with your consenting to send all the British prisoners remaining in the eastern states to Halifax, and that the hostages are to be included. I have repeatedly informed you, that I had requested every American prisoner held as an hostage at Halifax, should be released to the state of ordinary prisoners, and that Mr. Mitchell should be at liberty to select whom he pleased in making up the equivalent to be sent from Halifax. I will be answerable that the above is carried into effect, and that an equivalent, under Mr. Mitchell's election, is immediately sent from Halifax to Salem, in return for the men whom the Matilda carries from Salem."

Extract of a letter from the commissary general of prisoners to colonel Thomas Barclay, dated at Washington, June 22, 1814.

"I have received your letters of this date, and of the 21st instant. I shall in consequence of your engagement in that of the 21st inst. and in compliance with the terms of mine, of yesterday, by the mail made up to-day, instruct Mr. Prince to collect all the prisoners he can in reasonable time and send by the cartel Matilda, and such hostages as have been designated in retaliation against American prisoners confined at Halifax.

"The other hostages designated for American prisoners sent to England will be placed in the ordinary state of non-paroled prisoners, and those at Fort Sewall removed to the prison ship at Salem for that purpose."

Bladensburg, August 9, 1814.

sir—I had hoped, in consequence of my several letters to you on the subject of retaliation, and the release of all the American prisoners held as hostages in his majesty's dominions under retaliatory orders, of which I have given you notice, that this government would have been induced to follow the example, and place in the ordinary state of prisoners, ready for release and exchange, the few British prisoners named at the foot of this letter who are still held in confinement as hostages.

I request you will be pleased to inform me, whether it is the intention of this government to continue these unfortunate men in prison as hostages, and to withhold their release and exchange; and I beg leave to add, that if this is the case double the number of American prisoners will once more be placed in a similar state of confinement in retaliation for these men.

I have the honor to be, sir, your obedient servant,
(Signed) THOMAS BARCLAY.

In Massachusetts—John Price, R. Robertson, John Anderson, John Egan, James Dawson, Henry Beddingfield, William Kins.

In Rhode-Island—William Lincoln.

Extract of a letter from the commissary general of prisoners to colonel Thomas Barclay, dated August 2, 1814.

sir—In reply to your letter of the 9th instant, I shall pass over the terms in which you have thought proper to convey part of that letter, with the remark, that after the manner in which the subject of hostages had been treated in your letter of the 14th of June, and mine of the 21st and 22d of the same month; considering the information I had given you in my letter of the 20th of May, of the relaxation which had taken place in the condition of the twenty-three hostages in our power at Greenbush, and the cause of it, and the communication I had made you as late as the 28th ultimo, if the convention concluded with sir George Prevost, by which these and all other hostages appertaining to the class of prisoners captured by or from his command, were released and finally exchanged; it could not have been expected, when you thought proper to make further inquiry as to the situation of those persons yet remaining in our possession, who had been hostages, and the intention of the government towards them, you should have then resorted to the same declaration of consequences, conveyed in terms amounting to a threat, which you had been informed in the letter I addressed to you on the 11th of June, on a former occasion, was unavailing, and had been considered exceptionable.

In my letter of the 22nd of June, I informed you, that those who had been hostages and not sent for exchange for the cartel then in port, should be restored to the ordinary state of prisoners. Why, then, unless you were well assured that this had not been, do you say in yours of the 2nd instant, you had hoped that the American government would have been induced to follow the example of your government. The fact is, at this time there is no British prisoner in this country in any other situation. The order to that effect went from this office on the 22d of June, as to the prisoners in Massachusetts, and on the 19th of July as to one (William Lincoln) in Rhode Island. The copy of my letter to the marshal of that state, now sent, will explain the cause of his confinement being thus much lengthened, namely, his attempt to escape.

The reasons which determined this government to relax in the mode of treatment toward hostages, are detailed in that letter, and were the same which induced it to accept a proposition on the part of sir George Prevost, to include all hostages on both sides in the general exchange of prisoners made with him, with the reservation of the right to replace them with others, should it from any change of circumstances be deemed necessary. These reasons, to wit: Information from our agent in London, that the American prisoners sent to England for trial were not then confined or treated otherwise than ordinary prisoners, operating generally so soon as they had been acted on in the exchange of part of the hostages held by us in the quarter just mentioned, produced instructions from this office to put on the same footing "the persons heretofore designated as hostages of the maritime class, and to hold them ready for exchange: they are accordingly now so held."

DOCUMENTS ACCOMPANYING THE MESSAGE OF THE GOVERNOR TO THE GENERAL COURT.

Copy of a letter from the governor of this commonwealth, to the secretary of war.

Boston, September 7, 1814.

SIR—The troops of the United States, which at different periods were stationed on the sea coast of this state, have been afterwards ordered to join the army on the western frontier, so that very few have remained in the state. We have therefore found it necessary, in the course of the last and present year, to call out small bodies of militia, as guards to the towns most exposed. As the danger has increased, the number of detached militia has been augmented, and I have now issued the enclosed general order for the protection of Boston and the towns and property in its neighborhood, and shall immediately issue an order of a similar kind for the security of the district of Maine.

A few weeks since, agreeably to the request of general Dearborn, I detached eleven hundred militia for three months, for the defence of our sea coast, and placed them under his command as superintendent of this military district, but such objections and inconveniences have arisen from that measure, that it cannot now be repeated. The militia called out on this occasion, will be placed under the immediate command of a major-general of the militia.

I will thank you, sir, to consult with the president, and inform me whether the expenses thus necessarily incurred for our protection will be ultimately reimbursed to this state by the general government; and I shall be particularly obliged if you will favor me with an answer as soon as may be, as the legislature of the state will meet on the 5th of the next month.

I am sir, with great respect, your most obedient and humble servant,
CALEB STRONG.

Mr. Secretary Monroe.

Copy of the Secretary's answer.

Department of State, Sept. 17, 1814.

SIR—I have had the honor to receive your excellency's letter of the seventh instant.

The attack of the enemy on Baltimore and probable eventual attack on other places, with the heavy duties incident thereto pressing on this department have prevented my answering it at an earlier day.

It may be satisfactory to your excellency for me to explain the views and principles on which this government has acted, in regard to the defence of our eastern frontier.

It was anticipated, soon after the commencement of the war, that while it lasted, every part of the union, especially the sea-board, would be exposed to some degree of danger, greater or less, according to the spirit with which the war might be waged. It was the duty of the government to make the best provision against the danger which might be practicable, and it was proper that the provision should continue while the cause existed.

The arrangement of the United States into military districts, with a certain portion of the regular force, artillery and infantry, under an officer of the regular army, of experience and high rank, in each district, with power to call for the militia, as circumstances might require, was adopted with a view to afford the best protection to every part that circumstances would admit.

It was presumed, that the establishment of a small force of the kind stated, constituting the first elements of an army, in each district, to be aided by the militia in case of emergency, would be adequate to its defence. Such a force of infantry and artillery, might repel small predatory parties, and form a rallying point for the militia, at the more exposed and important stations, in case of more formidable invasion. A regular officer of experience stationed in the district, acting under the authority, and pursuing the will of the government, might digest plans for its defence; select proper points for works, and superintend the erection of them, call for supplies of ordnance, for tents and camp equipage, for small arms and other munitions of war; call for the militia, and dispose of the whole force. These duties, it was believed, could not be performed with equal advantage by the officers of the militia, who being called into service for short terms, would not have it in their power, however well qualified they might be in other respects, to digest plans, and preserve that chain of connection and system in the whole business, which seemed to be indispensable.

On great consideration, this arrangement was deemed the most eligible, that could be adopted under the authority of the United States. Indeed none occurred that could be placed in competition with it. In this mode the national government acts by its proper organs, over whom it has control, and for whose engagements it is responsible.

The measures which may be adopted by a state government for the defence of a state, must be considered as its own measures, not those of the United States. The expenses attending them are chargeable to the state, and not to the United States. Your excellency will perceive that a different construction would lead into the most important, and, as is believed, into the most pernicious consequences. If a state could call out the militia, and subject the United States to the expense of supporting them, at its pleasure, the national authority would cease as to that important object, and the nation be charged with expenses, in the measures producing which the national government had no agency, and over which it could have no control. This, however, though a serious objection to such a construction is not the most weighty. By taking the defence of the state into its own hands and out of those of the general government, a policy is introduced on the tendency of which I forbear to comment. I shall remark only, that if a close union of the states and a harmonious co-operation between them and the general government, are at any time necessary for the preservation of their independence, and of those inestimable liberties which were achieved by the valor and blood of our ancestors, that time may be considered as having arrived.

It follows from this view of the subject, that if the force which has been put into service by your excellency has been required by major-general Dearborn, or received by him and put under his command, that the expenses attending it will be defrayed by the United States. It follows likewise as a necessary consequence, that if this force has been called into service by the authority of the state, independently of maj. gen. Dearborn, and be not placed under him, as commander of the district, that the state of Massachusetts is chargeable with the expense and not the United States. Any claim which the state may have to reimbursement, must be judged of hereafter, by the competent authority, on a full view of all the circumstances attending it. It is a question which is beyond the authority of the executive.

Your excellency will perceive that this government has no other alternative than to adhere to a system of defence which was adopted on great consideration with the best view to the general welfare, or to abandon it, and with it a principle held sacred; thereby shrinking from its duty, at a moment of great peril, weakening the guards deemed necessary for the public safety, and opening the door to other consequences not less dangerous.

By these remarks it is not intended to convey the idea, that a militia officer of a superior grade regularly called into service, shall not command an officer of the regular army, of inferior grade, when acting together. No such idea is entertained by the government. The militia are relied upon essentially for the defence of the country. In their hands every thing is safe. It is the object of the government to impose on them no burthens, which it may be possible to avoid; and to protect them in the discharge of their duties, in the enjoyment of all their rights.

The various points which are attacked and menaced by the enemy, especially in this quarter, where they are waging in considerable force, a predatory and desolating warfare, make it difficult to provide immediately for all the necessary expenditures. Any aid which the state of Massachusetts may afford to the United States, to meet these expenditures, will be cheerfully received, and applied to the payment and support of the militia of that state, in the service of the United States. It will be proper that the money thus advanced should be deposited in some bank in Boston, that the disbursement of it may be made under the authority of the government of the United States, as in similar cases elsewhere.

Credit will be given to the state for such advance, and the amount be considered a loan to the United States.

I have the honor to be, with the highest respect, sir, your most obedient humble servant,

JAS. MONROE.

His excellency Caleb Strong, &c. &c.

Copy of a letter from the governor of Rhode-Island to the governor of Massachusetts.

Providence, Sept. 21, 1814.

Sir—By virtue of certain resolutions passed by the general assembly of this state, at their session holden on the 15th day of September instant, I am authorized and requested; in case of the invasion of the neighboring states, to march immediately to their assistance such part of the military force of this state as shall be by me thought expedient to detach for that service. And I am also requested to assure your excellency of the readiness of this state to render you all the aid and assistance in our power, in case of invasion or imminent danger thereof, and to solicit the co-operation of your state, and your speedy aid and assistance in case of an invasion of this state, or of imminent danger thereof.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, sir, your obedient servant,

WILLIAM JONES.

His excellency Caleb Strong, Esq.

Boston, Sept. 23, 1814.

Sir—I have received your obliging communication of the 21st inst. and shall lay it before the legislature of this state which will assemble on the 5th of October next. I have no doubt they will sincerely reciprocate the sentiments expressed by your general assembly.

In the meantime I pray you to be assured that I shall be ready to co-operate with you in the present alarming state of public affairs, and in case of invasion of the state of Rhode-Island, or of immediate danger thereof, to afford all the aid and assistance which the powers with which I am entrusted enable me to render.

And that I am with very great respect, sir, your most obedient and humble servant,

CALEB STRONG.

His excellency William Jones,

governor of the state of Rhode-Island.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

Saturday, October 8th.

The committee to whom was referred the message of his excellency, with the documents accompanying the same, respectfully report in part—

That the unhappy and ruinous war, declared against Great Britain, has assumed an aspect of great and immediate danger to this commonwealth. The persevering invasion of Canada, has, at length, produced, as by natural consequence, the invasion of our Atlantic frontier, and River towns. A portion of the territory of this state, is already in the actual occupation of the enemy, and the sea-coast, in all such parts as may be deemed assailable, is openly menaced with desolation. To defend our soil, and to repel the invader, no force or means, bearing any proportion to the emergency, have been provided by the national government. It was justly to have been expected, that, before hostilities were provoked from a formidable enemy, or, at least that, at some period subsequent to their commencement, means of defence and protection would have been afforded to a sea-coast so extended, and so exposed to the ravages of an enemy, as that of Massachusetts. But events forbid a reliance on any such expectation. The principal part of the regular force raised, or at and time quartered in this state, has been withdrawn for the war on the Canada border. The fortifications, until lately strengthened by the exertions of our own citizens, were essentially defective, and the navy in a situation calculated to invite, rather than repel aggression, and to require protection, instead of affording it. Indeed, when the circumstances under which the war was declared, and has been prosecuted, are viewed in connexion with the utter neglect of the ordinary preparation for such a state; the inference is fairly warranted, that the American cabinet intended no other means of defence for this state, but such as a brave and free people would feel themselves impelled to make, by their own sense of danger and love of country. That it relied upon the passions and sufferings, incident to a state of war, to overcome the repugnance so universally felt by our citizens to the unjust and ruinous contest; and to leave them at liberty to drain our population and our treasures for the protection of their favorite enterprises. But when the commonwealth was found to be in danger of invasion, the people have not paused to consider the motives or objects of their national rulers, in leaving them defenceless; but at the summons of their governor, they have repaired to the standard of their country, with a zeal and alacrity which demonstrate, that the principles which unite men of every class and description in the determination to conquer or die in its defence, are not enfeebled by our party divisions. Thousands of brave and hardy yeomanry, composing a part of a well provided and well disciplined militia, have hastened to the post of danger, and other thousands are ready to follow, at a moment's warning. The most liberal and effectual aid has been afforded in erecting forts and batteries; and but one spirit animates the whole mass of our citizens, with the invincible resolution of defending their native land against the incursions of an enemy, who has not discriminated between those who anxiously sought peace, and those who have wantonly provoked the war. It is however a fact, not to be disguised, that while the people of this state with the blessing of Heaven, have confidence in the sufficiency of their resources, for defending their own soil, if applied exclusively to this object, yet they cannot be supposed equal to this, and also competent to respond to the heavy and increasing demands of the national government.

The state of the national treasury, as exhibited by the proper officer, requires an augmentation of existing taxes, and if in addition to these, the people of Massachusetts, deprived of their commerce, and harassed by a formidable enemy, are compelled to provide for the indispensable duty of self-defence, it must soon become impossible for them to sustain this burden. There remains to them therefore no alternative but submission to the enemy, or the control of their own resources, to repel his aggressions. It is impossible to hesitate in making the election. This people are not ready for conquest or submission. But being ready and determined to defend themselves, and having no other adequate means of defence, they have the greatest need of those resources derivable, from themselves, which the national government has hitherto thought proper to employ elsewhere.

Your committee are also of opinion, that if the war is to continue, provision for a military force, in addition to the ordinary militia, must be resorted to; that a considerable force must be embodied, and maintained, ready to meet the enemy in his varied and distant enterprises—that the continual calls upon great bodies of militia, to march from home, at all seasons, and to remain at a distance from their families, will be the more oppressive, and least economical of any mode of defence which can be devised in a protracted warfare.

But while your committee think, that, the people of this commonwealth ought to unite, and that they will unite, under any circumstances, at the hazard of all that is dear, in repelling an invading foe, it is not believed, that this solemn obligation imposes silence, upon their just complaints against the authors of the national misfortunes. It is on the contrary, a sacred duty, to hold up to view on all occasions the destructive policy, by which as late of unparalleled national felicity has been converted into one of humiliation and danger, believing, that, unless an almost ruined people will discard the men and change the measures which have induced this state of peril and suffering, the day of their political salvation is past. It should never be forgotten that this disastrous condition of public affairs, has been forced upon Massachusetts, not merely against her consent, but in opposition to her most earnest protestations. From the moment that the administration, yielding to its own passions, and calculations of party power, commenced its system of commercial hostility to Great Britain, and of conformity to the views of the late tyrant of France, its tendency to involve the nation in the most needless and cruel embarrassments, was distinctly foreseen, and declared by former legislatures. The insufficiency of our youthful, though flourishing commerce, to cope with that of Great Britain in a struggle of restrictions, was announced by the united warning of those best versed in a knowledge of this subject. It was never doubted by these persons, that a war with Great Britain, would be accompanied by an extinction of commerce; by the banishment of our sailors; the desolation of our coast, the blockade and invasion of our sea-ports, the failure of national credit; the necessity of oppressive taxes; and the consummation of national ruin by an alliance with the late despot of Europe, from which greatest of all calamities we have been preserved only by his fall. Of all these evils, were our rulers forewarned by Massachusetts, whose vital interests were thus put in jeopardy; and they were implored by every consideration of policy and humanity, to stay their hands from the cruel and wanton sacrifice of the interests of those who asked from them, nothing but the privilege of pursuing, their own industrious callings. But government deaf to this voice, and listening to men distinguished in their native state only by their disloyalty to its interests, and the enjoyment of a patronage bestowed upon them as its price, have affected to consider the patriotic citizens of this great state as tainted with disaffection to the union and with predilection for Great Britain, and have lavished the public treasury in vain attempts to fix by evidence this odious imputation. Thus dishonored and deprived of all influence in the national councils, this state has been dragged into an unnatural and distressing war, and its safety, perhaps its liberties, endangered.

It is therefore with great concern, that your committee are obliged to declare their conviction, that the constitution of the United States, under the administration of the persons in power, has failed to secure to this commonwealth, and as they believe to the eastern section of this union, those equal rights and benefits, which were the great objects of its formation, and which they cannot relinquish without ruin to themselves and posterity. These grievances justify and require vigorous, persevering and peaceable exertions to unite those who realize the sufferings, and foresee the dangers of the country, in some system of measures, to obtain relief, for which the ordinary mode of procuring amendments to the constitution affords no reasonable expectation, in season to prevent the completion of its ruin. The people however, possess the means of certain redress; and when their safety, which is the supreme law, is in question, these means should be promptly applied. The framers of the constitution, made provision to amend defects which were known to be incidental to every human institution: and the provision itself was not less liable to be found defective upon experiment, than other parts of the instrument. When this deficiency becomes apparent, no reason can preclude the right of the whole people who were parties to it to adopt another; and it is not a presumptuous expectation, that a spirit of equity and justice, enlightened by experience, would enable them to reconcile conflicting interests, and obviate the principal cause of those dissensions, which unfit government for a state of peace and of war, and so to amend the constitution, as to give vigor and duration to the union of the states. But as a proposition for such a convention from a single state, would probably be unsuccessful, and our danger admits not of delay, it is recommended by the committee, that in the first instance, a conference should be invited between those states, the affinity of whose interests is closest, and whose habits or intercourse, from their local situation and other causes are most frequent, to the end, that by a comparison of their sentiments and views, some mode of defence suited to the circumstances and exigencies of those states and measures for accelerating the return of public prosperity may be devised; and also to enable the delegates from those states, should they deem it expedient to lay the foundation for a radical reform in the national compact by inviting to a future convention, a deputation from all the states in the union. They therefore report the following resolves—which are submitted.

H. G. OTIS, per order.

Resolved, That the calamities of war being now brought home to the territory of this commonwealth; a portion of it, being in the occupation of the enemy, our sea-coast and rivers being invaded in several places, and in all exposed to immediate danger, the people of Massachusetts are impelled by the duty of self-defence, and by all the feelings and attachments which bind good citizens to their country, to unite in the most vigorous measures for defending the state and expelling the invader, and no party feelings, or political dissensions can ever interfere with the discharge of this exalted duty.

Resolved, That provision be made by law for raising by voluntary enlistment for twelve months or during the war, a number of troops not exceeding ten thousand to be organized and officered by the governor, for the defence of the state.

Resolved, That the governor be authorized to accept the services of any volunteers, and to organize them as part of the aforesaid troops, who shall hold themselves in readiness to march at a moment's warning to any part of the commonwealth, who shall be entitled to full pay and rations, when in actual service, and to a just compensation short of full pay, to be provided by law, during the entire term of their enlistment.

Resolved, That the governor be authorized to borrow from time to time a sum not exceeding one million of dollars, at an interest not exceeding six per cent. and that the faith of this government be pledged to provide funds at the next session of this legislature at furthest for the payment of the interest on the sums borrowed.

Resolved, That persons be appointed as delegates from this legislature to meet and confer with delegates from the states of New-England, or any of them, upon the subjects of their public grievances and concerns, and upon the best means of preserving our resources and of defence against the enemy, and to devise and suggest for adoption by those respective states, such measures as they may deem expedient; and also to take measures, if they shall think proper for procuring a convention of delegates from all the United States, in order to revise the constitution thereof, and more effectually to secure the support and attachment of all the people by placing all upon the basis of fair representation.

Resolved, That a circular letter from this legislature, signed by the president of the senate, and speaker of the house of representatives, be addressed to the executive government of each of said states, to be communicated to their legislatures, explaining the objects of the proposed conference and inviting them to concur in sending delegates thereto.

Resolved, That on the — day of — instant, this legislature will, by joint ballot, elect — persons to meet such delegates as may be appointed by the said states, or either of them, at — in the state of —.

REPORT

On so much of the message of his excellency the governor as relates to his application to the secretary at war, and the answer thereto.

The committee to whom was referred the message of his excellency the governor, and the documents accompanying the same, beg leave to report as to so much thereof as relates to the application made to the secretary at war, on the subject of having the militia called into service for the defence of this state; that, in their opinion, the application of his excellency to the secretary at war, on the seventh of September last, on the subject of the militia, was highly proper; and corresponds with the watchfulness and zeal which his excellency has always manifested, in guarding the rights and interests of this commonwealth.

That the answer of the secretary at war, to the application so made, is of a character justly to alarm the citizens of this state, and especially that portion of them who have been, and those who may be necessarily called into service, and who will also be called on, to pay their proportions, respectively, of the sums assessed, and to be assessed, as to direct taxes: no part of which sums seems intended to be applied in defending this state from invasion, or in compensating the militia for their services.

The tenor of the answer of the secretary at war, has induced your committee to recur to the principles of the compact entered into between this state and the United States.

It is provided in the fourth section of the fourth article of the constitution, that "the United States shall guarantee to every state in this union, a republican form of government; and shall protect each of them against invasion." To enable the United States to do this, power is given by the eighth section of the first article, "to call forth the militia to execute the laws of the union, suppress insurrections, repel invasions; to provide for organizing, arming, and disciplining the militia; for governing such part of them as may be employed in the service of the United States, reserving to the states, respectively, the appointment of the officers, and the authority of training the militia according to the discipline prescribed by congress." And by the second section of the second article, it is provided, that "the president shall be commander in-chief of the army and navy of the United States, and of the militia of the several states, when called into the actual service of the United States."

Before the adoption of the national form of government, the state of Massachusetts possessed every attribute of sovereignty, and the people of this state would not have surrendered those relating to peace and war, negotiation with foreign powers, and to the resources of this community, founded in taxation, but upon the assurance that the surrendered attributes would have been used, among other purposes, to provide for the common defence, to protect this state against invasion, to promote the general welfare; and to secure the blessings of Liberty to them, and their posterity. At a moment when, when a war voluntarily commenced by our national rulers, is prosecuted to conquer the provinces of the enemy, and is retaliated upon the Atlantic states, with powerful fleets and armies, which according to the late proclamation of the president of the United States, have come to desolate every available place, the committee cannot but consider the answer of the secretary at war as further evidence of a disposition on the part of the present administration to withhold these equal benefits of the union to which this commonwealth is entitled.

It appears from this answer, that the government of the United States, soon after the commencement of the war, anticipated that "the seaboard would be exposed to some degree of danger, according to the spirit with which the war might be waged," and although the armies of the United States were employed to effect the conquest of Canada, and it was therefore, certain that the Atlantic frontier would be invaded, the only provision made by the United States against the impending danger, consisted in dividing the United States into military districts, "with a certain portion of regular force, artillery and infantry, under an officer of the regular army, of experience and high rank, with power to call for the militia as circumstances might require."

If this arrangement was intended as a performance of the highly responsible duties, which the United States had assumed towards the individual states, it behoves the state of Massachusetts to enquire, whether these acts were a performance of these duties; and if not, to seek that redress which is consistent with its rights; and to ascertain the measures necessary to be adopted to meet the dangers which the policy of the national government has produced.

The committee do not find in any terms, used in the constitution, nor by any fair construction of that instrument, a power vested in the president of the United States, to place the militia under the command of any officer of the regular army of the United States. When the militia is called forth for any purpose, intended by the constitution, they are to be commanded by their own officers, subject to the command of the president.

But independently of this assumption of power by which the militia would be subject to the performance of duty indefinite as to time or place, it is not known to your committee, that any such force, as is referred to in the answer of the secretary of war, has been stationed within this commonwealth; nor do they know that any part of the regular army has been employed within this state, excepting to recruit the armies employed on the borders of Canada, and excepting also the number of men usually employed in the forts of the United States in time of peace. In the mean time the whole burden of defence is devolved, in the most inconvenient and costly form on the citizens of this state; who have been called from their families, and their daily employments, and who would not have been disposed to obey the call, but from an highly honorable sense of duty. To the enquiry of his excellency the governor, whether the expenses thus necessarily incurred for the protection of this state from invasion, would be reimbursed by the United States, the secretary of war answers—"That the measures which may be adopted by a state government for the defence of a state, must be considered as its own measures, not those of the United States. That the expenses attending them are chargeable to the state, and not to the United States."

When the people of this commonwealth call to mind, that since the adoption of the federal constitution, thirty millions of dollars have been collected in this state, and paid into the treasury of the United States; when they are daily reminded, by collection of taxes, that the sum of three hundred and sixteen thousand two hundred and seventy-two dollars is now in process of collection, as a direct tax; when they reflect that of the sum of eleven millions six hundred and sixty thousand dollars already appropriated for the year 1814, they will be called on to pay one million two hundred and sixty five thousand dollars, and that the proportion of this state, for the fifty millions that must be raised for the year 1815, if the expenses of that year should be as great as they have been during the year 1814, will exceed five millions and three hundred thousand dollars, they cannot learn without indignation, that no part of these sums are intended to be applied in defraying the expenses incurred by them, in protecting themselves against invasion, unless the militia have been called for by an officer of the regular army of the United States, and the expense incurred under his direction.

Your committee are opinion, that the legislature of Massachusetts are bound to preserve, by all the means in their power, the resources of the state so far as may be necessary for defence in their present perilous and distressing circumstances. But having been informed that the expenses which have been incurred, and those which will be necessarily incurred, in defending this state against invasion, cannot be ascertained during the present session of the legislature; and presuming that the amount thereof will be made known to the legislature at the next session, and that such statements and information will accompany the same as to his excellency the governor may seem proper, your committee respectfully commend that the further consideration of this subject be referred to the next session of the general court.

D. A. WHITE, per order.

In senate, Oct. 13, 1814—Read and accepted.

Sent down for concurrence.

JOHN PHILLIPS, president.

In the house of representatives, Oct. 18.

Read and concurred,

TIMOTHY BIGELOW, Speaker.

In the house of representatives, Oct. 5.

Soon after the house was called to order, a motion was made by Mr. Low of Lyman, which was laid on the table:

Moved, That a committee be appointed to confer with all the New-England states and see if they will agree to appoint a committee to join them, and repair to the city of Washington immediately, then and there personally to make known to the president, the general opinion of all the New England states in regard to the present war, and the manner in which it has been conducted, and inform him that he must either resign his office, as president, or remove those ministers and other officers of the general government, who have by their nefarious plans ruined the nation—with leave to report by bill or otherwise.—Read, and to-morrow, at eleven o'clock, assigned for the consideration of the subject.

[This motion was withdrawn the next day.]

The resolutions attached to the report signed H.

G. Otis (inserted above) were adopted on the 13th of October. The first with only 3 dissentients—on the second the votes were 248 for and 78 against it. The third and fourth were passed without debate. The fifth occasioned a long discussion, but was carried 260 to 90—The sixth and seventh were passed by about the same majority.

October 19.—The convention of both houses proceeded to the choice of twelve delegates, to meet and confer [on the 15th December next] with such as may be chosen by any or all of the other New England states upon our public grievances and concerns—when the committee appointed to collect and count the votes, reported, that the whole number was 215; and that the following gentlemen were elected:

Hon. George Cabot, Harrison G. Otis, Timothy Bigelow, Nathan Dana, William Prescott, Samuel S. Wilde, George Bliss, Joshua Thomas, Rodijah Baylies, Joseph Lyman, Daniel Waldo, Stephen Longfellow.

And they were declared to be unanimously chosen.

Then adjourned to meet at the usual time of the winter session.

* [The delegates were appointed by the votes only of 215 members. The house, I believe, consists of nearly 500. The republicans did not vote in the election, in either branch of the legislature.]

PROTEST

Of the minority of the senate of Massachusetts, against the report of the joint committee of the legislature on the governor's message.

By the honorable the senate of Massachusetts.

The undersigned, members of said senate, beg leave respectfully to object and protest against certain resolutions which were reported by a committee of the legislature and which have been adopted by the senate.

The resolutions, which are more particularly the object of this protest, provide for the appointment of twelve delegates to meet at Hartford, in the state of Connecticut, on the fifteenth day of December next, "To confer with delegates from the other states of New-England, or any of them, upon the subjects of their public grievances and concerns, and upon the best means of preserving our resources and of defence against the enemy, and to devise and suggest for adoption, by those respective states, such measures as they may deem expedient. And also to take measures, if they shall think proper, for procuring a convention of delegates from all the United States, in order to revise the constitution thereof, and more effectually to secure the support and attachment of all the people, by placing all upon the basis of fair representation."

Notwithstanding we deem this proposition, at this time, extraordinary, alarming and pernicious, it is rendered peculiarly so, by the novel, strange and unprecedented doctrines and principles contained in the preamble to the resolutions. We had believed, that the constitution of the United States was the most perfect system of republican government, which human wisdom could invent—Framed by men who had felt the oppressions of tyranny, and in some measure experienced the dangers of anarchy; established upon the broad principles of sovereignty in the states, liberty in the people, and energy in the federal head—and effected by the zeal, concessions and candor of those virtuous and enlightened patriots, who had carried America through a war of unparalleled suffering to independence and peace. We had hoped that neither the ambition of party, nor the test of experiment, would have so soon brought us to the conclusion, that it had "failed to secure to" any "section of the union those equal rights and benefits which were the great object of its formation;" much less, was it to have been suspected, that under the pretext of "reconciling conflicting interests" and in a time of war and invasion and while our constitutional agents were attempting to negotiate a peace, we should promulgate the sentiments to our friends and enemies that the government is "unfit for peace and war"—that a radical reform, or another constitution, were essential to the salvation of the people.

The undersigned have considered that part of the constitution which provides for amendments, as dictated by superior wisdom. While it guards against sudden innovations and ensures stability to the compact, it provides for the correction of those errors and defects which experience alone could discover. And it is with extreme regret that we perceive this attempt at innovation in direct contravention of this salutary provision. If the legislature have no other powers on this subject than those which they derive from the state and federal constitutions, it is manifest, that, in this case they have assumed an authority never delegated to them by the people—And if the legislature have no authority, it is difficult to perceive how they can vest a discretion in their delegates which they themselves do not possess. This, therefore, is an assumption of power, for which this Senate are responsible to the people of this state and the United States; an assumption, which the undersigned utterly disclaim, and against which they most solemnly protest. We are not aware of any defect in the constitution of the United States, which requires even a constitutional attempt at amendment—except the supposed one of unequal or unfair representation none has been pointed out—But as three fifths of the slaves, were enumerated in apportioning the representation among the several states, at the time of the adoption of the constitution, and the direct taxes were apportioned in the same way; as the New England states have a representation in the senate far greater than in proportion to their free population—as no attempt has been made for this alteration, in the mode prescribed by the constitution, and as this could not be effected before the election to the next congress, it is impossible to believe that an attempt of this sort, at this time, can justify this extraordinary convention, or that it is its principal object. But there are other objects more alarming in their nature, and pernicious in their tendency. It was wisely provided by the constitution, that no state should enter into any compact or agreement with another without the consent of congress. It was probably foreseen that disappointed and ambitious men, would attempt to form associations prejudicial to the general welfare and dangerous to the Union of the States. That these men would excite local jealousies, and attempt geographical distinctions—and that despairing of governing the whole, they would attempt a severance that they might govern a part.

It was therefore prudent and proper, that these compacts and agreements should be under the controul of the states and the people represented in congress. It is therefore with great solicitude and concern that we have been led to enquire what "public grievances" can warrant the assembling of delegates of the states of New England, or what "affinity of interest" can authorise them to "devise means of preserving their own resources" to themselves. The respective states of New England, can now preserve all their resources, except such as are under the constitutional control of the United States. Will they combine to take these? Such a combination would be a resistance of federal authority. A civil war would become inevitable; our enemy would profit by our dissensions, our union would be dissolved, our country conquered, and our liberty extinguished. Our country is engaged in a just and (of late) successful war. Our resources are abundant, our government is adequate, and our citizens are brave, enterprising and intelligent. Union alone, can secure us the blessings of an honorable peace. While our commissioners are negotiating with the most earnest solicitude for their country's welfare—while our army and navy are defending the soil and maintaining the honor and glory of our country; while our brave yeomanry are rushing like a torrent, from the mountains to the shore to meet and repel the invader, and the spirit of party is becoming absorbed in the spirit of patriotism, why should Massachusetts, great, powerful, respectable Massachusetts, form a combination which will defeat the hopes of the "friends of peace," and aid and encourage a powerful and vindictive enemy? With these views and feelings, the undersigned cannot but deeply regret, that a proposition so unpromising of good, destitute of important ostensible object, but full of distrust, jealousy and mischief, and calculated to alarm, divide and discourage the people, should ever have been adopted by the Senate of Massachusetts. Suspicions have been indulged that Massachusetts would take the lead of the New England states, in a combination to dissolve the Union; that as a preliminary step, a course similar to that contemplated in these resolutions would be adopted, and that a period of war would be selected for the purpose. By the adoption of these resolutions we apprehend that these suspicions will grow into a settled belief.

The raising an army of ten thousand men at the expense and under the command of the state, will have little tendency to diminish the alarm. However honorable and patriotic the motives for raising an army and refusing to place them under the orders and pay of the general government, we have strong apprehensions that the people of this commonwealth will have too much reason to believe that the honor to command, will not compensate for the burthen to pay; that a separate army comports too well with a separate sovereignty, and that these men may at some future period be employed to settle domestic quarrels or enforce local interests:

From the resolutions and preamble and circumstances attending the debate, the undersigned have strong reasons to apprehend that propositions for a separate peace, may grow out of a proposed meeting of delegates from the New-England states. Should such propositions from the British government be made to the convention, and should the terms, as they probably would, be very flattering to this section of the Union, the temptation of momentary gain might induce a compact with the enemy, introduce an army of foreign mercenaries, produce a civil war, which would end in a subjugation of both sections to the power of Great Britain.

Ambition has destroyed every other republic on earth. The United States stand alone, like a solitary rock in the midst of the ocean, surrounded and assailed by storms and tempests. In vain may we look for aid, except from Union, energy and HEAVEN: apprehending and believing, that from neither of these sources can we expect it, so long as we indulge in the adoption of such resolutions, we have prepared and signed the foregoing protest; and we pray that it may be entered on the journals of the senate.

[The following protest, subscribed by SEVENTY-FIVE MEMBERS of the house of representatives, was presented and read by Mr. Lincoln, of Worcester, in behalf of the minority; and after some animated discussion, in which the language and sentiments were vindicated by Messrs. Green and Lincoln, the majority voted that it was disrespectful to the house, and refused to receive and place it upon the journals. It is now presented to the people, who will decide upon its merits, and the measures to which it applies.]

PROTEST.

The house of representatives having, at the present session, in concurrence with the honorable senate, adopted the report of a committee, "to whom was referred the message of his excellency, with the documents accompanying the same;" and having passed sundry resolutions contained in that report—The undersigned, members of the said house of representatives, having, in their place, objected and given their decided negative to said report, and to the passage of all the said resolutions, save the first, proposed therein—do now feel further constrained, by a consideration of the character of the measure contemplated, by apprehensions of the consequences which seem inevitable therefrom, by a sense of duty to themselves, to their constituents, and to their country, to make the most solemn protest thereto, and respectfully to offer the same to accompany the records of the adoption of the report, upon the journals of the house.

The undersigned contemplate, with no less concern than the majority, the difficulties and dangers which are pressing upon every side our beloved country. They see foreign power attempting our national subjugation, and domestic factions tributary to its accomplishment. They would witness with dismay the condition of the people, but for the deep conviction, that the spirit of patriotism and of self-respect will be sufficient for their ultimate redemption. In the duty to unite in defending our territory and repelling invasion from the soil of free men, no American can for a moment hesitate. The sovereignty of the nation must be sacred; the integrity of the union inviolate. No party or local considerations shall ever influence the minority in the house, to a dereliction of their public trust. They will unite with the virtuous and patriotic of every political designation, not in sentiment only, but in action, and to the utmost of their physical strength, in defending the commonwealth and the union, their territory and their governments, from every aggression, and in resisting and repelling alike, invasions of whatever character, upon the one or the other.

But while the minority in this house will cordially subscribe to every proposition, and zealously co-operate in every measure for the defence and protection of any portion of their country, they cannot be unmindful that they are parties to a national compact, and that under government their measures and efforts are to be directed. Little would be gained by resisting foreign hostility, at the expence of order and security within. The undersigned impute no unworthy motive to the majority; but they owe to the majority and to the people, a vindication of their objections to the measures about to be adopted, and an admonition of the fatal consequences which these measures seem calculated to produce.

To a proposition for raising troops for the service of the country, the undersigned could not object. On the contrary, they concurred in the reasoning, that to raise troops is wise and prudent, most effectual in operation and economical in the issue. The experiment so often made of sudden detachments of militia for short periods of service, has left no doubt of the preference for a permanent corps, which may be disciplined by time, accustomed to obedience by command, and which should look for a discharge, only to the accomplishment of the object for which they were employed. It is to be required, however, that when troops are raised, it should be under the provision of the constitution; that though their operations may be local, they should be ennobled by a national character, that in defending the state they should be recognized as contributing to the service of the union. While congress are bound to provide for the "general welfare, and the common defence," Massachusetts should not hastily exonerate himself from the obligation, nor should her legislature burden the people by the assumption of unnecessary and unexpected exertions. The constitution, in providing that the president of the United States shall command the militia, while in actual service, has implied a responsibility upon the general government for their support and compensation. If this command be denied, neither the letter of the national compact, nor its spirit, by just construction, will sanction a claim to remuneration, and the expense of troops, otherwise employed must fall exclusively upon the state. Notwithstanding the organization of an independent state corps, the obligation to the union will exist. It is not denied that a constitutional requisition by the president, may be made. The state corps, it is conceded, cannot by the terms of its organization, be ordered into the service of the United States. The state, therefore, must be reduced to the necessity of contributing to the support of a detachment of their militia, in addition to the exclusive expense of a state army, or of refusing a compliance with a constitutional requisition, in direct violation of national duty, and to the dissolution of the union. Because then, the state corps of 10,000 men is contemplated to be independent, under any circumstances, of the general government; not liable to be called into the service of the United States, nor subject to the like orders and duties with the militia therein, agreeably to the provisions of the constitution; and because the tendency of such an organization of troops is also calculated to subject this commonwealth to an undue proportion of the public burdens, or to induce to a gross violation of the national compact, we do most solemnly protest against, and object thereto.

Against the resolution proposing a convention of delegates from the New-England states, and the resolutions connected therewith, the undersigned feel bound by every dictate of duty and every suggestion of patriotism, most earnestly to remonstrate. To these resolutions they have opposed the utmost of their own reason, the language of the constitution, and the solemn and warning admonitions of Washington! However disguised or designed, the obvious tendency of propositions for a partial consequence by delegates from some states, without participation or consultation with other states, is to prepare the way for a separation and division of the union. The suggestion of a peculiar interest in the states of New-England upon subjects of public grievance, is predicated upon the idea, that this nation has not a community of object, and is not connected by a similarity of obligation. The constitution of the United States has prohibited in express terms, "one state from entering into any agreement or compact with another" without the consent of Congress. If, as the result of the conference of delegates on the part of New-England, a compact for any purpose is intended, the proposition for such conference, is as gross an infringement of the constitution as would be the compact when made. It cannot be admissible to pursue means to an end, which it is wrong and illegal to attain. Nor is there just pretence of necessity for this measure. The framers of the constitution wisely provided for its amendment. Should abuses exist, growing out of supposed defects in the instrument, the mode of reform is definitely prescribed, and if in this way they are not to be corrected, neither can they in any other, short of a change in the form of government. It is not to be supposed that the states of the union will yield to the dictates of a convention, what they would refuse to the constitutional application of the legislature. The undersigned, therefore cannot disguise their apprehensions that more must be designed, than is distinctly avowed. The reasoning of the report, is supported by the alarming assumption, that the constitution has failed in its objects, and the people of Massachusetts are absolved from their allegiance, and at liberty to adopt another. In debate it has been reiterated, that the constitution is no longer to be respected, and that revolution is not to be deprecated. The bond of our political union is thus attempted to be severed, and in a state of war and of common danger, we are advised to the mad experiment of abandoning that protection, which the combined energies of the nation might afford, for the selfish enjoyment of our present, though partial resources. The resolutions of the legislature, it is to be feared, will be viewed by other states, as productive of this consequence, that Massachusetts shall govern the administration, or the government shall not be administered in Massachusetts! Jealousy and contention will ensue. The constitution, hitherto respected as the charter of national liberty and consecrated as the ark of our political safety, will be violated and destroyed, and in civil dissensions and convulsions, our independence will be annihilated, and our country reduced to the condition of vanquished and tributary colonies to a haughty and implacable foreign foe.

LEVI LINCOLN, jun.—and 75 others.

Cruise of the Peacock.

Copy of a letter from captain Warrington to the secretary of the navy, dated

U. S. sloop Peacock, New York, Oct. 30, 1814.

SIR—I have the honor to inform you of the Peacock's arrival at this place, after a cruise of one hundred and forty-seven days, during which all your remaining orders of the 28th February ult. have been executed, except that which related to the Naze and coast of Norway and which was omitted in consequence of that whole coast being under a strict blockade by a combined squadron of English and Swedish ships. Although the Peacock's success has not been so great as we had sanguinely expected, it is a pleasing reflection, that our disappointment has been occasioned by the uncommon severe weather, (with constant gales from south-west to north-west) which we experienced, from the time of striking soundings in the Irish channel, until we left the Shetland isles, and which had the double effect, of keeping in all their trade, and compelling us to be constantly beating off a lee shore.—We were four days between cape Clear and Waterford, in which time we made but three captures, the last of which, as she was of little value, we made a cartel of.—On the north west coast of Ireland we met with very little better success as the bad weather still continued. From the Shetland Islands we ran for the Ferro isles, and then returned in soundings along the Irish coast, crossed the mouth of the channel, and bay of Biscay, and made cape Ortegal between which and the rock of Lisbon we cruised seven days, seeing in that time but twelve sail, nine of which we spoke and found but two of them English—From thence we run along the Portuguese coast, crossed the mouth of the Mediterranean and run within a degree and a half of the Madeira, for the purpose of falling in with their West India and Teneriffe trade. On the 1st of September we made the Canaries, and attempted in vain to procure water at Pentaventura and Lanzarote, at the latter of which places we landed some prisoners. As a supply of water was now indispensably requisite, I determined to run for the Cape de Verdes, at one of which (St. Vincent's) after a week's work in digging and cleaning out wells, we obtained the requisite quantity, and then proceeded at an easy rate to the westward, steering alternately to the S. W. and N. W. to prolong our stay as much as possible, between the longitudes of 20 and 40 west, the track of all their East India, African and South American trade. Not a single vessel was however seen in all our run, and on the 6th of October we made the coast of Guiana, at the mouth of the Mariconi river, the next day we were off Surinam, from whence we run for Barbadoes, which we made on the 9th, and continued cruising to windward of Dereada and Barbuda for a few days, and then steered for our own coast, which we made on the 28th, at seven, A. M. a little to the westward of cape Henlopen.

It gives me much pleasure so to inform you that from the time of our leaving New York in March last, until our return, we have lost but one man (Mr. Denizen Baldwin, M. mate, a promising officer,) and that our crew is in fine health. I trust that you will not think we have unnecessarily curtailed our cruise, when I inform you we have but fifteen days provisions on board at short allowance. I enclose a correct list of our captures.

I am respectfully,

L. WARRINGTON.

The Hon. Wm. Jones,

Secretary of the navy.

Total value 494,222 dollars.

L. WARRINGTON.

Extract of a letter from A. Sinclair, esq. commanding the United States' naval force on the Upper Lakes, to the secretary of the navy, dated U. S. S. Niagara Roads, off Erie, October 28th, 1814.

SIR—I am under the mortifying necessity of stating to you that the report mentioned in my last letter of the vessels left in the upper lake having been surprised and captured by boats of the enemy, has turned out to be correct. The boatswain and four men from the Scorpion made their escape, on their way to Kingston, and crossed Lake Ontario in skiffs from the bay of Quinte to the Genesee river, from thence to this place. The man's story is a most unfavorable one, and such as I am loath to believe true, from the well known character of lieutenant Turner. He says the blockade of the Nautawasaga river was raised a short time after my departure—that the lieutenant who commanded the navy (and who had escaped in the woods when she was destroyed) had passed up to Mackinac in boats, and it was by him and his crew they were captured. The Tigress had been separated from him five days among the islands, in which time she had been captured. They came in sight of her laying at anchor, in the evening; the wind being light, they anchored some distance from her, without passing signals. In the morning there was only four or five men, and no officer on deck. The Tigress got under way, run down, fired into them, and were on board without any report ever being made to Mr. Turner, nor was there an officer of any grade on deck when she was captured. The wind was light, the Scorpion had the advantage of a long 12 pounder over the other, and could have re-captured her with much ease. The Tigress had made great resistance, but was overpowered by an overwhelming force. Her commander (sailing-master Champlain) and all her officers were wounded, as were many of his men, and some killed. I had given lieutenant Turner a picked crew from this vessel, with my sailing-master, and had added to both their crews 25 chosen men, borrowed from colonel Croghan, to act as marines. I had also left him a boarding netting; indeed, there was no precaution I did not take in anticipation of every effort, I knew the enemy would make to regain their line of communication, on which their very existence depended.

I herewith enclose you my instructions to Lieut. Turner—after which I cannot express to you, sir, my chagrin at learning the little regard which appears to have been paid to them, and the evil consequences growing out of such neglect; consequences but too well known to you and to the government. You must first believe the infinite interests I had taken in the expedition from the moment I had been entrusted with the conducting it, and the sanguine hope I had formed of its complete success, and the benefits resulting from it to my country, to enable you to form an adequate idea of the mortification I now experience.

I have the honor to remain, with high respect, sir, your obedient servant,

A. SINCLAIR.

Honorable William Jones, secretary of the navy.

Copy of a letter from captain Sinclair, to lieutenant Daniel Turner, dated

U. S. sloop of war Niagara, Nautawasaga river Aug. 15, 1814.

SIR—HAVING accomplished the object for which the squadron came into this quarter, in the destruction of the enemy's whole naval force on this lake, I am on the eve of returning to Lake Erie: but as it is all important to cut the enemy's line of communication from Michilimackinac to York, which is through the Nautawasaga river, lake Sinclair, &c. and on which his very existence depends, you will remain here and keep up a rigid blockade until you shall be driven from the lake by the inclemency of the season, suffering not a boat or canoe to pass in or out of this river. I shall leave the Tigress with you. In case accident should happen to either one of the vessels, the other may afford her necessary assistance. Should you deem it proper to send the Tigress up to cruise a week or two, about St. Joseph's, in order to intercept the enemy's fur canoes between St. Marie's and French river, you can do so, as one vessel is sufficient to blockade this river.

I should recommend your immediately finding out anchorage to cover you from N. W. gales, as that is the only wind which can affect you in this bay. I see from the Nancy's Log Book, that the small island on the S. W. of this bay is such a place as you could wish, directions for which I herewith give you. The islands north of us, may also give you good anchorage; but always be sure of some good bottom before anchorage, as the loss of an anchor might prove of serious consequence to you. Should you find anchorage on both sides, I would recommend your changing frequently, and in a way not to be observed by the enemy, who might not only avail himself of your position to move out his boats in the night on the opposite side, but he might attempt surprising you by throwing a number of men on board. Against attacks of this kind, which he might be driven to by his desperate situation, as this blockade must starve him into a surrender by spring, I must particularly caution you. When the Tigress is here it would be well to be on the opposite shores—and sometimes to run out of sight, taking care to scour both shores as you return. I shall endeavor to annoy the navigation of the river by felling trees across its mouth in order that a portage must be performed there; which must be seen by you.

I wish you to take an accurate survey of this bay, and its islands, and if possible the one on the north of it, called Matschadash, observing all its islands, creeks, bays, shoals, anchorages, courses, distances, and soundings, particularly attending to the kind of bottom.

Should any thing occur to make it necessary, you can send the Tigress express to me. If we can keep their boats from passing until October, I think the weather will effectually cut off all communication by any they have on float, and in the spring an early blockade will possess us of Mackinac.

You will be particularly careful in having communication with the shore, and when you send a party for wood, let it be on an island, under the protection of your guns, and a guard from both vessels. Wishing you a pleasant cruise,

I remain very respectfully, your most obedient servant, (Signed) A. SINCLAIR.

Lieut. comdt. David Turner, U. S. schr. Scorpion.

Congress.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

Thursday Nov. 3.—The house was chiefly occupied this day with the volunteer bill, which was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

Friday Nov. 4.—The volunteer bill was recommitteed to a committee of the whole, in which it was considerably discussed, and again reported to the house with some amendments.

Saturday Nov. 5.—Mr. Johnson, chairman of the committee to investigate the causes that led to the capture of the city by the enemy, informed the house that that committee had been industriously engaged in the collection of papers and facts—he said they had received 11 reports, containing 359 pages, and 210 letters, besides daily and almost hourly interviews with persons on the subject.

Mr. Farrow offered the following which was agreed to without a division. Resolved, That the committee of Ways and Means be instructed to inquire into the expediency of laying a duty on all salary officers, and on the professional income of lawyers, solicitors and counsellors, and the legal proceedings of civil courts of justice.

An able legal discussion now took place on the report of the committee of claims on the petition of Thomas Cutts, which was unfavorable to the petitioner. Mr. Cutts, had purchased certain property at a marshal's sale which in due process of law he was dispossessed of by a third person—he therefore prayed the United States would reimburse the money he had paid to their officer. But the report of the committee was agreed to—81 to 53.

The remainder of the day was spent in discussing the volunteer bill—and the house adjourned at a late hour without a decision.

Monday Nov. 7.—The house was engaged the whole of this day in discussing the volunteer bill, which, from the quantity of talking about it, we suppose is important—except that at a late hour Mr. Fisk, of N. Y. reported a bill to establish a national bank, which was referred to a committee of the whole.

Tuesday Nov. 8.—Mr. McKim of Md. presented the memorial of sundry ship-owners and merchants of Baltimore, representing, that in consequence of the strict blockade of our bays and rivers, the private armed service is much discouraged, &c. and submitting so congress the expediency of authorising a bounty to be given for the destruction of the enemy's vessels. They state their opinion of the high effect of this sort of warfare on the enemy's commerce, and say that they are ready to give the best pledge of their sincerity in this belief, if encouragement be afforded, by entering largely into the enterprizes against the commerce of the enemy. The memorial was read and referred.

The bill from the senate authorising the fitting out of not more than 20 vessels, to carry not less than 8, nor more than 14 guns, was read, and after considerable debate, in which several amendments were proposed, and rejected by large majorities (except one offered by Mr. Ingersol to extend the maximum of force to 22 guns, at the discretion of the executive) was ordered to a third reading to-morrow.

Wednesday Nov. 9.—After the minor business had been disposed of, Mr. Eppes reported a bill to provide additional revenues &c. agreeably to the resolves of the house, already noticed in detail—and also amending the act laying duties on distilled spirits so as to continue it, and pledging it on some other tax to be levied in lieu of it, for the punctual performance of the engagements of the United States, and for establishing a sinking fund, &c. The bill was committed.

The bill from the senate to authorize the fitting out of certain small armed vessels was passed without opposition.

Progress was made in a good deal of other business.

Events of the War.

MISCELLANEOUS.

The Niagara frontier. We learn indirectly, but we think the information may be relied on, that the greater part of gen. Izard's army had re-crossed the Niagara to Buffalo about the first inst. The remainder was yet at fort Erie, expected soon also to cross, as they had destroyed the outer works. No mention is made of the enemy, nor have we heard distinctly of the late movements of our army. We have nothing new from Sackett's harbor, except that Brown's presence seems to make it safe. The citizens of some of the neighboring countries had been called out en masse. It has become very cold on this frontier, and a deep snow fell some days ago—the campaign is probably closed. Every thing is quiet on the Champlain frontier. Our fleet was about to be laid up. It was reported the British were preparing to build four frigates.

News. The Russian ship Hannibal, has arrived at New York, in 50 days from Bremen, with a full cargo of German goods. She brings London dates to the 2d of September, and Bremen papers of the 5th, but they contain nothing of importance, except in regard to the internal regulations of the different European states. The following are the heads of the news—

A considerable number of ship wrights, &c. were to leave England for Canada. A general belief prevailed in England that the negotiation at Ghent was broken off; and it is said that Messrs. Bayard, Clay and Gallatin would assemble at Brest on the 10th Oct. to return home. This is probable enough. The great European congress was to meet at Vienna, Sept. 8. The military establishments of the several powers seem prepared for expected difficulties thereat. The emperor of Austria continues Bonaparte's order of the Iron Crown, himself Grand Master. Wellington, with 40,000 men, is said to be in Belgium. The idea has gone forth that Bonaparte may be troublesome, but grounds for is not stated.

Doleful complaints are made in Great Britain of the enterprize, gallantry and skill of our seamen. As a sample of the terror they have inflicted, insurance between England and Ireland which used to be three-fourths of one per cent. had risen to five per cent. We may exalt it to 15 before long.

The London Courier of Sept. 1, says that the sailing of the force assembled at Plymouth for America was stopped.

LORD HILL. Some rumors are afloat that lord Hill's expedition has been abandoned, the troops that were collected at Cork, &c. being dispersed—some sent to Holland. But we have no positive information of this matter. Accounts from Bermuda of the 19th ult. say he was not soon expected. Cockburn, was at Bermuda, but it did not seem that any expedition was fitting out.

THE INDIAN BOUNDARY, designed by the treaty of Greenville, (says the Albany Argus) commences at lake Erie, at the mouth of the Cayahogia, runs south to the head waters of the Muskingum, thence to fort Recovery on the Wabash, 98 miles W. by N. from Cincinnati, thence to the Ohio river, and thence on a course parallel to and near that river, to the Mississippi. The Indian part embraces one third of Ohio, and near the whole of four territories, and comprises a tract of country, which, from its fertility, mildness of climate and equality of surface, Volney has denominated the future Flanders of America. It contains by computation 220 millions of acres, more than one third of our territory before the accession of Louisiana, which, at two dollars per acre, the present price of the public lands, would produce a revenue to the government of 440,000,000. Independent of political considerations, therefore, the sine qua non of the British commissioners, if acceded to, would deprive us and our posterity of one of the most certain and permanent sources of revenue.

PUBLIC CREDIT. The circumstances of the war have thrown a very unusual quantity of specie into the hands of the people to the eastward, and they are using the advantage for many undignified purposes. Before the war, a silver dollar was more of a rarity in those parts than a half eagle was in the middle states, and such will be the case again when trade resumes its wonted course. We propose to say something more on this matter a little while hence, and shew how those persons make a gain of injuring the public credit.

THE LOAN. We are proud to hear that the government has already obtained on good terms, without public advertisement, the whole, or nearly the whole of the loan, which in consequence of the approach of the enemy to the city in August last, was then only partly subscribed.—Nat. Int.

CONNECTICUT. The legislature of this state, after passing certain resolutions, (which shall be recorded) has appointed seven delegates to meet those of Massachusetts, &c. in convention at Hartford, in December next, to consult what measures it may be expedient for those states to adopt, in the present situation of the country, which shall not be inconsistent with the duty which they owe to the government of United States. The resolve passed the house of representatives—yeas 153, nays 36. The delegates are—His honor Chauncey Goodrich, hon. James Hillhouse, hon. John Treadwell, hon. Zephaniah Swift, hon. Nathaniel Smith, hon. Calvin Goddard, hon. Roger M. Sherman, "BRITISH INFLUENCE." The following, said to be a letter from Paris, appeared in the Boston Centinel about two months ago; and the editor declared it was faithfully copied from the original which he had seen. It made a great noise at first, but hearing nothing of it since, we had consigned it to forgetfulness with the millions of similar tales that preceded it, long since dissolved into "thin air." But accidentally finding it among a parcel of scraps, we are induced to preserve the precious morsel to aid in the history of fiction.

When we first beheld it, the only thing that astonished us was—that something of the kind had not been published long ago!—as, immediately after the fall of Paris, several persons in the United States, hinted [to Lord Castlereagh] that such stuff might be profitably used here! We, therefore, expected a giant lie.

If the charges be true—he is a villain of the most finished character that withholds the proof—if they be false—what must we think of the desperation of the man that would palm such trash on the public!

We are thoroughly advocates for the freedom of the press, yet as firmly fixed in the opinion that publishers should be made responsible for the calumnies they utter; and for this libel the editor ought to be brought before that senate which he accuses of the basest corruption. The letter is as follows—

"PARIS, MAY 26, 1814.

"The treaty is nearly concluded, and we shall once more see all the world in peace, excepting our own country—thanks to the wisdom of the democrats and the partizans of BONAPARTE! Since the war has been declared, he has not exercised one single act of amity or friendship, either toward the nation or any individual. It is very well known by every one here who has connection with the government, that it was by bribery that the vote for the war was obtained. A gentleman employed in the office of the department of foreign affairs, told me that he saw on the books the names of the senators bribed, and the sums paid each of them by NAPOLEON. I hope in a short time to be able to procure a copy of it, to send to you. The country was sold by AMATEURS before he left Paris; and the war was decided upon; and in consequence he was made secretary of war, the better to accomplish the diabolical system. I hope the events which have taken place in Europe will enlighten the American people, and shew them their true interest, and that they will have resolution and patriotism enough to dismiss from their councils men who have so basely betrayed their country and the confidence that was reposed in them by their fellow citizens. This is the first step towards making an honorable and durable peace, which must be the desire of every true American.

THE STRANGER.—The board of war of Massachusetts purchased 30 of the 24 pounders, brought to Salem, in the prize ship Stranger.

TRADE. We have the pleasure to observe the late arrival of several Baltimore schooners (merchantmen) to and from the places of their destination.

LICENSED VESSEL. A letter from London, dated July 9 says—The court of appeals have this day reversed the sentence of condemnation in the case of the Reward, Hill; and decreed ship and cargo to be restored on payment of the expenses on the part of the crown, not the captors expenses.

[The Reward above named, was a licensed vessel that sailed from Salem in Oct. 1812, bound for Lisbon, with a cargo of flour, was taken into St. John's (N. B.) and condemned.]

A GOOD ONE!—Some weeks ago, (says a Chillicothe paper) a party of governor Cass's pet Indians left Detroit for the purpose of making excursions on the river Thames. After remaining in that neighborhood some days, they collected and took prisoners forty-five of the British militia, among whom was one colonel. Having kept them a short time, these indians, animated by motives of humanity, permitted their prisoners to return to their homes, on their parole of honor not to appear in arms against the U. States or their allies until legally exchanged; at the same time taking care to detain the colonel as a hostage for the faithful performance of the contract on the part of the enemy. We understand that the colonel is in Chillicothe!

"NO PLEASING." The proposed national bank, but lately the grand desideratum of certain men, is now a dreadful thing. "Strike higher—strike lower."—said the culprit.

MR. BAYARD. A report prevails that the vacant office of secretary of state is held to be offered to Mr. Bayard. We hope it is so, and that he may accept it. He is an American. His return from Ghent, we apprehend, may be soon expected; and we venture to say, from a personal knowledge of the stamina of the gentleman, that no man in the United States will go further to resist the outrageous pretensions of the enemy than Mr. Bayard.

LOUISIANA. We have encouraging accounts of the patriotic spirit of the people of Louisiana. Of the American population, by far the greater and most efficient part, we had no doubt, but it appears also that the French are emulating them.

JAMAICA, AUG. 27/ G. Hibbert, Esq. has protested against the dangerous measure of employing American slaves in our invasion of that country which ministers have denied all knowledge of, but admit a discretionary power in our commanders to bring off such as may assist our operations, a power which, we fear, will in some cases be extended farther than it ought.

Our West India committee have instructed our agent in England to represent to ministers the disadvantages our colonies will labor under in competition with the colonies of the continental powers as to the continental markets. [The markets of the United States would greatly benefit the British Islands.]

RHODE-ISLAND. The legislature of this state, now in session, have appointed Messrs Ben. Haggard and Daniel Lyman and cols. Marston and Lloyd as their delegates to the "New-England convention."

MILITARY.

We understand (says the National Intelligencer) that captain Leonard, the officer who surrendered fort Niagara to the enemy last winter, has been exchanged and is now under arrest. He will be tried as soon as officers can be spared from field duties for that purpose.

NAVAL.

It is stated that two India ships have been captured by one of our privateers.

All the American vessels that have sailed for Canton since the war, had arrived there. But were closely watched off the Chinese coast by the British, and were chiefly laid up.

A number of the enemy have been made prisoners in the petit guerre on the Eastern coast.

Copy of a letter from captain Porter to the secretary of the navy dated

New York, Oct. 29, 1814.

SIR—I have the pleasure to inform you that the United States' Fulton the first, was this morning safely launched. No one has yet ventured to suggest an improvement that could be made in this vessel, and to use the words of the projector "I would not alter her if it were in my power to do so." She promises fair to meet our most sanguine expectations, and I do not despair of being able to navigate in her from one extreme of our coast to the other. Her buoyancy astonishes every one; she now draws only eight feet three inches water, and her draft will be only ten feet with all her guns, machinery, stores and crew on board; the ease with which she can now be towed with a single steam boat, renders it certain that her velocity will be sufficiently great to answer every purpose, and the manner it is intended to secure her machinery from the gunner's shot leaves no apprehension for its safety.

I shall use every exertion to prepare her for immediate service; her guns will soon be mounted, and I am assured by Mr. Fulton that her machinery will be in operation in about six weeks.

I have the honor to be, with great respect, your obedient servant. D. PORTER.
The honorable Wm. Jones,
Secretary of the navy.

National Bank Bill.

The bill reported in the house of representatives, "to incorporate the subscribers to the bank of the United States of America," being too long for insertion in extenso, we have made the following abstract of its provisions for the information of our readers.

Sec. 1. A bank of the United States of America shall be established, the capital stock to be fifty millions, divided into 100,000 shares of 500 dollars each; subscriptions to be opened on the first Monday of at Boston, New-York, Philadelphia, Baltimore, Richmond, Charleston and Pittsburgh, to continue open one week, at the end of which time the subscriptions are to be transmitted to the Philadelphia commissioners, who, if the total of subscription exceeds thirty of the fifty, shall apportion the same among the subscribers in a just and equal ratio, and cause lists of the same to be returned to the respective commissioners, &c.

Sec. 2. Any individual or body politic may subscribe any number of shares not exceeding 1000. Payment to be made in the following manner: one fifth part in gold or silver coin of the United States; three fifth parts in the same, or in the stock of the 11,000,000 loan, or of any future loan; and one-fifth part in gold or silver coin, or in treasury notes—and at the following times: at the time of subscribing, 20 dollars in specie, and 200 more in stock, &c. within four months thereafter, the further sum of 40 dollars in specie, and 100 in specie or stock; in six months from the time of subscribing, 40 dollars in specie, and 100 dollars in stock.

Sec. 3. At the time of subscription aforesaid the secretary of the treasury shall subscribe for the United States 20 millions of dollars in stock to bear 6 per cent. interest, redeemable in such sums and manner as the government shall deem expedient.

Sec. 4. The secretary of the treasury may redeem the treasury notes so subscribed to the banks by six per cent. stock of an equal amount to be delivered to the bank.

Sec. 5. creates the subscribers, their successors and assigns, a body politic, with full powers, &c. subject to the limitations in the succeeding sections to exist and have being until the 3d day of March 1835.

Sec. 6. There shall be 25 directors to the bank annually appointed, viz. twenty by the stockholders, and five by the president of the U. States.

Sec. 7. As soon as $13,200,000 in specie and stock shall be paid in, public notice shall be given by the Philadelphia commissioners, and within days thereafter the first directors shall be chosen, who shall proceed to elect a president to the institution.

Sec. 8 and 9, give the necessary banking powers, and establish the usual regulations contained in bank charters, limiting and defining their powers.

Sec. 10. Prohibits the bank from mercantile speculations.

Sec. 11. Prohibits the bank from lending to the government of the United States at any time more than 300,000 or to the government of any particular state more than 50,000, or for the use of any foreign power, without express authority by law.

Sec. 12. makes the notes of the bank receivable in all payments to the U. States.

Sec. 13. If at any time an undue pressure for specie is made on the bank, either for exportation, or with a wilful intention of sinister design to injure the bank, the president of the United States may, on being duly informed thereof, direct suspension of the payments in specie temporarily.

Sec. 14. exempts the stock (but not the real estate) of the bank from taxation.

Sec. 16. No new bank to be created during the existence of this; and grants powers to settle the affairs of the bank extended beyond the term of incorporation.

Sec. 16. Whenever required, the corporation shall perform all the duties now transacted by commissioners of loans in the several states.

Extraordinary voyage. The Russian ship General Suwarrow, now at Portsmouth, is about to proceed on what may appear a most extraordinary voyage, being none other than the completion of two military and commercial establishments on the west coast of North America. The Russian government have, for nearly ten years past, had a fort, with a few pieces of ordnance mounted on the island of Rodlak, in 55, N. long 162, W. being the nearest point of the American continent to their establishment, at Kamschatka. Within these four years they have begun to form another establishment, on the neck of land called California, and this ship takes out ordnance and stores of every description, to give it an appearance of military strength. The trade the Russians carry on thither, which is very great, is wholly in furs, for which article they find a lucrative market in China, from whence they bring to Europe the produce and manufactures of that country, and are enabled, from their competition with each other, to afford it to the European continent at a cheaper rate, than in this country. The General Suwarrow will also endeavour in the height of next summer, to discover a passage through Bhering's Straits, and, in a north westerly direction, to Archangel. A gentleman who is on board her declares, that on a former voyage of discovery, he was more than half way through the northern seas of Cape North to Archangel when the ship was stopped by the ice—this adventure left only about 400 miles unexplored, to complete the circuit of the world.—London paper.

Documents.

A gentleman observed in a letter to the editor, some time ago—"Accept my thanks for the impartiality with which you furnish the documents;" facetiously adding—"in this you seem so straight that, like the Indian's tree, you rather lean the other way,"—alluding to a greater apparent attention to insert the documents of the "federal states than those of the republican." The remark is probably just—if we have leaned on either side, it has been as insinuated. But this constant object has guided the editor as to the public papers of the several states—to give the preference to those that, from any circumstance, he apprehended would be most referred to: such for instance, as those of Massachusetts and Connecticut, inserted in the last and present number; and the proceedings of Rhode-island, on the same matters, to appear in our next—as also an editorial article of considerable length and statistical remark, on "THE NEW ENGLAND CONVENTION."

Whatever the editor's private sentiments may be as to the shades of difference that divide honest federalists from the honest republicans (with which differences he never has knowingly interfered in this work)—the case is essentially changed when he has to treat of factions jacobins that war against the constitution, and appear ready to fight any body else than the enemy of their country—a faction as contemptible in numbers as for political depravity, but unfortunately self-placed at the head a great and respectable party, which it leads, through the pride of opinion, step by step, to aid and comfort the enemy; and ruin the United States, if permitted.—On these, we should "frown indignantly," as Washington specially directed and solemnly enjoined us to do—and in the next and some subsequent numbers, the subject will be discussed with all the force of remark in our power. The WEEKLY REGISTER, undevoted to federalism or republicanism (as used for party designations)—will stand or fall, with the CONSTITUTION OF THE UNITED STATES. On this point we have no pretensions to neutrality—we are enemies to the enemies of the CONFEDERATE REPUBLIC.

Legislature of New-Jersey.

Gentlemen of the council, and Gentlemen of the house of assembly.

Soon after the adjournment of the legislature, and in conformity to the joint resolution of both houses, I visited the sea coast, and the shores of Delaware bay and river, and proceeded to make such arrangements for the defence of the exposed parts as I conceive the resources placed at my disposal would justify me in doing. A considerable number of pieces of field artillery have been taken from the interior, and placed at proper positions, and confided to the local militia, who have in some cases been formed into special corps for the purpose. As many small arms as could be spared, have been disposed of in the same manner, and the whole furnished with ammunition.

The events of the war have not made it necessary to call into service any portion of the militia on the authority of the state. Considerable bodies of militia, however, have been called into service by the commanding generals of the 3d and 4th military districts of the United States, a small detachment in August and the remainder in September. They are yet mostly in service. The patriotism displayed by a large number of uniform companies, who volunteered their services, and the alacrity and promptness with which those companies, as well as the detailed officers and soldiers, obeyed the call of their country; and the patience with which they have borne the hardships, and suffered the privations incident to a military life, entitle them to the highest respect and consideration.

Care has been taken to pay to the non-commissioned officers, musicians, and privates, the extra allowance provided by the liberality of the legislature, as soon as it could be conveniently done after it became due. Further provisions on that subject will claim the immediate attention of the legislature. It is to be presumed that the militia will not be detained in service longer than shall be rendered indispensable by the movements of the enemy.

Although our militia system has carried us so far through the campaign with as little inconvenience as could have been reasonably expected, yet experience has pointed out some defects susceptible of correction. The uniform volunteer companies have become very important, and merit encouragement. The advances they have made in military acquirements, together with their promptness to act on sudden emergencies, render them peculiarly useful.—How far it will comport with the public interest to provide by a state law, military corps of more durability than is compatible with the nature of militia service, is submitted to your consideration, and whether some addition ought not to be made to the arms and other military equipments belonging to the state, are subjects worthy of your consideration.

During the recess of the legislature, changes have taken place in Europe, which, at first view, excited an apprehension of serious injury to this country. The success of the allies in their war with France, was productive of a peace, which, early in the spring, left to our enemy an immense unemployed military force. Great Britain did not fail to avail herself of the advantage which event placed in her power, by sending out large fleets and armies to aid the forces already here in the subjugation of America, expecting to create dismay and overwhelm the country by a sudden vigorous effort of military skill and discipline. In this expectation, by the interposition of Divine Providence, she has been disappointed. The bravery of our soldiers and seamen, the skill and heroism of our officers and commanders, deserve the thanks and rewards of a grateful country.—America withstood the shock with a firmness becoming freemen. The ferocious savages on our frontiers, of whose alliance Great Britain unblushingly boasts, and for whose afflictions she expresses a fraternal sympathy, have atoned for their inhuman atrocities by death, exile, or submission. The brilliant achievements of our navy are daily adding new proofs of the superior skill and intrepidity of the gallant heroes on that element; while the slaughtered and discomfited armies of Britain, attest the valor of our troops, and heroic patriotism of the militia.

The progress of the negotiation of our commissioners of peace, is such as was to be expected from the inordinate pride and injustice of the British ministry. To paralyze the efforts of the nation, the British government made an insidious offer of peace, and therein invited commissioners to Europe. After three months unnecessary delay, conditions are offered fit only to be accepted by a conquered people. It is well known that in the first stages of the controversy the enemy only assumed the dominion of the sea, but she now claims the sovereignty of the land. We are arrogantly required to dismantle our ships and demolish our fortifications, while the enemy is to retain his own unimpaired, and to surrender part of our territory, with other humiliating conditions, and restrictions, too degrading to repeat. Nothing short of a base surrender of the independence, gloriously achieved by the patriots of the revolution, will satisfy the pride, avarice, and ambition of the enemy. Long experience must at length convince every reflecting man, that our rights cannot be maintained by negotiation—that it is in vain to reason with tyrants. The controversy must be settled in the field—and the line of demarkation traced by the sword. Duty imperiously calls upon us to strengthen the national arm for national defence, nor have we any cause to despond. We have an invincible army, commanded by able generals, a gallant navy, and spirited patriotic militia daily increasing in military skill. The enemy have been repulsed in every attempt on our country but one. The only achievement of any moment, of which he can boast, is the wanton destruction of a few public edifices, in an inroad from which he could no other way escape chastisement but by abandoning his sick and wounded to the mercy of an insulted enemy. It is becoming more and more obvious that the plain and direct road to peace and future prosperity is a vigorous prosecution of the war. A manly united effort of the nation in one year would transfer the seat of negotiation from Europe to America. Although our country is able to contend with the collected force of the British empire, yet that force cannot be spared. The seeds of discord are too deeply sown in Europe, to be eradicated by a treaty extorted by the bayonet. Great Britain is already forming a camp of no small extent in the territory of an ally; ostensibly to watch the motions of a friend, but probably to shackle both. In pursuit of her chimerical project of balancing Europe by placing four fifths in one scale, she will want the aid of a large portion of her resources, and unforeseen events may arise which may require the presence of her whole military force nearer home.

The enemies of American independence have yet one hope left, arising from a supposed inability of our government to command the funds necessary to its operations—it is apprehended that this difficulty will diminish as it is approached. If we look back for twenty years, we shall find that the wealth of the country has increased beyond all calculation. Immense fortunes have been made by individuals, and there is scarcely a man among us who has not doubled his estate, and many have added to it four, six, and even ten-fold. Can any wise man feel a reluctance in parting with a small portion of this gain, for the security of every thing dear to himself, his family and country? The government of a free enlightened people, cannot be poor while its members are rich. Property is the proper subject of taxation. The burthen will not fall on the poor, but on the rich who are able to bear it. The natural resources of the country are such as to command credit, and a few years of peace and commercial prosperity will renovate the most disordered state of our finances.

Perseverance in national defence will every day put our country on higher and surer ground. It is now in our power to place the independence of our country on a foundation, that nothing short of Divine vengeance can shake. Whatever opinions may have been entertained as to the character of the war in its commencement, it is undeniably at this time, purely a war of defence. It is no new thing that a war in its progress may change its character—nothing is more common, and if any had doubts at first, they must now be convinced of the injustice of the enemy. The British commissioners instead of discussing the real subjects in controversy between the two nations, set up new, unheard of, and degrading demands on our national territory, so outrageously unjust and humiliating, that there is not a man to be found in our country who does not spurn them; and one of the most pernicious of these is given as a sine qua non. Can it be doubted then that we are engaged in a war for national defence, involving in its consequences the safety and independence of America? This being the case, it is impossible to contemplate any other state of things, than an unanimous determination to prosecute the war with vigor, until at least these exorbitant demands are relinquished, and our enemy disposed to listen to reasonable terms.

In every measure which you may adopt for the public interest, you may calculate on a ready and faithful co-operation on my part.

WILLIAM S. PENNINGTON.

New-Jersey, October, 1814.

Legislature of Connecticut.

GOVERNOR'S SPEECH:

Gentlemen of the council, Mr. speaker and house of representatives—The war in which the nation is unhappily involved, subjected this state to unusual embarrassments during the last campaign, and from a cause sufficiently known to the world. Other causes have augmented these embarrassments the present year. An unexplained and I may add unjustifiable attack upon the town of Stonington, followed by threats of the enemy to lay waste the sea-coast wherever assailable, necessarily called into service numerous bodies of militia. The resolve of the general assembly equally just and liberal in its provisions, which directed the commander in chief to discharge from the treasury of the state the wages of such troops as might be employed at the request of the general government, in the event of a failure on the part of that government to pay them, has thus far been carried into effect. The personal sacrifices of our fellow-citizens engaged in the service, although endured with patience have been sensibly felt; whilst the pay and subsistence of so large a force with the incidental expenditures, it will be readily perceived must have borne heavily upon the funds of the state. It was the expectation of the legislature that the sums required for these objects would either be regularly supplied in the first instance by the national government, or if advanced by the state, would be promptly reimbursed. I am compelled to inform you that this expectation is not fulfilled. Partial supplies were indeed furnished by the war department. These however did not commence with the campaign, and for a considerable time past they have been altogether withheld; particularly from that portion of our military force called out at the request of the national executive, and at the moment employed in protecting the ships and other property of the United States. The pretensions set up to justify this transaction have never before been urged in this state. They are in my judgment entirely incompatible with its rights.

But although the promised support was withdrawn the service was not abandoned. My duty to the nation and the state forbade any other course than that which would contribute to the honor and safety of both. The documents regarding a procedure so unexpected will at a proper time be laid before you.

Under such circumstances, gentlemen, and thus unassisted, we are left to defend ourselves against a formidable and exasperated enemy. It becomes us to acknowledge the Divine hand in the protection hitherto afforded us, and with humble confidence in the same Almighty aid, to persevere in the honorable and resolute discharge of our duty.

To the troops of all descriptions employed in the defence of the state, the highest praise is due for a line of conduct every way creditable to them as citizens and as soldiers. Their love of order has been uniform, and their martial spirit exemplary on various and trying occasions. The assault upon Stonington was resisted with a firmness and intrepidity that merit unqualified applause.

Whether the state shall be defended, is a question on which I presume there is but one opinion. The most economical and efficient mode of accomplishing the object becomes an interesting inquiry. Whatever system of defence may be thought best adapted to our situation, I trust we are satisfied that to rely solely on the militia to guard our extended sea-coast is neither politic nor reasonable. It is a service oppressive to them and highly inconvenient and expensive to the state; nor ought the duties of a camp or garrison, unless in extreme cases, to be required of them. The same objection applies in degree to every other species of our military force as at present organized. Permit me therefore to suggest the expediency of raising a select corps, for the specific purpose of watching the movements of the enemy, and of resisting his approach, until the assistance of the ordinary forces can be obtained. The number of troops and mode of raising them, their particular organization and period of service, with the means of supporting such an establishment and of meeting the unavoidable expenses growing out of a state of war, will of course enter into your deliberations upon this subject.

But in any point of view the importance of improving the militia by every practicable method is evident. Those reforms which experience may have rendered advisable will not escape your observation. You will however allow me to recommend, what I have once before had the honor to mention, an increase of the artillery. By the act of congress passed in 1792, one-eleventh part only of the militia is reserved both for artillery and cavalry. We have a greater proportion of the latter than of the former and with much less occasion for them. It would be very desirable to preserve our excellent body of dragoons unbroken, if without reducing their number the artillery could be augmented. But according to existing regulations this is impossible. It is believed that by converting a portion of the cavalry into horse artillery, the advantages of both descriptions of force would in a good degree be combined, that the change could be effected with little difficulty, and that it would be cheerfully embraced by a competent number of that respectable corps. On the beneficial consequences of such an arrangement, no comment is necessary.

Orders have been issued for carrying into effect the several resolutions of the legislature respecting the proof of arms, mounting of ordnance, the purchase of munitions of war, and other objects connected with the service. The reports of the proper officers charged with their execution will be submitted to your examination.

You must have observed, gentlemen, with peculiar satisfaction the patriotic efforts of our fellow citizens in this and other towns on the coast, in constructing fortifications for their immediate defence. To furnish the works with suitable ordnance, where it is not already provided, is the least reward you can bestow on these laudable exertions.

You will learn with equal satisfaction that important additions are made to the corps of volunteer exempts, and at those points where their services are the most required. The disposition thus to increase the effective force of the state is happily prevailing, and it is to be hoped will extend to every man capable of bearing arms, who values either his own security, or those institutions which are hallowed by time, and render them inestimable by the unnumbered blessings they confer.

I have received and shall lay before you an official communication from the governor of Rhode Island, expressing the readiness of that state to afford us assistance "in case of invasion or imminent danger thereof" and soliciting from this state, under an exchange of circumstances, a like co-operation. A proposition, so friendly in itself, and which reminds us of those early associations formed by our common ancestors in times of great public calamity, is surely entitled to respectful consideration.

GENTLEMEN—The usual business of the session will engage your attention without a particular recommendation from me. Your chief concern will be directed to the critical aspect of our national affairs, and to its influence upon the present safety and future prosperity of this state. The occurrences which have taken place since the last session of the general assembly, can be viewed with no ordinary sensations. The sanguinary temper with which the war is prosecuted—a vast accumulation of debt—a ruined commerce and the consequent depression of public and private credit—extensive encroachments on the maritime frontier, and finally the invasion of the American Metropolis, attended with circumstances deeply wounding to our national honor, are among the misfortunes which have marked this eventful period. On the other hand, new and illustrious proofs of the consummate skill and bravery which characterize our seamen, and the undaunted resolution with which hostile aggression has in various instances been repelled from our borders, have not left us wholly without consolation, nor without recollection of that system of policy which, under God, would have established the security of this nation. We are continually furnished with evidence that although the spirit of conquest is foreign to the genius of our government, and to the moral habits of the people, the resources of the country under a wise and vigorous direction, are abundantly adequate to its defence. We had hoped at the commencement of hostilities, for such a distribution of these resources as that our own territory at least might have escaped violation. A different course was pursued, and we behold its result in the alarming fact, that a war waged by the national authorities is thrown for its support upon individual states. The legislature of the nation cannot be inattentive to this unprecedented state of things.—They will perceive not only the justice but the necessity of relieving the states from a burden, which it was the primary object of their union to avoid. In the mean time, gentlemen, the duties devolved upon us are arduous. They will be executed I trust with proportionate zeal and firmness. And may the Divine blessing attend our endeavours to preserve the important interests committed to our charge.

JOHN COTTON SMITH,

General assembly,
October session, A. D. 1814,

IMPORTANT REPORT.

To the honorable the general assembly now in session.

The committee to whom was referred the speech of his excellency the governor, with the documents accompanying the same; and also his excellency's message presenting a communication from the governor of Massachusetts:

REPORT

That the condition of this state demands the most serious attention of the legislature. We have enjoyed, in common with the other members of the national confederacy, the blessings of peace. The industry of our citizens, in every department of active life, was abundantly rewarded. Our cities and villages exhibited indications of increasing wealth, and the foreign relations of the union secured our safety and nourished our prosperity.

The scene is now reversed. We are summoned to the field of war, and to surrender our treasures for our defence. The fleets of a powerful enemy hover on our coasts, blockade our harbours and threaten our towns and cities with fire and desolation.

When a commonwealth suddenly falls from a state of high prosperity, it behoves the guardians of its interests to inquire into the causes of its decline, and with deep solicitude, to seek a remedy.

In the latter part of last century, a spirit of daring enterprize—impatient of restraint—regardless of the sanctions of religion—hostile to human happiness and aspiring to Supreme power—overturned many ancient governments, made Europe a scene of carnage, and threatened with ruin all that was valuable in the civilized world. The history of its progress and decline is familiar to every mind. Nations without the reach of the immense physical power which it embodied were tainted by its corruptions—and every state and province in Christendom has felt its baleful influences. By the pure principles inherited from our fathers, conducive at once to the preservation of liberty and order, this state has been eminently exempt, in its interior policy, from the modern scourge of nations. In thus withstanding this potent adversary of all ancient establishments, while many monarchies have been subverted, we have exhibited to the world the highest evidence, that a free constitution is not inconsistent with the strength of civil government, and that the virtue of the people is the best preservative of both.

Occupying a comparatively small territory and naturally associating, during the revolutionary war, with states whose views were identified with ours, our interest and inclinations led us, to unite in the great national compact, since defined and consolidated by the constitution of the United States. We had justly anticipated, from that union, the preservation and advancement of our dearest rights and interests, and while the Father of his country, and those other great and wise men, who, mindful of their high duties, and regardless of local and party considerations, consulted the happiness of the commonwealth—guided our councils, we were not disappointed in our expectations. The federal government, in which our own venerable statesmen were conspicuous, was revered in every nation. An American, in foreign lands, was noarible for his country's sake. A rich and virtuous population was rapidly reducing the limits of our extensive wilderness, and the commerce of America was in every sea.

But a coalition, not less evident than if defined by the articles of a formal treaty, arose between the national administration and that fearful tyrant in Europe, who was aspiring to the dominion of the world. No means, however destructive to the commerce, and hazardous to the peace of this country were left unattempted, to aid his efforts, and unite our interests and our destinies with his. From this fatal cause, we are bereft of the respectable standing we once held in the councils of the nation, impoverished by a long course of commercial restrictions, involved in an odious and disastrous war, and subjected to all the complicated calamities which we now deplore.

Thus driven against our inclinations, from every object of our best hopes, and bound to an inglorious struggle to defend our dwellings from a public enemy; we had no apprehension, much as we had suffered from the national government, that it would refuse to yield us such protection as its scanty treasures might afford—much less could we doubt, that those disbursements, which might be demanded of this state would be passed to our credit on the books of the treasury. Such, however, has not been the course adopted by the national agents. All supplies have been withdrawn from the militia of this state in the service of the United States. The groundless pretext for this unwarrantable measure was, their submission to our officer assigned them by the commander in chief, in perfect conformity with military usage, and the principles of a request from the president himself, under which a part of them were detached. The injustice of that measure, by which we were compelled to sustain alone, the burden of supplying and paying our own force in the service of the United States—a service rendered necessary to defend our territory from invasion—is highly aggravated by the consideration that the danger which called them to the field, and the concentration of the enemy's forces on our coasts, have resulted from the ships of the United States having taken refuge in our waters: Were this the only instance evincive of the disregard of the administration to the just claims and best interests of this state—the only ground to fear that we are forgotten in their councils except as subjects of taxation and oppression—we should choose to consider it an instance anomalous and solitary—still yield them our confidence, and hope for protection, to the extent of their power, in this season of unusual calamity.

Protection is the first and most important claim of these states on the government of the nation. It is a primary condition essential to the very obligation of every compact between rulers and their subjects. To obtain that, as a principal object, Connecticut became a member of the national confederacy.—In a defensive war, a government would stand justified, after making a fair application of its powers to that important end—for it could do no more. But when a government hastily declares war without providing the indispensable means of conducting it—want of means is no apology for refusing protection. In such a case, the very declaration of war, is, of itself, a breach of the sacred obligation, inasmuch as the loss of protection by the subject, is the natural and inevitable consequence of the measure. When the war annihilates the only revenue of the nation, the violation of the original contract is still more palpable. If waged for foreign conquest, and the wreck of the national treasures devoted to a fruitless invasion of the enemy's territory, the character of this act is more criminal, but not more clear.

Whatever may be the disposition of the national executive towards this state, during the sequel of the war, such is the condition of the public finances, that constant and very great advances must be made from our state treasury, to meet the expenditures necessary for our own defence. But the utmost efforts of this state under the most favorable circumstances for raising revenue, would be hardly adequate to the costly operations of defending against a great naval power, a sea coast of more than one hundred and twenty miles in length. Much less, at this inauspicious period, when the distresses of the people are enhanced by the embarrassments of our monied institutions, and the circulating medium constantly diminishing, can any thing be spared consistently with our safety. Yet the national government are dooming us to enormous taxation, without affording any just confidence that we shall share in the expenditure of the public revenue. The invasion of Canada is perseveringly pursued, our coasts left defenceless, and the treasures of the country exhausted on more favored points of the national frontier. To meet those demands and at the same time, to defend ourselves is impossible. Whatever we may contribute, we have no reasonable ground to expect protection in return. The people of this state have no disloyalty to the interests of the Union. For their fidelity and patriotism, they may appeal, with confidence, to the national archives from the commencement of the revolutionary war. In achieving the independence of the nation they bore an honorable part.—Their contingent in men and money has ever been promptly furnished when constitutionally required. Much as they lament the present unnatural hostilities with Great Britain, they have with characteristic obedience to lawful authority, punctually paid the late taxes imposed by the general government. On every lawful demand of the national executive, their well disciplined militia have resorted to the field—the public enemy when invading their shores, have been met at the water's edge and valiantly repelled. They duly appreciate the great advantages, which would result from the federal compact, were the government administered according to the sacred principles of the constitution. They have not forgotten the ties of confidence and affection which bound these states to each other, during their toils for independence, nor the national honor and commercial prosperity which they mutually shared during the happy years of a good administration. They are, at the same time, conscious of their rights and determined to defend them.—Those sacred liberties—those inestimable institutions civil and religious, which their venerable fathers have bequeathed them, are, with the blessings of Heaven, to be maintained at every hazard, and never to be surrendered by tenants of the soil, which the ashes of their ancestors have consecrated.

In what manner the multiplied evils, we feel and fear, are to be remedied, is a question of the highest moment, and deserves the greatest consideration. The documents transmitted by his excellency the governor of Massachusetts, present, in the opinion of the committee, an eligible method of combining the wisdom of New England, in devising, on full consultation, a proper course to be adopted, consistent with our obligations to the United States. The following resolutions are therefore respectfully submitted.

Signed by order,

HENRY CHAMPION, Chairman.

General assembly, Oct. 1814.

In the house of representatives, the foregoing report is accepted and approved.

In Senate of Massachusetts.

October 18th, 1814. The hon. Mr. Hill, this day moved—"that a committee be appointed to enquire into the facts in relation to the occupation of a large tract of territory in the district of Maine belonging to this commonwealth, by the enemy; to consider the expediency of expelling him therefrom, and of the most ready and effectual manner of doing it."

The necessity of adopting such a course was strenuously urged by the mover, and the hon. Messrs. Paris, Moody, Kinsely and Holmes, and was opposed by the hon. Messrs. Mills, Sergeant, Thorndike and Otis.

In favor of its adoption, it was said by the mover, that the enemy had taken possession of more than one third of the district which he represented; that their conduct had been such as to render their continuance truly alarming, and that the people whom he represented, had expected that the primary object of the present session was to provide measures immediately to regain possession of our invaded territory—he hoped they would not be disappointed in that expectation; that the legislature would not abandon that section of the commonwealth while a disposition was manifested to render the most ample protection to other parts. He had noticed, with surprise, that this subject, which to him seemed of the greatest importance, had passed unnoticed until this late day in the session, and that nothing but a sense of duty to his constituents could have induced him to trouble the board. He hoped the enquiry would be made, and had no doubt gentlemen would then be satisfied that some effective measures ought immediately to be adopted to relieve a large portion of the citizens of this district, who were now under the control of the enemy, and that he considered this course particularly necessary, as he understood the governor had intimated to his colleague (hon. Mr. Kinsley) that no troops should be sent to their assistance at present. The same reasons were urged by other gentlemen in the minority, but without success. The senate refused to make the enquiry, or to take any measures to give relief to this oppressed section of the commonwealth.

The hon. Mr. Hill, moved on the succeeding day, a reconsideration of the vote, whereby the senate refused to make any enquiry or adopt any measures relative to the occupation of a part of the district of Maine by the enemy; but after debate, THE CONSIDERATION WAS DENIED!

THE WASP, after a Frolic, took a Reindeer, then like the hard of Avon, [Shakspeare's birth place] could the notes of Yankee harmony, to Johnny Bull. If captain Flakely should return to France, as it is probable he may, after reaching a few more of the enemy, what will the Frenchmen think of him and us?

Pirates of Barataria.

Copies of letters from commodore Patterson to the secretary of the navy, dated

New Orleans, 10th October, 1814.

SIR—I have very great satisfaction in reporting to you, that the contemplated expedition against the pirates, so long and strongly established among the western islands and waters of this state, of which I had the honor to inform you in my letter of the 10th ult. has terminated in the capture and destruction of all their vessels in port—their establishments on the islands of Grand Terre, Grand Isle and Cheniere Caminada, and the dispersion of the band themselves. The successful issue of this attack upon them will, I trust, prevent their ever collecting again in force sufficient to injure the commerce of this state.

The force of the pirates was twenty pieces of cannon, mounted, of different calibres, and, as I have learnt since my arrival, from eight hundred to one thousand men of all nations and colors.

I have brought with me to this city six fine schooners and one felucca, cruizers and prizes of the pirates, and one armed schooner under Carthaginian colors found in company and ready to oppose the force under my command.

Herewith I have the honor to transmit a detailed account of this expedition, which, I hope, will prove satisfactory to the department, as also a copy of a letter from Lafitte, the chief of the pirates, to captain Lockyer, of H. B. M. brig Sophia, which forms the conclusion of a correspondence entered into between the English commanders in the Gulf of Mexico and the Floridas, and the pirates, copies of which his excellency governor Claiborne informs me he transmitted to the department of state. This correspondence shews the importance of the expedition and the important species of force we have prevented the enemy's receiving by their proposed alliance with the pirates, and added to our own.

I have the honor to be, with great consideration and respect; your obedient servant,

DANIEL T. PATTERSON.

The hon. WM. JONES,

Secretary of the Navy, Washington.

New-Orleans, October 10, 1814.

SIR—I have the honor to inform you that I departed from this city on the 11th ult. accompanied by colonel Ross, with a detachment of seventy of the 44th regiment of infantry—on the 12th reached the schooner Carolina, at Plaquemine and formed a junction with the gun vessels at the Balize on the 13th—sailed from the south-west pass on the evening of the 15th and at half past 8 A. M. on the 16th made the Island of Grand Terre, (Barataria) and discovered a number of vessels in the harbor, some of which shewed Carthaginian colors—at 9 p.m. perceived the pirates forming their vessels, ten in number, including prizes, into a line of battle near the entrance of the harbor, and making every preparation to offer me battle—at 10, wind light and variable, formed the order of battle with the 6 gun vessels, viz. Nos. 5, 23, 156, 162, 163 and 65, the Sea-Horse tender, mounting 1 six pounder and fifteen men, and a launch mounting 1 twelve pound carronade; the schooner Carolina drawing too much water to cross the bar—at half past 10 perceived several smokes along the coast as signals, and at the same time a white flag hoisted on board a schooner, at the fore, an American flag at the main-mast head, and a Carthaginian flag (under which the pirates cruize) at her topping lift; replied with a white flag at my main; at 11 discovered that the pirates had fired two of their best schooners; hauled down my white flag and made the signal for battle—hoisting with it a large white flag bearing the words “pardon to deserters,” having heard there were a number from the army and navy there, who wished to return if assured of pardon, and which the president's proclamation offered till the 17th. At a quarter past 11 gun-vessels No. 23 and 156 (the latter bearing my pendant) grounded, and were passed agreeably to my previous order, by the other four which entered the harbor; manned my barge and the boats belonging to the grounded vessels, and proceeded in, when to my great disappointment I perceived that the pirates had abandoned their vessels, and were flying in boats, in all directions. I immediately sent the launch and two gun barges with small boats in pursuit of them—at meridian took possession of all their vessels in harbor, consisting of six schooners and one felucca, cruizers and prizes of the pirates, one brig, a prize, and two armed schooners under the Carthaginian flag, both in the line of battle, with the armed vessels of the pirates, and apparently with an intention to aid them in any resistance they might make against me, as their crews were at quarters, tompons out of their guns, and matches lighted. Colonel Ross at the same time landed, and with his command took possession of their establishment on the shore, consisting of about forty houses of different sizes, badly constructed, and thatched with palmeto leaves.

When I perceived the enemy forming their vessels into a line of battle, I felt confident from their number and very advantageous position; and their number of men, that they would have fought me; their not doing so I regret; for had they, I should have been enabled more effectually to destroy or make prisoners of them and their leaders; but it is a subject of great satisfaction to me, to have effected the object of my enterprize, viz. capturing all their vessels in port, and dispersing the band without having one of my brave fellows hurt.

The enemy had mounted on their vessels twenty pieces of cannon of different calibre; and, as I have since learnt, from 800 to 1000 men, of all nations and colors.

Early in the morning of the 20th, the Carolina at anchor, about five miles distant, made the signal of a “strange sail in sight to the eastward,” immediately after, she weighed anchor, and gave chase, the strange sail standing for Grand Terre, with all sail; at half past 8 the chase hauling her wind off shore to escape; sent acting lieutenant Robert Spedden with four boats manned and armed to prevent her passing the harbor; at 9 A. M. the chase fired upon the Carolina, which was returned; each vessel continued firing during the chase, when their long guns could reach—at 10 the chase grounded outside the bar, at which time the Carolina was, from the shallowness of the water, obliged to haul her wind off shore, and give up the chase—opened a fire upon the chase across the island from the gun vessels—at half past 10 she hauled down her colors and was taken possession of by lieutenant Spedden—she proved to be the armed schooner called the general Bolivar, under the Carthaginian flag—by grounding she broke both her rudder pintles, and made water—hove her off in the course of the day, and at day-light on the 21st sent out a small prize schooner to lighten her—took from her her armament, consisting of one long brass 18 pounder, one long brass 6 pounder, two 12 pound carronades, small arms, &c. and twenty-one packages of dry goods, and brought her into port; and as I could not wait for the repairs necessary for her rudder, ordered her to this port for adjudication. I am well convinced that she is one of the vessels belonging to, or connected with the pirates, as signals of recognition for her were found on board one of the pirate's cruizers, and at the time she was discovered, she was standing directly for Grand Terre, which she still endeavored to gain, after being chased by the Carolina, not knowing of our being in possession of it; she fired several shots at the Carolina, after the latter had shewn her colors.

On the afternoon of the 23d got under way, with the whole squadron, in all seventeen vessels—(but during the night one schooner under Carthaginian colors escaped)—on the morning of the 24th entered the south-west pass of this river, and on the 1st inst. arrived opposite this city with all my squadron.

The amount of the prizes and prize goods will probably be considerable; but at present cannot be ascertained.

Three of the schooners are admirably adapted for the public service on this station, being uncommonly fleet sailers and light draught of water, and would be of infinite public utility.

I cannot speak in too high terms of commendation of the good conduct of the officers, seamen and marines whom I have the honor to command; nothing could exceed the zeal shewn by all on this occasion.

Great credit is due to Lieutenant Louis Alexis and Mr. Thomas Shields, purser, for gallantly leading in, in the face of the enemy; the former in the Sea-horse tender; and the latter in the launch, when they had every reason to believe the enemy would open their whole battery upon them, supported by gun vessel No. 5, astern of them, commanded by Mr. J. D. Ferris; Mr. Shields very handsomely volunteered his services on this expedition, and has from his being a seaman rendered me great assistance in taking charge of and bringing one of the prizes to this city.

Lieutenant Thomas A. C. Jones, particularly distinguished himself by boarding one of the schooners which had been fired, and extinguishing the fire after it had made great progress; a quantity of powder being left in her open cabin, evidently designed to blow her up; he is also with lieutenant Norris, and acting lieutenant Thomas S. Cunningham, entitled to my thanks for the severe duty performed by them in open boats for several days and nights.

Acting lieutenant Spedden merits particular notice for the handsome manner in which he led the boats to cut off the General Bolivar, and afterwards bringing her into port.

I am also greatly indebted to lieutenant Alexis, acting lieutenants Spedden and McKeever, sailing masters J. D. Ferris, George Ulrick, and William Johnson, for their indefatigable exertions in fitting the prizes for sea; to acting lieutenant McKeever, also, for his extreme attention to the duties devolving on him from my pendant being hoisted on board No. 23, under his command. I beg leave, sir, to seize this opportunity of recommending these officers to your particular notice, and to solicit a confirmation of their present rank for acting lieutenants Robert Spedden, Isaac McKeever, and Thomas S. Cunningham.

It affords me great satisfaction to inform you that the most cordial co-operation of Col. Ross, and the detachment of his regiment, in every measure adopted or duty performed, the utmost harmony existing between the two corps during the whole expedition, himself, officers, and men sharing in every enterprise or arduous duty where their services could be useful.

Had it been possible for the Carolina to have entered the harbor, or prudent to have drawn her officers and men from her, when anchored in an open roadstead, and where I had every reason to expect the appearance of enemy's cruisers, I should have derived great aid from Captain Hanley, his officers and crew, who all expressed the strongest desire to partake of our toils, and any danger there might be to encounter. I have no doubt the appearance of the Carolina in the squadron had great effect upon the pirates.

I have the honor to be, with great consideration and respect, your obedient servant,

DANL. T. PATTERSON.

The honorable W. JONES,
Secretary of the navy, Washington.

Events of the War.

MISCELLANEOUS.

VERMONT, Montpelier Nov. 3—"The Massachusetts, resolutions have been before us, and the committee to whom they were referred consisting of 3 republicans and 8 federalists from the house, and 3 federalists from the council, have unanimously reported against the adopting them and appointing delegates, and when the report came before the house, it was unanimously accepted."

MASSACHUSETTS. The British with a contemptible force at Castine, hold peaceable possession of about one fourth of the territory of Massachusetts, with her "70,000 militia." Every thing seems settled into a royal provincial government!

NEW-HAMPSHIRE, it appears, will not be represented in the congress at Hartford. A majority of the council who must authorize a call of the legislature, to appoint delegates, is republican. There will only therefore, be a representation from three states; in all, at this time, about as populous as the state of New-York.

CAMDEN, (Me.) A very rich vessel bound for Castine, said to be worth 20,000 pounds, sterling, was brought into Camden, on the 31st ultimo. Shortly after a frigate, a sloop of war and bomb vessel appeared off the place and demanded the goods; or their value; under the penalty, on refusal, to destroy the town. But the goods had been carried 30 miles into the interior, the British commander gave them three days to consider of his demand, at the same time making prisoners of the selectmen. In the interim some militia had collected—and the enemy retired without firing a gun and without the goods, but carrying off the selectmen as hostages for the payment of money demanded.

NANTUCKET AND BLOCK ISLAND.—Capt. Creighton, commander of the flotilla at Newport, (says the Rhode Island American) has issued a naval notice forbidding all boats and vessels, of every description belonging to or sailing from Block Island, to enter any of the harbors or ports of this state. This measure has been adopted, in consequence of the traitorous communication the people of Block Island are supposed to hold with the enemy's squadron.

And lieut. M-gee, commanding at Newbedford has issued the following—"No vessel belonging to Nantucket or Block Island, will be allowed to enter the port of Newbedford; and all vessels belonging to said places will depart in ballast only."

On the operation of these orders, we have the following under date of Providence (R. I.) Nov. 5, noticing the proceedings of the legislature—On Thursday, a complaint was made to the house, by the Block-Island members, that they had been stopped at Newport by the naval officers on that station, (agreeably to a late order for the examination of all Block-Island boats) and detained some time. A Newport member immediately moved the appointment of a committee, to prepare a statement of facts, on which to ground a warrant for the apprehension of the United States officers, who had been guilty of this "outrage" on the honorable members from Block-Island—which was done. Yesterday, this committee reported three affidavits, stating the facts respecting the detention; and, on motion, the house resolved, that said detention was a breach of its privileges; to which succeeded a long desultory conversation, wherein various projects were submitted for healing its wounded dignity, and for punishing the authors of this "flagrant outrage." The whole subject was, however, finally postponed to the next session. A committee was appointed to draft an act "for the better security of the members!"

BLOCK ISLAND, which is represented in the legislature of Rhode-Island, is the rendezvous of the enemy, and the place where they obtain supplies of provisions and water.

GHEENT NEGOCIATION.—The following resolve has passed the Virginia house of delegates—121 to 22. Those in the negative appear to have wished to insert "extravagant" for arrogant, and "degrading" for insulting, as marked in italic.

Resolved, That the general assembly of Virginia regard the terms proposed by the commissioners of Great Britain at the late negotiation at Ghent, as the basis of that negotiation, with the liveliest emotions of indignation as arrogant on the part of Great Britain, and insulting to the United States, meriting instantaneous rejection, and demanding the united exertions of every citizen of these states in the vigorous and efficient prosecution of the war, until it shall be terminated by a just and honorable peace.

AFFAIRS AT DETROIT.—From the Cayuga Patriot.—The following information is derived from a gentleman direct from Detroit.

The 690 Indian warriors consisting for the most part of Shawanoes, Miamies and Potawattemies, who accompanied gov. Cass from Greenville to Detroit, in August last, and who then agreed in future to direct the tomahawk against the enemies of the United States, have proved faithful, having been employed on two expeditions into Canada. The first was to Oxford on the Thames—the last to the Long Point settlement. The object of these expeditions was to diminish the resources of the enemy. The Indians in no instance offered personal violence to the inhabitants of Canada, but their unconquerable thirst to plunder could not be wholly restrained.—At Detroit they were quite averse to discipline, often forcibly seizing the rations issued to the neutral Indians. Gov. Cass finding them unprofitable to the service dismissed them.

The hostile Indians (Chippawas and Sanagas) had recently committed several atrocious murders in and about Detroit. A party of these fellows came into the town, professed friendship—drew rations, tomahawked four persons and made off with themselves. So bold had they become, that they attempted to drive off a drove of cattle in full view of the fort, the guns of which were actually opened upon them before they could be compelled to relinquish their booty. The almost impervious nature of the woods in the rear of Detroit rendered pursuit impracticable, a few only of the fugitives were overtaken and killed. The want of mounted corps to scour the surrounding country was so much felt as to induce governor Cass to write in gen. M^rArthur at Urbana, to hasten on with his disposable force with all possible expedition. The latter arrived at Detroit on the 2d October, three days previous to the departure of our informant, with about 700 mounted riflemen. The Indians were then in considerable numbers lurking in the woods. Travelling had become extremely dangerous; boats had been frequently fired on between Detroit and Malden, and two men killed within two miles of the latter place—a third was taken prisoner by two savages, but rescued himself in the night by killing his captors while asleep. There were very few regular troops at Detroit, not sufficient even to man the fort.

FEMALE PATRIOTISM. The ladies of Charleston, S. C. are famed all over the world, for their spirit of patriotism in the war of the revolution. Their good deeds are embodied in the history of our country. It is delightful to observe that the same devotion to freedom, is yet paid by the fair of that city, in relieving the wants and administering to the comforts of their defenders. One of them lately made a donation of one hundred shirts to the militia stationed there. The good example, we trust will be followed by others.

SALT. A Charleston paper observes that 70,000 bushels of salt were recently sold at Annelia, for 70 cents per bushel; and that several gentlemen from Kentucky had contracted to deliver that article in the upper districts of the state at 250 cents per bushel. The price in Charleston, was (Nov. 3) about 5 dollars a bushel, and about the same in Baltimore. There are many manufactures of salt on the seaboard. New-York and parts adjacent to it, with the whole of the western country, have plenty of it from the salt springs.

TRADE. Thirty sail of vessels with salt, crates, wine, dry goods &c. arrived (inland) at Savannah, for the southward (Annelia) on the 30th ult.

With the English squadron in L. 1. Sound, there is and has been for a considerable time, a number of trading vessels under the agency of a Mr. Barclay, laden with dry goods, &c. &c. "his majesty's" navy has come to a pretty pass—glorious in robbing hen roosts and smuggling.

SMUGGLING. Very extensive smuggling of late prevails on the eastern maritime and inland frontier. By such disgraceful means it is that these states are overflowed with specie. Men of "high standing" are engaged in. The depravity of these creatures is beyond any thing we ever expected to find in the United States. It would be well for the people to make it a principle to buy nothing that comes from that quarter. For myself, I never will knowingly contribute one mite to the revenue of Great Britain or the profits of his friends in America, if I can help it. I would rather pay double for domestic goods, and wear my coat twice as long, to balance the extraordinary expenditure.

BRITISH NAVAL FORCE. The following is the amount of the British Naval force to July 1, 1814:—At sea, 85 ships of the line, 11 of 44 guns, 115 frigates, 84 sloops and 5 yatchts, 6 bombs, 128 brigs, 17 cutters, 33 schooners, gun vessels luggers, &c.—Total 489.—In port and fitting, 37 of the line, 5 of 44 guns, 20 frigates, 28 sloops &c. 2 bombs, 49 brigs, 9 cutters, 14 schooners &c.—Total 163. Guard ships, 3 of the line, 4 of 50 guns, 3 frigates, 5 sloops. Total 16. Hospital ships, prison ships, &c. 29 of the line, 2 of 50 guns, 2 sloops.—Total 33.—Ordinary and repairing for service, 73 of the line, 10 from 50 to 44 guns, 79 frigates, 40 sloops, &c. 4 bombs, &c. 15 brigs, 1 cutter 1 schooner, &c. Total 225. Building, 23 of the line, 4 of 48 guns, 9 frigates, 17 sloops, &c. 2 brigs. Total 55. Grand total 981.

All these cannot secure the trade between England and Ireland, against the Americans, residing 3000 miles off!

LOUISIANA. Some years ago—when Spain (then the ally of France, and thereby hangs the tale) obstructed the navigation only of the Mississippi river, certain gentlemen, deeply impressed with the importance of that right to the people of the west, who would have declared immediate war for it, estimating it to be worth, as they said in the senate of the United States, "ten thousand lives" and "one hundred millions of dollars," are so much infected with notions of "restoration," and not satisfied with what has been done in Europe, such as re-establishing the inquisition and the feudal system, that they would also give up and restore the whole of Louisiana, which we honestly purchased and honestly paid for, and which is now an integral part of the government Tempora mutantur et non mutantur cum illis. However, though it seems that Great Britain, out of pure love for Spain, is willing to give back this state to the arms of its "legitimate sovereign," it also appears, that gov. Claiborne and gen. Jackson, with the people of Louisiana, and of the west generally, are so completely under "French influence," as to prefer the government of the United States to that of the amiable lord Castlereagh, and magnanimous admiral Cockburn!! What a pity that such delusion should exist! How great the misfortune that the people have not embraced the terms of the glorious lieut. col. Nicolls!! or of the hon. captain Percy, ally of Lyfette, the murderer and pirate, and senior officer of "his majesty's" forces in the gulf of Mexico!!!

The citizens of that part of Louisiana, called West Florida, have flown to arms with the soul of one man, to meet the "restorers" on the beach; and punish the insolence of the invader. They have marched at a moment's notice, on the requisition of gen. Jackson, without a man found lagging behind. This is bad news for the "restorers." However, the worst wish we have for them is, that they were fairly in the interior, and within reach of the rifles of Tennessee and Kentucky, directed by "old hickory," as they call our noble commander in that quarter of the country. He as well knows how to settle accounts with Indian Englishmen as English Indians.

BALTIMORE. The following, from "his majesty's printing office at Bermuda" as the article is headed, is the queerest and most lying account of the late attack upon Baltimore that we have yet seen, some "domestic manufactures" excepted:

"Sept. 23.—It appears from report, that after destroying Washington and taking possession of Alexandria, the small body of brave men under general Ross made an attack on Baltimore; the enemy had sunk vessels, and but two or three small craft with bombs could approach: they succeeded, however, in driving the Americans from the fort; having to contend with a very superior force, eventually retired, as the occupation of the town, which might have been gained, would be a poor compensation for the sacrifice of many valuable lives."

TENNESSEE. The people of Tennessee have covered themselves with glory, by the alacrity with which they have taken arms to meet the enemy. A late Knoxville paper says—"The strength of the militia of this state, as returned to the war office, is about 25,000 men, later returns in the adjutant's office, we learn, by the Nashville papers, make it 27,000, "rotten and sound." The requisition of 5000, now made, in addition to those who have already marched, will take all the militia of this state, fit for service, who have not been engaged in it. The sons of Tennessee have thus proved themselves worthy citizens of the American republic; and we hazard nothing, when we give it as our belief, that, should the cause of their country require it, they will again and again, with unabated zeal, render their service."

Let those who grumble so much to the eastward when partially called upon to defend their own towns, reflect upon the preceding. The following from a Nashville paper gives the detail:

"The late requisition of 5,000 militia, from this state to join gen. Jackson, are ordered to rendezvous, the 3,000 from West Tennessee, at Columbia, on the 13th of next month—the 2000 from East Tennessee, at Knoxville on the 13th of next month, brigadier general Smith will command one brigade; and brig. gen. Coulter the other.—The whole under the command of maj. gen. William Carroll.

So soon as the above troops are mustered into service, Tennessee will have furnished since the commencement of the present war with Great Britain, volunteers and militia,

In 1812.	2200
In the Creek war at different periods about	10,000
Now stationed in the Creek nation	1,000
Militia on the march to join gen. Jackson	2,500 Mounted volunteers now on the march to general Jackson	2,500
Present requisition	5,000

Grand total 23,200

Besides about 2,500 regulars, the greater portion of which are now in service."

NORTH CAROLINA. Nine barges of the enemy entered Currituck inlet on the 19th inst. and after destroying three small vessels and some property on shore, retired before the militia could be collected to chastise them.

PAROLE!—A cartel sloop has arrived at Boston from Halifax, with 14 passengers and 10 prisoners—and also three black men; [75, 76, 80 years old] captured in the attack upon Baltimore, transported to Halifax and paroled!!

From the accounts brought by this vessel, there seems little prospect of a speedy release of our people at Halifax. They are generally confined in prison.

VERY IMPORTANT! From a Boston paper. A son of the duke of Clarence (and grandson of the king of England) is a midshipman on board the Newcastle, lord Stewart, now cruising in Boston bay. He is about 12 or 14 years of age, and is an aid to his lordship. He was lately on shore at Provincetown.

NEGROES. It is said there are about 1500 Chesapeake blacks at Halifax, who mostly now find employment, laborers being in demand. Boston paper.

COLS. GIBSON AND WOOD.—Governor Tompkins has given to posterity a remembrance of these gallant men, killed in the sortie at Fort Erie, by calling two new forts, erected for the defence of New-York, by their names.

TO IRISHMEN.—A spirited and elegant address "to Irishmen," appears in the New-York papers, signed by Messrs. Mac Neven and Samson, calling on these, their countrymen, to organize a corps for three months service. The following pithy extract will give the substance of their appeal:

"Our appeal is to the constant; our call is on the brave! Such only are invited whose hearts can answer to the call: broken like the rest, in fortune, we have neither bribe nor patronage to offer, nor any thing to shew, but the dangers of the field. Nor shall we solicit or cajole. Zeal and affection must be the common stock; with these qualities the poor is rich enough; without them the rich are too poor. We have no interest but the safety of our country; no ambition but to march with its defenders. Thrice happy, if in doing so, we avenge the wrongs of our dear native land."

DESERTERS. From the Albany Argus. Most of the deserters from the British army, whom we have seen, are not Englishmen. They are Germans, Frenchmen, Italians, Portuguese and Spaniards. Some of them are Frenchmen, who according to their own account, were inveigled into the British army in France, under pretence of fighting to restore the Bourbons, being attached to that dynasty; and were afterwards brought off against their consent. That such men should desert is not only natural, but justifiable. Some of these men are silk manufacturers; others have been bred in vineyards, and may do well in Kentucky and Ohio, where the cultivation of the grape is daily extending. Among the British subjects who have deserted, we have noted men of almost all trades, but especially a number of Scotch and Irish weavers, some of whom found immediate employ at several of our manufacturing establishments.

Some of the deserters, not British subjects, have enlisted in our army, and we should take care that our soldiers all fare as well as to food, lodging and clothing, as the British, that deserters should never regret the change.

AMERICAN PIPES. (says the Columbian) are made of the usual clay in many parts of the neighboring states, in considerable abundance. This is one of the manufactures the English are com-telling us to establish. There is also an institution at Greenbush, and another at Pittsfield, where we (or they) have been compiling a number of people (Englishmen and Germans, Swiss, Russians, Danes, &c. &c. in the British service) to resort for subsistence, to the amount of 200, the most of whose labor is bestowed on the manufacture of pipes of stone or slate from the quarry. At the entombment at Greenbush 1100 of these pipe-makers from Europe are kept, of whose workmanship some specimens may be seen in Seudler's Museum.

ARGUMENT—The following strange propositions have appeared in the Boston Daily Advertiser. They are charitably ascribed to a half-crazed lawyer—

"The great American people can never admit that they are second in the conflict. Rome often made a disadvantageous peace. France, Great Britain, Austria and Russia have often done the same. All nations have in turns done it when the fortune of war was against them. But we, though engaged in a wicked and rash war—though it costs us a million for every hundred thousand dollars it costs the enemy—though she takes provinces from us while we take acres from her—though our trade is annihilated and hers fills every sea—though our credit is gone and hers higher than ever—yet persevere we will to our own destruction.

"Our enemy asks infinitely less than our government expected. They wrote our commissioners they expected Britain would demand all the fisheries, the relinquishment of the India trade, and Louisiana.

"But when she asked neither, astonished at her moderation, and suspecting she is influenced by fear rather than by equity, taking counsel from their own hearts rather than from her enlarged views, they suppose she is afraid, and cry out that her demands so infinitely short of their expectation, are exorbitant. They will not listen to them.

"Surely Heaven will never favor such a turbulent and unjust spirit. Surely this people, however deceived at first, will never support their rulers in such a war, when so equitable a peace might have been obtained."

MISTAKEN LENITY! The laxity and moderation with which we have treated those persons taken up as spies or traitors has been frequently rewarded by the basest ingratitude. The execution of a few villains at the commencement of the war would have saved the lives of hundreds of honest men. "The glorious uncertainty of the law," by the aid of "well-inclined" judges and lawyers, has almost rendered the word treason obsolete, so far as regards punishment to be inflicted for it—and spies roam abroad, or are permitted to escape, without hindrance.

The two British officers lately taken up near New-London, who pretended they were exchanged, it appears had broken their parole—but the militia general who had them in charge permitted the gentlemen to escape before their real character was ascertained, though it required only a few days to establish the fact.

A late Pittsburg paper says—Joseph C. Berth, who, in January 1812, in company with nine others, broke open the house of the collector of this district and who was severely wounded with a pistol shot, by Mr. Sully, and afterwards smuggled into Canada by certain desperate individuals of this town, accompanied the British fleet, on their late expedition, as a pilot, and was made prisoner.

Joel Ackley, who was for a long time a resident in this village, and who last summer was committed to goal in Albany, for having furnished col. Murray with a plan of this place and Burlington, &c. and released in consequence of some neglect on behalf of the prosecution, was a pilot for the enemy on land.

MILITARY.

FOREIGN NEWS. London dates to Sept. 8.—3000 men, under maj. gen. Keane, were on the point of embarking at Plymouth, Sept. 3, for America—they were considered as the "advance of the main army that was to proceed for the same destination under Lord Hill." Other troops for the expedition had assembled at Portsmouth, of which the names of the several corps are given—it appears they are to be accompanied with a brigade of artillery, furnished with "mountain guns." It is supposed his lordship is to come out in the Valiant, 74, and it now appears pretty certain that he may be expected on our coast. There is much talk in the papers about the negotiation at Ghent; but nothing positively stated. It appears, however, that the commissioners there had had some warm words, and that they made a settlement of differences, (as to their personal disputes) at a splendid entertainment. Our privateers on the British coasts have vexed John Bull to the soul—he sends out ship after ship to catch them; but the Yankees understand the too well for his cruisers. The alarm they have created is really astonishing. Letters from Gottenburg received in New York—state it as the general expectation at that place, that the continue lat powers, at the congress at Vienna, would unite a strong protest against the entire blockade of the whole American coast by the British government.

"Manual exercise of heels"

FROM THE NORTH.—General Brown took command at Sackett's harbor on the 31st ult. His division, in fine health and spirits, must have reached that place from the 10th to the 15th inst. The first brigade, 2000 effectives, passed through Rome on the 7th. The British fleet was in port, November 1. Sir George Prevost was at Kingston, and was said to have 15,000 men, preparing to attack the harbor. Our fleet was finely stationed to receive him. On the 5th inst. fort Erie, according to previous arrangements, was blown up—and the balance of our troops crossed to take up winter quarters near Buffalo. We have nothing certain of the force of the British on the Niagara.

From Detroit we have seen several accounts of murders by the indians in the immediate neighborhood of the place. McArthur, with 650 mounted men was to proceed for Saguia (120 miles from Detroit) on the 22d ult. to attack a body of them in that vicinity.

From the south we have two reports that general Jackson has had a second battle with the British, in which he lost 100 men killed and 160 wounded; they losing 400 men killed—but no time, place, or other circumstance is mentioned. It may be true.

The Seminole indians have raised the tomahawk—they have received orders from the "bulwark of religion" to strike. They are the most savage tribe in the south. Measures have been taken by the Georgians to chastise them.

Captain Larabee, distinguished in the battles of Tippecanoe and Brownstown, (in the latter of which he lost his left arm) has been appointed Assistant Inspector general of the 10th military district, with the rank of major. So far as depends on the United States, we are getting things into the state they should be for the protection of Baltimore, Washington, &c.

GENERAL STRICKER. The resignation of major general Smith of the Maryland militia, commanding the division that embraces Baltimore city and county, and the counties of Frederick, Harford and Cecil, &c. has already been noticed. To fill that vacancy the governor and council have appointed Mr. Robert Goodloe Harper. This, of necessity, produced the resignation of brigadier general Stricker (the senior brigadier in the division) whose conduct during the late trying times is the praise of all men. Where this business will stop we know not; but fear it may end in the full disorganization of one of the finest corps of militia in the world. The following are general Scott's general orders on the occasion:

GENERAL ORDERS.

Adjutant general's office head quarters, Baltimore, 11th November 1814.

It is with much regret that major general Scott has officially to announce to the troops under his command, the resignation of brigadier general John Stricker, late commander of the third Maryland brigade, now in the service of the United States. This regret is, unfeignedly expressed, from the high sense entertained of the military and meritorious services rendered by the late brigadier, as well during our revolutionary struggle, as on a late important and trying occasion, when, at the head of his gallant and disciplined brigade, he met the enemy in the neighborhood of this city. Baltimore will long recollect what is due to her gallant defender, and in him the nation will recognize a public benefactor.

Brigadier general Stricker will please accept the thanks of the commanding general for his strict observance of general orders, and for the unwearied attention to duty and discipline, which has so highly characterised the brigadier and the brigade, since they came under the orders of the major general commanding.

The third brigade of Maryland militia will be mustered for discharge on the 18th inst. in the mean time, or until a brigadier shall be appointed, the senior lieutenant colonel will assume the command, and appoint pro. tem. the necessary staff, who shall be entitled to the pay and other allowances of their respective officers.

By order of major general Scott, commanding,

R. G. HITE,

Assistant adjutant general.

Expedition up the Missouri.—St. Louis, Sept. 24.

The party who ascended the Missouri by water, about the time major Taylor's command ascended the Mississippi, amounted to forty-five men, under the command of captain Edward Hempstead. The mounted men under the command of general Dodge, including 40 or 50 Shawanoes, might perhaps amount to 300, viz. captain John Thompson's troop from St. Louis, captain Daugherty's troop from Cape Gerardeau, captain Cooper's troop of Boon's Lick settlement. The whole having formed a junction at the upper settlement, proceeded to the Miami fort, a little below fort Osage, on the south side of the Missouri. The Indians had deserted the fort and were scattered in the woods, but were soon collected and brought to this place to the number of 152 men, women and children. The mounted men of St. Louis and Cape Gerardeau have gone on to Cape Grai.

These Miames of Plankashaws, are reduced to the most abject poverty and wretchedness. It will be recollected they were sent to the west by governor Harrison, in order to detach them from the prophet band. They came to the Mississippi, and from thence wandered to the Missouri, from whence they have now been taken.

Some say they have covertly assisted in the murdering and plunderings on the frontiers. Others say, they are a nation who have evinced a friendly deportment towards the United States since the commencement of the war.

It is confidently said, that the British force at Rock River are 12 artillerists and 60, or 80 boatmen, who act as a fencible corps, with about 700 Indians.

Six soldiers were lately shot at Plattsburg for desertion. The passing over this crime at first, has rendered such executions too frequent.

The National Intelligencer, gives an opinion, that the proposal for classing the militia of U. S. (see page 137) will not be adopted.

*Adjutant and Inspector General's Office,
Washington, 18th November, 1814.*

Inspector General

ACTION AT LYON'S CREEK.

GENERAL ORDERS.

Head-quarters of the northern army, camp near fort Erie, October 23d, 1814.

The indisposition of brigadier general Bissell has prevented till this morning, his report of the hand, some affair which took place on the 19th, between a detachment of his brigade, and a superior force of the enemy.

The object of the expedition entrusted to the brigadier, was the seizure of some provisions intended for the British troops. He marched from Black creek on the morning of the 18th, with parts of the 5th, 14th, 15th, and 16th infantry, a small party of dragoons, and a company of riflemen, the whole 900 men. After driving before them a picket, of which they made the commanding officer prisoner, they encamped for the night, throwing beyond Lyon's creek two light infantry companies, under captain Dorman, 5th, and lieutenant Howell, 16th infantry, and the riflemen under captain Irvine; a picket on the Chippewa road, commanded by lieutenant Gassaway, was attacked by two companies Glen-gary light infantry, which were beaten back with loss. On the morning of the 19th, the detachment was attacked by a select corps of the enemy, not less than 1200 strong. The light infantry under captain Dorman, and Irvine's riflemen, sustained the whole fire of the enemy for fifteen minutes, during which time the 5th and 14th were formed—the 5th was ordered to turn the enemy's right flank, while the 14th charged them in front. This was executed in the most gallant manner by colonel Pinckney of the 5th and major Barnard of the 14th, who greatly distinguished himself by the officer-like style in which he conducted his battalion. The enemy were compelled to a precipitate retreat, and hid themselves once more behind their fortifications.

Brigadier general Bissell particularly mentions the skill and intrepidity of colonel Snelling, inspector general, colonel Pinckney, commanding the 5th regiment, major Barnard, 14th infantry, major Barker, 45th infantry acting with the 5th, captain Dorman, captain Allison, (whose horse was shot under him) and brigadier major, lieutenant Prestman, of the 5th. Lieutenant Anspaugh, of dragoons, was conspicuous by his alertness in communicating the brigadier general's orders during the action. It is with the highest satisfaction, that the commanding general tenders to the brave officers and troops of the 2d brigade of the right division, his thanks for their good conduct on this occasion. The firmness of the 15th and 16th regiments commanded by colonel Pierce, and who were posted as a reserve, proved, that had the resistance of the enemy afforded them an opportunity of going into action, they would have emulated the valor of the commanders of the 5th and 14th. A number of prisoners were taken, among whom a picket of dragoons with their horses; a large quantity of grain also fell into our hands. The brigadier, after completing the orders he had received, and burying the few of our brave soldiers who fell in the action, and the dead of the enemy, which were left on the ground by the latter, returned to Black creek. To the cool and intrepid conduct of brigadier general Bissell, the general offers the praise he has so justly entitled himself to.

By order of major general Izard,

C. K. GARDNER, adj. gen. northern army.

Camp Frenchman's creek, October 22, 1814

SIR—I have the honor to report, that in obedience to your orders of the 18th instant, I proceeded with about 900 men of my brigade, a company of riflemen, under captain Irvine, and a small party of dragoons, under lieutenant Anspaugh, by very bad roads and creeks, the bridges over which were broken down, to Cook's mills, on Lyon's Creek, a branch of the Chippewa, and encamped for the night: near that place the enemy had stationed a militia piquet of 20 men, commanded by a captain who made their escape on our approach, the captain excepted, who was taken. Their piquet of regulars found at this place was driven in, and I threw across, at that place, (the only one at which it was practicable) the two elite companies under captain Dorman, 5th, and lieutenant Horrel, 16th infantry and the riflemen under captain Irvine; our advanced piquet on the Chippewa road, commanded by lieutenant Cassaway was attacked in the night by two companies of the Glangary light infantry, who were beaten off with the loss of one man only. On the morning of the 19th, we were attacked by the enemy in force; from the best information amounting to more than 1200 men composed of the 82d and 87th regiments of foot, detachments of the 100th, 104th, the Glangary light infantry, a few dragoons, and rocketeers, and one piece of artillery; the whole commanded by the marquis of Tweeddale, colonel of the 100th.

The light corps under captain Dorman and Irvine's riflemen, sustained the whole fire of the enemy for about fifteen minutes, with the greatest gallantry, until the other troops were formed and brought to their support.

The 5th regiment under colonel Pinckney, aided by major Baker of the 45th, attached to that regiment, was ordered to skirt the woods and turn the enemy's right flank, and if possible to cut off the piece of artillery.

Maj. Bernard with the 14th, was ordered at the same time to form in front, advance to support the light troops and charge the artillery; the 15th regiment under major Grindage, and 16th under colonel Pierce were ordered to act as circumstances might require.

The well directed fire of the elite corps, riflemen, and gallant charge of the 14th, soon compelled the enemy to give ground, and on discovering that his right flank was turned by the intrepid move of the 5th under colonel Pinckney, he retreated in the utmost confusion, leaving some killed, wounded and prisoners; we pursued to a ravine some distance from the scene where the action commenced; not knowing the ground, I did think proper to push them further; but, soon after reconnoitered the country and discovered they had retreated to their strong hold at the mouth of the river about seven miles distance.

To the officers and men engaged great credit is due for their zeal and intrepidity, and to those who had not an opportunity to come into action, for the promptitude with which they obeyed our orders. All did their duty; but the handsome manner in which major Bernard brought his regiment into action, and the gallant conduct of the elite, under captain Dorman deserve particular notice. I am much indebted to that distinguished officer, colonel Snelling, (inspector general), for his able services, through the action, and much praise is due to my aid, captain Allison, (whose horse was shot under him) and brigade major lieutenant Prestman, for their intrepid and useful services in every situation. Lieutenant Anspaugh of the dragoons rendered me much service in communicating my orders. It is justly due, and I must be permitted to add that every officer and private behaved with that skill and gallantry, which will do honor to the American arms. We found in the mills at that place, about 150 or 200 bushels of wheat, belonging to the enemy, which I ordered to be destroyed. The enemy having retreated to his batteries on the Chippewa; in obedience to your orders, I returned, leaving the causeways, bridges, &c. entire. I annex for your information, a return of killed and wounded.

I have the honor to be, sir, your obedient servant.

NAVAL.

Queer news!—A Quebec paper states, that in the action on lake Champlain, the American fleet was driven for shelter under our batteries, by commodore Downie; that the British flag ship struck on a sunken rock, in rounding to for the purpose of lying her broadside to the American commodore; and that the Linnet (the enemy's 2d vessel) grounded in going into action!

Among the vessels that have lately sailed from the United States "without permission" for the British coasts, is a fine brig from Kennebunk, called the Macdonough. She was built in 30 days. When the rendezvous was opened at Portsmouth for the private armed ship America, 300 brave fellows presented themselves in the course of one hour, to "lend a hand" in blockading the British ports. The late successful cruises of our privateers have excited a spirit to the eastward that will be severely felt by the enemy.

The late United States' sloop of war Frolic, now called the Florida, is off the eastern coast.

It is stated that the Saturn and another razees have left the neighborhood of New London for the Delaware, to intercept the Guerriere, com. Rodgers, who, they have learnt, is nearly ready for sea. The captain of one of these vessels, would have thought himself sufficient for this object—three years ago.

Admiral Cochrane sailed from Halifax, (says a New York paper) promising to give "the Southern men another warning," after which he should return to the Northward, and take possession Newport for winter quarters.

A Bermuda paper of Oct. 19, says—Capt. Kenah, of the Ætna bomb, lost his life in an attack on some militia in the Potomac.

The Carthaginian privateer Retaliation, from a cruise of 90 days, laden with dry goods, &c. has arrived at Charleston. She was bound for St. Mary's, but discovering off that port several British vessels of war, made for Charleston.

A Boston paper observes—Nearly 300 British seamen have been brought in prisoners by our privateers, within these few weeks; and double that number paroled at sea.

The Cossack of Baltimore, has arrived at Boston from Charleston, with a very valuable and seasonable cargo.

Owing to severe weather on our coast, several of our small vessels captured by the enemy to the eastward, have been forced to seek our ports, where their crews surrendered themselves prisoners.

SCORPION AND TIGRESS.—Montreal, Oct. 15, 1814. His excellency sir George Prevost issued the following general order, at Cornwall, U. C. the 7th inst.

"His excellency the commander of the forces has received from lieutenant-general Drummond, a report from lieutenant-colonel M'Donnell, dated Mackinaw, the 9th September, conveying the gratifying intelligence of the capture of two armed schooners, Tigress and Scorpion, which the enemy had stationed at the Detour, near St. Joseph's, for the purpose of cutting off all supplies from the garrison at Mackinaw.

This gallant enterprise was planned and executed by lieutenant Worsley of the royal navy, and a detachment of 50 of the Royal Newfoundland regiment, under the command of lieutenant Bulger attached for this service to the division of seamen under that officer.

The United States sch. Tigress was carried by boarding at nine o'clock on the night of the 3d inst. and the sch. Scorpion at dawn of day on the morning of the 6th inst.

The skilful conduct and intrepidity, displayed in the execution of this daring enterprise, reflects the highest credit on lieutenant Worsley of the royal navy, and the officers, seamen and soldiers under his command. Lieutenants Bulger, Armstrong and Ridenhurst, of the royal Newfoundland regiment, are noticed by lieutenant-colonel M'Donnell; as also Mr. Dickson and Livingston of the Indian department, who volunteered their services on this occasion.

The enemy's loss was three seamen killed, and all the officers of the Tigress and three seamen severely wounded.

The Scorpion mounted one long 24 pounder and a long 12; the Tigress one long 24 pounder. They were commanded by lieutenant Turner of the American navy, and had crews of 30 men each.

The British loss is two seamen killed.

Lieutenant Bulger, Royal Newfoundland regiment and several soldiers, slightly wounded.

(Signed) EDWARD BAYNES, Adj. Gen. M. A. Michilimackinac, 7th Sept. 1814.

[Here follows a long letter, says a Boston paper, from Michilimackinac describing the joy of the above event. The sailors, it says, employed in the expedition was 18, and with the troops embarked in four batteaux. They rowed 45 miles. When the prizes were brought into Mackinac, they were greeted with the acclamations of thousands.]

Extract of a letter from captain Arthur Sinclair, commanding the U. S. naval force on the Upper lakes, to the secretary of the navy, dated Eric Roads, 11th of November, 1814.

Sailing-master Champlin, who commanded the Tigress, has arrived here in the cartel from Mackinac, with some of the wounded. He has his thigh shattered by a grape shot, and has not yet been able to make out a detailed report of his capture. He appears not to have been surprised, but defended his vessel very bravely, killing and wounding a number of the enemy, who overpowered him with 150 sailors and soldiers, and 250 Indians, the latter headed by Dickson. The Scorpion was overpowered as mentioned in my letter of the 27th ult. The conduct of the enemy to our prisoners thus captured, and the inhuman butchery of those who fell into their hands at the attack of Mackinac, has been barbarous beyond a parallel. The former has been plundered of almost every article of clothing they possessed—the latter had their hearts and livers taken out, which were actually cooked and feasted on (and that too in the quarters of the British officers, sanctioned by col. M'Dowell) by the savages.

This Cannibal act, which has capped the climax of British atrocity, and must ever be viewed with indignant horror by the Christian world, will be sworn to by two respectable ladies, who came down in the cartel and who were witnesses to it. I am further assured by Mr. Astor, who was detained there with his cartel for near two months, that it was not disowned by the garrison of Mackinac, and that when remonstrance was made by some who had not lost all sense of feeling and honor, they were threatened with arrest by the colonel, if they checked the Indians in any of their wishes. One of the prisoners was inhumanly murdered, by one of their militia, to decide a dispute between him and an Indian, of who had the best claim to the reward of his body or scalp, and no notice was taken of it by the colonel. To relate to you, sir, all the acts of horror which have been practised upon those unfortunate victims who fell into the enemy's hands on the 4th August would go far beyond the limits of a letter.

Eric, Nov. 11. Arrived on Sunday last, the cartel schooner Union, R. Martin master, 16 days from Mackinaw, and 3 days from Detroit, with furs and peltry, the property of John J. Astor. Besides several other passengers, came sailing-master, Mr. Champlin, late commander of the Tigress, who we are happy to learn, is in a fair way of recovering from the wounds he received in gallantly defending his vessel. Lieutenant Turner, and most of the officers and men of the captured schooners, have been sent to Quebec. Lieutenant Worsley was at the head of the expedition sent against the Scorpion and Tigress. After the block house and Nancy were blown up at Notowasaga, he coasted round from that place, in boats and canoes with 22 men, and arrived safe at Mackinaw. He immediately applied to lieutenant-colonel M'Dowell, for 100 of the Newfoundland regiment, (mostly fishermen) and said he would bring in the two American schooners. Unfortunately for us he succeeded.

The Union was detained at Mackinaw 38 days, until the schooners made a trip to Notowasaga, and returned with provisions. During this time her crew were closely watched. The commanding officer placed sentinels over the vessel, who were permitted to plunder with impunity. When Mr. Champlin and 4 seamen, (all paroled prisoners) were put on board the cartel, lieutenant-colonel M'Dowell refused to order on board any provisions, saying he supposed Mr. Astor had a sufficiency.

The passengers from Mackinaw speak in high terms of the humane and gentlemanly conduct of Mr. Robert Dixon, at the same time they depict the conduct of lieutenant-col. M'Dowell as illiberal, rascally and contemptible. The principal agent of Mr. J. J. Astor, says that lieutenant-colonel M'Dowell is unquestionably the greatest savage he saw on the island.

About ten days previous to the cartel leaving Detroit, general M'Arthur with about 700 mounted men, and a few Indians, had gone on a secret expedition. Governor Cass has gone on a visit to the state of Ohio.

STINGS OF THE WASP.

Copy of a letter from sailing-master Geisinger, of the United States' sloop of war Wasp, to the secretary of the navy, dated Savannah, November 4, 1814.

SIR—I have the honor to acquaint you of my arrival at this port in the British brig Atalanta, of 8 guns, prize to the United States' sloop of war Wasp, captured off the Madeiras on the 21st September.

Captain Blakely's official despatches will be delivvered to you by Mr. Robert R. Stewart, of Philadelphia, who left L'Orient, passenger in the Wasp. He will be detained here a day or two in order to give some testimony respecting the prize, and will immediately proceed to Washington.

The Atalanta was formerly the American schooner Siro, of Baltimore, captured in the bay of Biscay, by the British sloop of war Pelican. Her cargo consists of brandy, wine, silks, fruits, &c.

I have the honor to be, your obedient servant,

DAVID GEISINGER.

Honorable William Jones, secretary of the navy.

The Wasp has been one of the most successful of our cruizers. By the accounts below it appears she has sunk a second sloop of war, and made many additional captures. It is supposed that since her departure from the United States, she has destroyed enemy's property to the value of two hundred thousand pounds sterling! She sailed from L'Orient, in fine condition, on the 27th Aug. and between that date and the 22d September, (when the Atalanta left her) made five valuable prizes besides the Atalanta, which she sunk or burnt. A letter from an officer on board of her says, her complement of 173 men, have an average age of only 23 years, "the greatest part so green, that is, so unaccustomed to the sea, that they were sea-sick for a week;" and adds, "the Wasp is a beautiful ship, and the finest sea-boat, I believe, in the world; our officers and crew, young and ambitious—they fight with more cheerfulness than they do any other duty. Captain Blakeley is a brave and discreet officer—as cool and collected in action as at table."

The following particulars are from the Savannah Republican.

On the 1st September, at half-past 6 o'clock, P.M. the United States' ship Wasp discovered three sail to the lee bow—at 7 discovered a sail to windward, which proved to be a brig of war, with a signal at her fore-top-gallant mast head. The Wasp was immediately prepared for action, and chased the enemy till a quarter past 9 o'clock, when she hailed the enemy and asked what vessel it was; but receiving an answer not at all satisfactory, gave the enemy a gun, which was returned by a broadside from him. The Wasp then took a position on the lee quarter of the enemy, and poured a broadside into him, which brought down his fore and aft main sail, and soon after his main-top-sail followed—the action then became general—50 minutes past 9 the Wasp being to windward—at 10 the enemy ceased firing—he was then hailed from the Wasp to know whether he had surrendered—to this enquiry no answer was given, but fired a gun and a few muskets from his tops—which was returned by the Wasp by several guns. The Wasp a second time demanded of the enemy if he had surrendered, to which he answered that he had; and observed that he was in a sinking condition—the Wasp's boats were instantly lowered down, but at that moment a man of war brig was discovered within musket shot; and two others to leeward of her—the prize was abandoned—the Wasp made sail and prepared for another action—at 11 o'clock the brig hove in stays, and gave the Wasp a broadside and then stood off together with the other two for the prize which was supposed to be sinking from the many signal guns they fired on board of her. The broadside which the Wasp received from the second brig cut away her main-top-sail-back-stay and damaged the top considerably.

Killed on board of the Wasp in the first engagement, Mr. Martin, boatswain, Henry Staples, 2d quarter gunner—wounded, James Snelling.

List of vessels captured by the United States' ship Wasp, from the 27th August to 22d September, 1814.

August 30th captured British brig Lutice, with a cargo of pork, &c. burnt her.

31st, boarded the brig Bony Cerd from Seville, bound to London, with Merino wool, fruits and wine; scuttled her.

Sept. 1, fell in with a convoy from Gibraltar, of 16 sail, under the Armada 74, and a bomb ship—succeeded in cutting off a transport loaded with naval and military stores, &c. set her on fire in sight of the convoy.

12th September, captured the British brig Three Brothers with a cargo of wine, &c. burnt her.

13th, captured the brig Bacchus, from Newfoundland to Gibraltar, destroyed her.

September 23d captured the British brig Atalanta of 8 guns, with a valuable cargo, from Bordeaux bound to Pensacola.

NAVAL VICTORY.—British accounts. Truth, Sept. 8, 1814.—By the Lady Arabella packet, which arrived at Falmouth on Wednesday from Lisbon, but last from Cork, we learn that about an hour before the packet left the latter place, H. M. brig Castilian, 18 guns, arrived there, having on board the captain, and surviving crew of H. M. late brig Avon, of 18 guns, which had sunk after a desperate action with the American ship of war Wasp, of 22 guns, which sheered off on the Castilian's coming up.—The Avon lost 30 men in killed and wounded. The slaughter on board the Wasp was also conjectured to be very great.

From the Boston Coffee-House Books—The gentlemen state, that they saw in the papers at Halifax, a more particular account of the action between the Wasp and Avon, which mentioned, that the Castilian fell in with them at the close of it, and had but a few minutes to remove the officers and crew, before she went down; that on the Castilian coming up, the Wasp sheered off, being too much disabled to risk another engagement. It was also stated, that the Avon had not struck, but was reported to have had her colors nailed to the mast, and went down with them flying.

London, August 22.

AMERICAN PRIVATEERS. The directors of the Royal Exchange and London Assurance Corporations, strongly impressed with the necessity for greater protection being afforded to the trade in consequence of the numerous captures that have recently been made by American cruisers, represented the same to the lords commissioners of the admiralty on Wednesday last, and on Saturday received an answer, of which the following is a copy:

Admiralty Office, Aug. 19.

SIR—Having laid before my lords commissioners of the admiralty, the letter of the 12th inst. signed by you and the secretary of the London Assurance Corporation, on the subject of depredations committed by the American privateers therein mentioned, I am commanded by their lordships to acquaint you, that there was a force adequate to the purpose of protecting the trade, both in St. George's Channel and the Northern Sea, at the time referred to.

I am, &c.

(Signed) J. W. CROKER.

After giving the names of some vessels captured, the same paper adds—"Should the depredations on our commerce continue, the merchants and traders will not be able to get any insurance effected, except at enormous premiums on vessels trading between Ireland and England, either by the chartered companies or individual underwriters; and as a proof of this assertion, for the risks which are usually written 15s. 9. per cent. the sum of five guineas is now demanded."

London, Sept. 1. It is the intention of the adm^{ty} ally, in consequence of the numerous captures made by the Americans, to be extremely strict with the captains who quit their convoy at sea, or who contrary to orders, sail without convoy. Prosecutions of masters of ships for neglect of this description, have already commenced, as will be seen by the subjoined extract of a letter:

Lloyd's August 31, 1814. The lords commissioners of the admiralty have been pleased to inform the committee, that they have given directions to their Solicitor to prosecute the masters of the following vessels, viz.: Mr. Stuart, of the Arabella, lately arrived at Liverpool from St. Domingo and Jamaica, for sailing without convoy; and Mr. Rundell, master of the New Frederick, from Malta to Hull, for deserting the fleet under convoy of his majesty's ship Milford, in June last.

(Signed) JOHN BENNETT, Jun.

Ontario, &c.—A letter from Sackett's harbor gives the following account of the strength of the main moth ship of the British on lake Ontario:—"She has 34 long 32 pounders on her lower deck; 34 long 24 pounders on the middle deck, 20 carronades 68 pounders on the spar deck, and 14 carronades 32 pounders besides. Sir James is, also, building a large frigate at Kingston.

Copy of a letter from captain Gordon to the secretary of the navy, dated

NORFOLK, 8th Nov. 1814.

SIR—I have to report to you the loss of one of our tenders [the Franklin] commanded by Mr. Hamersley, master's mate, after a very gallant defence of an hour and a half, against a tender and fourteen barges and boats of the enemy, off Back River Point, on Sunday last.

From the late depredations of the enemy's boats upon the bay craft in Back river, and having also extended their operations into Hampton Roads for the first time these twelve months, I was induced on Saturday evening last, to order the two tenders and four of my boats off Back river for the purpose of conveying several bay craft which had been reported to me in that river and bound to this place, with positive orders to the officers to avoid separation in the night, and return to Hampton Roads with the craft without delay. Unfortunately, however, they were unavoidably separated in the night; the boats, owing to a rough sea, returned into Hampton, and the Franklin is reported to have separated from the Despatch at 11, P. M.

Lieutenant Saunders, of the Despatch, finding in the morning, from the ignorance of his pilot and a light wind, that he had drifted near the enemy's ships in Lynnhaven, and that they were manning their boats to attack him, immediately manned his sweeps and made a signal for our boats, who were under Old Point, and also the Franklin, that lay nearly becalmed up the bay and considerably to the eastward. The boats immediately joined the Despatch, and a little breeze springing up, the enemy's boats and tenders after exchanging a few shot gave over the chase and directed their attention to the Franklin. They came up and surrounded her about 10, when the firing commenced, and were repulsed until half past 11, when she was carried by boarding. I, of course, have no report from the Franklin, but have sent lieutenant Neale with a flag to ascertain the fate of her gallant officers and crew, which consisted of about thirty five; and as there is a masters' mate and three seamen at present prisoners of war in Norfolk, I have authorised lieutenant Neale to make any temporary exchange the commanding officer at Lynnhaven may appear disposed to accede to, with an assurance that on any practicable arrangements which might be entered into, such as paroling the whole until a communication could be made to the commissary general of prisoners for an exchange, I would lose no time in making the necessary application for that purpose.

Owing to some changes among the boats and tenders while in the roads, I am unable to ascertain, at this moment, the precise number of the Franklin's crew, but judge them to be about thirty one men, besides Mr. Hamersley, her commander, one midshipman (Mr. Cook) and two acting as masters mates and pilots.

I have much satisfaction in assuring you, that every exertion was made by lieutenant Sanders to unite his whole force, until the whole of the enemy's had effectually cut them off from the Franklin; and from the report of the inhabitants who were on the beach and witnessed the gallant defence of that vessel until completely surrounded, and carried by the boarding of five heavy boats at the same moment, and after having beaten off their tender and two heavy launches, at different periods of the action, I cannot refrain from soliciting your attention to her meritorious though unfortunate commander, should he have survived the action.

I have the honour to be, very respectfully, your obedient servant.

CHARLES GORDON.

The honorable Wm. Jones,

Secretary of the navy, Washington,

Copy of a letter from capt. Gordon to the secretary of the navy, dated

Norfolk, 9th Nov. 1814.

SIR—I have the honor to enclose herewith, the report of Mr. Hamersley, commander of the United States' tender Franklin, from which it appears she was not carried by boarding, as reported by the citizens of Hampton, and, fortunately, did not lose a man though from the enemy's own account to lieutenant Neale, she contended for an hour and a half against fourteen boats and a tender; in all mounting five 18 pounders and carrying two hundred and twenty men, commanded by sir Edward Hamilton of the frigate Havanna.

The circumstance of Mr. Hamersley being a prisoner would, of course prevent him from stating other particulars in his report. Capt. Doyle, the senior officer at Lynnhaven, and sir Edward Hamilton, are reported by lieutenant Neale to have behaved in the most gentlemanly manner, and have made a temporary exchange of our midshipman, Mr. Cook, and three men, for the prisoners now in Norfolk, until finally settled by the commissary general of prisoners. The names and rank of the prisoners remaining unexchanged, together with those four exchanged in a temporary manner by capt. Doyle and myself, shall be forwarded without delay.

I have the honor to be, &c.

CHAS. GORDON.

Honorable Wm. Jones,

Secretary of the navy, Washington.

THE ENEMY IN THE DELAWARE.

The British force at present in the Delaware consists of one 74, one razee, one frigate, 2 brigs, one schooner of 14 guns, and four small vessels as tenders. They have captured some bay craft, and also re-captured a prize to the Patapco of Baltimore. Preparations are made by general Gaines to receive them, if they shall venture on shore.

THE ENEMY IN THE CHESAPEAKE.

Since our last have had some of their small vessels as high up as Poplar island, and are said to have captured about fifteen small craft.

That part of the prisoners taken near Baltimore in September last, who were sent to Bermuda, have reached their homes. Those from Halifax may be soon expected.

Humiliation, Fasting and Prayer.

BY THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES.

A Proclamation.—The two houses of the national legislature having, by a joint resolution, expressed their desire, that in the present time of public calamity and war, a day may be recommended to be observed by the people of the United States as a day of Public Humiliation and Fasting, and of Prayer to Almighty God, for the safety and welfare of these states, his blessing on their arms, and a speedy restoration of peace—I have deemed it proper, by this proclamation, to recommend that Thursday the twelfth of January next be set apart as a day on which all may have an opportunity of voluntarily offering, at the same time, in their respective religious assemblies, their humble adorations to the Great Sovereign of the Universe, of confessing their sins and transgressions, and of strengthening their vows of repentance and amendment. They will be invited by the same solemn occasion, to call to mind the distinguished favors conferred on the American people, in the general health which has been enjoyed; in the abundant fruits of the season; in the progress of the arts, instrumental to their comfort; their prosperity and their security; and in the victories which have so powerfully contributed to the defence and protection of our country; a devout thankfulness for all which ought to be mingled with their supplications to the Beneficent Parent of the human race, that He would be graciously pleased to pardon all their offences against Him; to support and animate them in the discharge of their respective duties; to continue to them the precious advantages flowing from political institutions so auspicious to their safety against dangers from abroad, to their tranquility at home, and to their liberties, civil and religious; and that He would, in a special manner, preside over the nation, in its public councils and constituted authorities, giving wisdom to its measures and success to its arms, in maintaining its rights, and in overcoming all hostile designs and attempts against it; and finally, that by inspiring the enemy with dispositions favorable to a just and reasonable peace, its blessings may be speedily and happily restored.

Given under my hand, at the City of Washington, the sixteenth day of November, one thousand eight hundred and fourteen, and of the Independence of the United States, the thirty-eighth.

JAMES MADISON.

Proceedings of Congress.

The usual detail was neglected until too late for this paper—but the history of proceedings shall be compressed in our next. Not much business has been done, except to pass the loan bill and the act to authorise the fitting out of certain small armed vessels. The house have the bill to establish a national bank before them, on the principles to constitute which a great diversity of opinion exists—however, we rather believe it will pass pretty nearly as reported, with the addition of several other places where subscriptions shall be received.

☞ See next article.

The senate have had before them bills for classing the militia, and authorising the president to call them out for the defence of the frontiers. They are interesting and may be inserted at length. They have had also before them a bill making further provision for filling the ranks of the army—which allows the enlistment of free persons above the age of 18 years without the consent of the parent, master, guardian, &c. in writing, provided masters of apprentices shall receive a certain portion of the bounty, &c. The 3d section increases the land bounty to 320 acres—the 4th provides that any person who shall according to law, furnish at his own expence a recruit for the army, to serve during the war, shall thereafter be exempt from militia duty; a motion to strike out the provision as to minors was lost—ayes 11—nays 21.

From yesterday's National Intelligencer.

THE NATIONAL BANK BILL.

After a very able debate, yesterday, the house of representatives decided, by an immense majority in favor of Mr. Calhoun's amendment. The effect of this vote is, supposing the bill to be further amended (as is probable) in conformity to the views expressed by Mr. Calhoun, to give to the bank bill the following features: the capital to be fifty millions; subscriptions to be opened monthly in certain proportions, the whole amount of subscription to be paid in at the time of subscribing—in the following proportions of specie and paper—six millions in specie, and forty-four millions in Treasury notes, hereafter to be issued in such proportions monthly as the bank will absorb; the United States to hold no stock in the bank, no control in its direction, nor any legal right to demand loans from the bank.

Thus amended, it is our belief the bill will pass the house of representatives. Its fate in the senate, with its present provisions, is perhaps questionable.

Foreign Intelligence.—The fate of Norway is still undecided—In a great battle fought with the invading Swedes, 15,000 men are said to have been killed on both sides—on which side the victory was not stated. Switzerland was in a very disturbed state—Saxony is anxious for the restoration of her king, and is said to be encouraged in the notion by Austria, to thwart the designs of Prussia. Denmark appoints a member to the great congress at Vienna. The "emperor Napoleon" was about to establish a "court gazette" at Elba, &c. write his own life and a history of his times, &c. His wife, Maria Louisa, openly manifests her attachment to him, and an idea has gone abroad that Austria may enlarge the space of his empire. He has 1200 men under him at Elba, as a royal guard—Talleyrand represents France at Vienna. The following placard was lately posted on one of the gates of the palais royal:—"An old fat hog, 8d twenty years in England, valued at Eighteen Louis, to be disposed of for One Napoleon." Belgium will possibly soon be the theatre of war—Wellington is there with a great force, and the Hanoverians were hasting to join him—France, we believe, will not give up these provinces, without another war. Austria has her war establishment complete—Bavaria is increasing her army, and the Hessians are up to their full complement—the king of Naples is organizing and increasing his army, as he says, to act against the Barbary powers: it appears quite plain that a new war is expected in Europe. The French are careful to protect their manufactures against their dear friends, the British, in every way. The pope has ordered the restoration of the feudal system, through his states. Charles IV has returned to Spain, and that country yet remains unsettled.

Rome, July 25.—The report still prevails that Parma, Modena and Guastalla, will be ceded to Bonaparte, and that in future he will reside on the continent. The public prints express the hope that this may be a mere rumor.

Norfolk, Nov. 4. Four British prisoners, consisting of a midshipman and three men, belonging to the Madagascar frigate, capt. Doyle, were brought over from Hampton yesterday, and delivered into the custody of the marshal at this place. They were taken on board an eastern shore craft, captured by the enemy some days previous, and ordered to Tangier Island, but which grounded in passing Egg-Island Shoals. The skipper (who remained on board) watching a favorable opportunity jumped into the punt along side, and paddled for the shore but soon after returned with several armed men, who retook the vessel and made the crew prisoners.

New Bedford Oct. 28. Last evening arrived sehr Clementine, from Dennis; about 10 o'clock yesterday morning, near Wood's hole, was boarded by a boat from the privateer Retaliation, with five men, who ordered the captain and crew, consisting of — persons, to "pick up their duds and go ashore." While pretending to be complying with their orders, the crew of the Clementine watched a favorable opportunity, and each seized his man, and secured them, and have delivered them to the commandant of the garrison at Fairhaven.

Legislature of Rhode-Island.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

Tuesday, Nov. 1. House met pursuant to adjournment, at 10 o'clock, A. M. and proceeded to elect the hon. James Burrill, jr. speaker and Thomas Burgess, esq. clerk.

At 12 o'clock, his excellency the governor, by his private secretary, Thomas Burgess, Esq. communicated the following message and accompanying documents.

Gentlemen of the Senate, and Gentlemen of the House of Representatives.

We meet again with less sanguine hopes of the restoration of peace and prosperity than we indulged at the last session. All the flattering expectations induced by the meeting of ambassadors at Ghent have been disappointed, and we are to look forward to the longer continuance of an unhappy war. Though the original causes or pretexts of the war are now abandoned by our administration, and they are willing to make peace with Great Britain without requiring any stipulation on her part, on the subjects of blockade or impressment, yet peace cannot, in the opinion of our government, be restored on the terms proposed by the enemy. It is exclusively the province and the duty of the general government to decide on our foreign relations—they only can declare war or make peace, yet I may be permitted to express my regret that the negotiation had not been permitted to proceed to such further length as to have ascertained with more precision the real pretensions and demands of England.

Present appearances forbidding us to anticipate the speedy restoration of those blessings which peace alone can restore, it becomes our duty to look at the actual state of things and to prepare for those exertions, privations and sufferings through which, in the righteous providence of God, we may be called to pass. You will perceive in the correspondence between the executive of this state, and the department of the general government, a continued exertion on our part to induce their attention to our exposed condition, and to prevail on them to extend to us that support and assistance which, by the terms of the national compact, and by every consideration of prudence, as well as justice, they were bound to have afforded; and you will as readily discover, on their part, repeated and continued delay, and finally an implicit refusal or an acknowledgement of their inability to comply with our requests. On the part of this state we have exhibited a constant readiness to conform to the views of the general government, and to co-operate with them, agreeably to the constitution, to the extent of our power, and it is not understood that the general government itself has discovered or complained of any unwillingness or reluctance in us; yet, notwithstanding our constant importunity and our readiness to act in concert with the officers of the United States, our requisitions are uncomplished with, and so far as depended on the general government, our situation has continued as defenceless as at the commencement of the war.

You will perceive by the correspondence, that the government have, in fact, refused to make the necessary advances for expenses which their own officers have ordered and approved of, and that the utmost extent of the promise of the secretary at war is, that if we will advance the money, they will apply it to our defence.

In this unheard of and unforseen condition of things, the general assembly are called on to make further arrangements for the defence of the state.

The larger states of course have more abundant means. In this state, which has paid, and continues, to pay, such immense sums into the national treasury, our means, by way of direct taxes owing to the very limited extent of our territory, must necessarily be much circumscribed. The taxes already in operation, and those proposed at this session, must draw from us a sum of money one half of which if applied to our own necessities, would increase, in a very respectable degree our means of defence. The direct tax on houses and lands alone, will undoubtedly exceed the sum of sixty nine thousand dollars, no part of which have we any assurance, is intended to be applied to the purposes of our particular defence.

But I forbear further to enumerate our grievances, our sufferings and dangers—the catalogue might be swelled to a frightful size, and instead of furnishing us with motives for exertion might sink us into despondency.

I shall always be ready to concur in every measure proposed by the general assembly for the defence of our native land, and our invaluable liberties, and, I trust the people, notwithstanding the extent of their losses, and the discouragement of the times, will be found worthy of their privileges and of their former prosperity. Having done all we can do, we must look for a blessing upon our arms and our cause to Him who alone ruleth among the nations of the earth.

In pursuance of the act passed at the last session, authorising me to borrow on the credit of the state, a sum not exceeding one hundred thousand dollars, a loan has been opened at the several banks and proposals have been sent to different towns. The success of this measure has not fully equalled my hopes; a part only of the loan has been obtained, and a particular statement of its progress will be made out for your information in the course of the session.

In compliance with the resolutions on that subject, at a special session of the legislature in September, a draft has been made from the militia and chartered companies, to make up the states quota of five hundred men, under the requisition of the president of the United States of the 4th of March, and they are ordered into service accordingly—and the senior class will soon be organized agreeably to the laws passed for that purpose.

In addition to the ordnance already stationed at several points, field pieces have been provided for Little Compton, Tiverton, Warren, East Greenwich and North Kingstown, with some supplies of ordnance stores, and I have the satisfaction to acknowledge the receipt, from the United States, by the order of brigadier-general Cushing, of six field carriages for heavy cannon.

I have the pleasure of being able to inform you that at some late inspections and interviews of the militia which I have attended, I had the satisfaction of finding an evident improvement in discipline, and particularly in the quality and good order of their arms. There is also a very commendable zeal and alacrity excited among the officers, and a corresponding emulation among the men. We may be permitted therefore to believe, that in case of an invasion, our militia will support the character for discipline and bravery which they required in the war of the revolution; and that, as they have now become almost our sole military dependence, they will not disappoint us in the hour of trial.

From the neglect and disregard of our wants which we have experienced from that quarter to which we naturally look for assistance, I have been induced, for the supply of some of the indispensable requisites for taking the field, to issue orders to the quartermaster and commissary-generals to make such preparations in their several departments as our scanty resources admit.

It is my duty particularly to mention the situation of the men belonging to the state corps. The neglect on the part of the United States, to make provision for the payment of their wages has reduced many of them to very distressing circumstances.—Some have families, and all will require a supply of clothing, without which it will be impossible they can do their duty through the approaching cold season.

On the 4th instant I was informed by the secretary of war, that general Swift would visit this state, to inspect the fortifications and to advise as to the erection of other works. General Swift has since arrived, and in company with him I have visited the shores at the head of the bay and Rhode Island and Tiverton, near the Stone Bridge. What further steps will be taken by the government in consequence of this measure, I have not been informed of. In some parts of the state the citizens have cheerfully volunteered their services in erecting batteries and field works, to a very considerable extent, and owing to their very meritorious exertions, additional security has been given to some important and exposed positions.

Under our great pecuniary embarrassments, the patriotic labor of the people was particularly acceptable, and deserves the approbation of the legislature.

I communicate for your more particular information, my correspondence with the secretary of war, and also with governor Strong and governor Smith, on the subject of mutual aid of the militia, in case of invasion.

I also lay before you a communication from gov. Strong, with several resolutions of the legislature of Massachusetts, which, from the importance of the subject, and the respectability of that state, claim, and will, I have no doubt, receive your early and serious attention.

I cannot close this communication without advertising to some of the many reasons which the people of this state have for gratitude and thankfulness to the Giver of all good, who in the midst of judgment has remembered mercy. By His goodness we have reaped of the fruits of the earth, our health and our lives have been preserved, and shores protected from invasion, and our laws and civil and religious liberties continued. WILLIAM JONES.

DOCUMENTS ACCOMPANYING THE GOVERNOR'S MESSAGE.
Copy of a letter from his excellency governor Jones to the secretary at war, dated Providence, September 23, 1814.

SIR—I take the liberty of asking your attention to the subject of the correspondence which took place early in July last, between general Armstrong, then secretary at war, and colonel Searle adjutant-general of this state; colonel Searle having been sent by me to the seat of government to confer with the president of the United States upon the very exposed and defenceless situation of this state, received a written communication from the secretary dated July 9, stating the intentions of the government and the disposition already made, or contemplated, in relation to the defence of the state, and that among other things, six 6 pounders, on travelling carriages, would be forthwith sent us. These guns have not been received, and I have reason to believe have been detained at New-York, by order of general Lewis, under some mistake (as I presume) relative to their destination. I have to request, therefore, that the necessary orders may be expedited to have these guns sent on without delay. I am informed that the carriages are now ready for delivery, at Norwich, in Connecticut, in the hands of the commissary, Mr. Tracy.

I would ask your attention to our very exposed condition and unprepared state of defence in many respects, and the absolute necessity of our being furnished immediately with cannon, ammunition, tents and camp equipage. I have repeatedly had the honor of stating these deficiencies, and requesting a supply—and I hope no time will be lost in forwarding them here, or in placing such quantities at the disposition of general Gushing, that, on requisition being made, they may be seasonably supplied.

I have the honor to be, &c.

WILLIAM JONES.

Honorable secretary at war, Washington.

Copy of a letter from the secretary at war to his excellency governor Jones, dated

War Department, October 4, 1814.

SIR—Your letter of the — day of September, enclosing a copy of the proceedings of the town-meeting of Newport,* is received. The just and patriotic sentiments expressed by your excellency, and which seem equally to animate your fellow-citizens, have been seen by the president with pleasure and approbation.

Notwithstanding the pressure on the government from all quarters, and the peculiar pressure of the enemy on this district, this department has not been inattentive to the situation of Rhode-Island, or unmindful of the very great importance of the harbor of Newport. A report has been just made by general Swift, which goes entirely to support the propriety of your opinion as to the necessity of fortifying those positions which command the passage from the island to the main. He himself will be ordered on to your state, and every possible effort will be made by the government to procure the necessary cannon and munitions of war.

From the present state of the treasury much dependence must be placed on the local authorities and the banks of your state to furnish temporarily those funds, which it will be necessary (for the U. States) to expend for their own immediate protection.

I have the honor to be, with great respect, sir, your obedient servant,

JAS. MONROE.

His excellency William Jones.

Providence, October 3, 1814.

SIR—In consequence of the very exposed situation of this state, the sea coast and bay forming an extensive water line, on either side of which we are assailable at various points, and from the increasing danger of invasion, with the fatal consequences attending such an event, in our present situation; I am induced to renew my application for a supply of cannon with other requisites necessary for the efficient operation thereof—with these we should be able, I am confident, to make a successful resistance—and without them, in the event of an attack, the most disastrous consequences are to be apprehended.

I am informed by general Cushing, to whom I have applied for the loan of cannon for our use, that there are none at his disposal—since which from inquiry, I am advised from a source entitled to credit, that there are at Concord, in Massachusetts, forty pieces of 12 and 18 pound cannon, on travelling carriages, in complete order, with fixed ammunition, &c. These being of a description suitable for the protection of our assailable points, and not having it in our power to provide such, I am compelled earnestly to request (if not inconsistent with your other arrangements) that an order to the proper officer may be given, to deliver me, for the use of this state, fifteen or twenty pieces of 12 and 18 pound cannon, with the requisite munitions thereto.

I have the honor to be, &c.

WILLIAM JONES.

Honorable James Monroe, secretary at war Washington.

Copy of a letter from the secretary at war to his excellency governor Jones, dated

War Department, October 14, 1814.

Sir—Your excellency's letter of the 3d inst. has been received. The cannon referred to in your letter of September 23, have been ordered to Newport, and will be subject to such disposition as you may deem advisable.

General Cushing has authority and will make the necessary arrangements for supplying ammunition, tents and camp equipage.

The subject of fortifications on the sea-coast of Rhode Island has been referred to gen. Swift, chief of the engineer corps. He has been directed to repair to that quarter, to confer with your excellency, and report the necessary arrangements for additional defences.

No new works have been recently authorised except where the town or state requiring such works have loaned the money for that object. Should means be placed within the control of this department, an officer of engineers will be designated to superintend the fortifications, and the works immediately commenced. Should it be ascertained that there are disposable cannon at Concord, as you have been informed, arrangements will be made to sending them to Rhode Island with proper munitions.

JAMES MONROE.

His excellency William Jones, Governor of Rhode-Island.

P. S. Orders have been given to have sent to Rhode Island six 12 pounders and six 18's if they can be spared from Massachusetts.

Copy of a letter from major-general Dearborn to his excellency governor Jones, dated Head-quarters, District No. 1, Boston, Oct. 20, 1814.

Sir—The secretary of war having informed me that your excellency had applied for the loan of some 12 and 18 pounders, and stated to him that you had understood that the United States had a considerable number of such pieces at Concord, in this state, it becomes my duty to state to your excellency, that there is no such ordnance belonging to the United States at Concord or at any other place in this state or New-Hampshire, excepting such pieces as are necessarily attached to the different fortresses, or have already been loaned for the use of the militia. It would afford me pleasure to have had it in my power to comply with the direction of the secretary of war, to furnish the ordnance proposed, and it is with regret I find it impracticable to fulfil his intention.

I am, sir,

With due respect,

Your obedient humble servant,

H. DEARBORN.

His excellency governor Jones.

Copy of a letter from his excellency governor Strong to his excellency governor Jones,

Boston, October 17, 1814.

Sir—I am requested by the two houses of the general court of this commonwealth, to transmit to your excellency the enclosed letter, signed by the president of the senate and speaker of the house of representatives of this state, and also a copy of the resolutions to which the said letter refers, with a request that the same may be laid before the legislature of your state.

I have the honor to be, sir, with great respect, your most obedient servant,

CALEB STRONG.

His excellency the governor of the State of Rhode-Island.

Boston, October 17, 1814.

Sir—Your excellency will herewith receive certain resolutions of the legislature of Massachusetts, which you are respectfully requested to take the earliest occasion to lay before the legislature of your state, together with this letter, which is intended as an invitation to them to appoint delegates, if they shall deem it expedient, to meet such others as may be appointed by this and other states, at the time and place expressed in these resolutions.

The general objects of the proposed conference, are, first, to deliberate upon the dangers to which the eastern section of the union is exposed by the course of the war, and which there is too much reason to believe will thicken round them in its progress, and to devise, if practicable, means of security and defence which may be consistent with the preservation of their resources from total ruin, and adapted to their local situation, mutual relations and habits, and not repugnant to their obligations as members of the union. When convened for this object, which admits not of delay, it seems also expedient to submit to their consideration the inquiry, whether the interests of these states demand that persevering endeavors be used by each of them to procure such amendments to be effected in the national constitution as may secure to them equal advantages, and whether, if in their judgment this should be deemed impracticable under the existing provisions for amending that instrument, an experiment may be made without disadvantage to the nation for obtaining a convention from all the states in the union, or such of them as may approve of the measure, with a view to obtain such amendments.

It cannot be necessary to anticipate objections to the measure which may arise from jealousy or fear. This legislature is content, for its justification, to repose upon the purity of its own motives, and upon the known attachment of its constituents to the national union and to the rights and independence of their country.

We have the honor to be, with the highest respect, your excellency's humble servants,

JOHN PHILLIPS, President of the senate of the commonwealth of Massachusetts,

TIMOTHY BIGELOW, Speaker of the house of representatives of said commonwealth,

His excellency the governor of the State of Rhode-Island.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Saturday, November 5.

The following report of the committee on the governor's message was read and received:

The committee to whom were referred the message of his excellency the governor and the documents therewith communicated, ask leave to report upon so much thereof as relates to the important subjects brought into view by the communications received by his excellency from the secretary at war and from the governor, the president of the senate and the speaker of the house of representatives of the state of Massachusetts—

The legislature and the whole people of this state already but too well know how frequently and fruitlessly they have petitioned the federal government for some portion of those means of defence for which we have paid so dearly, and to which by the constitution we are so fully entitled. Our most pressing petitions and representations to the head and various departments of the general government have often gone unanswered, sometimes have been answered by unmeaning professions and promises never performed, but generally by telling us to protect ourselves. The result is, that at this moment we have fewer means of defence—less show of protection afforded by the government than we had ever at any period during a state of peace.

Directly after the war was commenced, the greater part of the United States' troops then in the forts of this state, were ordered to a service more interesting to the general government than our defence. All the troops, also, which have been enlisted by them during the war, within this state, and amounting to many hundreds, have been wanted for other purposes—although many of them were enlisted with an understanding that they were to serve near their families and for defence of their native state. The gun-boat flotilla pretentiously kept in our harbors has in reality been employed to entrap unguarded citizens into a distant and unpropitious service. In a word, the whole United States' military force, stores and property within the state at this moment, instead of affording any means of defence, do but serve to increase our danger by offering a temptation to the enemy.

But while thus withdrawing from us all but the shadow of defence, and totally disregarding their duty and our just rights under the constitution; that government is constantly demanding and taking from us those resources and revenues which, by the constitution, we granted expressly to enable them to afford us that protection. More than fifty thousand dollars the secretary of the treasury states to have been already received into their treasury in taxes upon this state during the last year; besides some thousands retained as the pay of their assessors and collectors. The amount also, which they have drawn from this state in duties cannot be less, and we believe is much more, than half a million of dollars upon an average, annually, during the war. In addition to this, they have had from our banks and citizens some hundreds of thousands of dollars upon loans and treasury notes. A small part of all these funds drawn from us might, if prudently applied, have placed us in a state of security. It cannot be necessary for the committee to go into further detail: A full view of our situation is presented to us in the two last letters of the secretary at war. In one of them, making some general professions upon the subject of our defence, he adds, that "No new work has been recently authorized except when the town or state requiring such works have loaned the money for that object. Should means be placed within the control of this department, an officer of engineers will be designated to superintend the fortifications, and the works immediately commenced." In his other letter, the secretary, after acknowledging our claims to defence, the importance of our harbors, and the necessity of further fortifications, and promising a supply of cannon and munitions of war, concludes in substance, as in his other letter, that "From the present state of the treasury much dependence must be placed on the local authorities of the banks of your state to furnish temporarily those funds which it will be necessary (for the United States) to expend for their own immediate protection." And where are our funds which the secretary thus pointedly takes care to inform us must be expended by the United States? Where are those funds? Have not the United States already got them, nearly to the uttermost farthing? We have paid punctually the heavy taxes imposed upon us by the government, and suffered them to draw into their treasury the large revenues granted by us only as the price of our defence. All these revenues, more than sufficient for our protection, they have received, not as a sacred trust to be constitutionally applied to that object, but as their rightful tribute, to be expended at their will. It has been expended in ruinous attempts to conquer the provinces of the enemy, who by these means has been brought to threaten and assail ourselves, and then we are told, "give us your funds and we will expend them for your own immediate protection—will build fortifications for you and supply you with cannon and munitions of war."

Another semblance of protection is held out to us: The secretary gives orders to the military prefect of the district to receive into service as many of our militia as his excellency the governor shall think proper to call out for the defence of the state.—Where are they to go, and what to do? without cannon, forts or the munitions of war, which the secretary tells us are absolutely necessary, but which he also plainly tells us cannot be furnished unless we supply the funds with which they are still to be purchased. Such has been the answer given to us as often as we have petitioned for defence. When the regular garrison troops were ordered away from the state, requisitions were made upon us to turn out our citizens to supply their places in the United States' forts and under their officers. Such unwarrantable and unconditional demands, being seriously opposed in this and other states, were for a time apparently abandoned; but in reality the government at that moment formed the design of compelling us by necessity, unconstitutionally to surrender our citizens as regular troops, to the command of such officers as they might appoint over them; and in order to bring us to this necessity, for a long period we were left without any other evidence of the existence of a president or government of the United States, than what we derived from the burthens imposed and the calamities brought upon us by them. And so perseveringly was this project against our rights pursued, that the president of the United States himself, in one of his public messages, openly, and with great chagrin, complained of the policy of the enemy in leaving this section of the country unassailed and untravaged. At length the design of bringing our militia under the command of minor United States' officers appeared to be relinquished, and intimations were given to one of our sister states, who had checked that design, that it was relinquished. But soon the same plan is discovered in another form. We are divided into military districts; and a kind of military prefect is placed over each, a military commander over states instead of troops. And to these military prefects, the president without any warrant from the constitution, imparts a portion of this executive authority—creating thus an office unknown before and undefined. This plan seemed to promise better success. Owing to the worthy and respectable characters of the district commanders to whom this state is assigned, our chief magistrate, ever watchful and solicitous for our welfare and security, and with a view to conciliate and purchase the protection of government by any concessions not absolutely dangerous to our rights, has, with the advice of the council, allowed, as an act of his own, the state corps, and the drafted militia to be under the direction of a United States' colonel, stationed in Newport, although there are scarcely United States' troops enough under his command to form a single full company. Nor would there ever be any difficulty in co-operating for our defence, if designs hostile to our rights were not too palpably manifested. In another state, where the militia remonstrated against being put under the command of United States' officers, the chief magistrate was informed by the secretary at war that they could not be paid unless so surrendered. What! cannot the president issue his orders to officers of the militia, constitutionally appointed, as well as to officers of his own appointing over them, contrary to the constitution? The same secretary has given the answer—The president thinks it inconvenient and dangerous. Thus that great privilege which the states, in forming the constitution, would not trust to the new government they were about to create, and which they expressly retained and reserved to themselves, as their security against encroachments from that new and untried government—this same privilege the government we have created now informs us they consider to be dangerous and inconvenient.

We are not alone in these calamities. Our sister states of the south have been almost equally oppressed and abused.—They are beginning to assert their rights; and with us they will never suffer our common rights, under the constitution to be prostrated by a government we have ourselves created. Why should we dwell longer upon the unwarrantable treatment we receive—the unconstitutional attempts upon our constitutional rights.—Our condition is stripped of all doubt and uncertainty. Our chief resources have been and still are to be taken as tribute: but for our defence we are to look to ourselves.

Placed in this situation, the general assembly did, at their last session, unanimously request the governor to communicate with the executives of our neighbouring states upon the subject of our common defence—proffering ours and requesting their co-operation in this object. Those states feeling equally with us in the common misfortunes, and the necessity of united exertions, have reciprocated our proffers of mutual assistance, and have invited us to appoint delegates, to meet those appointed by them, to confer upon our defenceless and calamitous situation, and to devise and recommend wise and prudent measures for our relief.

The committee therefore recommend the adoption of the following resolution:

State of Rhode-Island and Providence Plantations.

In general assembly, October session, A. D. 1814.

WHEREAS this general assembly, having long witnessed, with regret and anxiety, the defenceless situation of this state, did, at their last session, request his excellency the governor to communicate with the executives of our neighboring sister states upon the subject of our common defence by our mutual co-operation; and whereas those states, feeling equally with us the common misfortunes, and the necessity of united exertions, have appointed, and invited us to appoint, delegates to meet and confer upon our calamitous situation, and to devise and recommend wise and prudent measures for our common relief:

Resolved, That this general assembly will appoint four delegates from their state, to meet at Hartford, in the state of Connecticut, on the 15th day of December next, and confer with such delegates as are or shall be appointed by other states upon the common dangers to which these states are exposed, upon the best means of co-operating for our mutual defence against the enemy, and upon the measures which it may be in the power of said states, consistently with their obligations to adopt, to restore and secure to the people thereof, their rights and privileges under the constitution of the United States.

B. HAZARD,—For the committee.

On the question, shall the resolution above recited be adopted and passed, the ayes and nays were called and ordered to be entered upon the journals of the house—ayes 39, nays, 23.

Daniel Lyman, Samuel Ward, Benjamin Hazard, and Edward Manson, Esqrs. were appointed delegates to attend the Hartford convention.

A protest was presented against the resolution to appoint delegates to the Hartford convention, by those who voted against the resolution. It was decided not to enter it on the journals of the house on account of its indecorous language and foul aspersions on the motives of the majority.

[This protest, so complained of, shall appear in the REGISTER, though the house refused its insertion in their journal.]

An act granting pay to the state troops called out by gen. Stanton, passed.

C. G. Champlin, Esq. was elected a member of the council of war, in the place of Benj. Ruggles, Esq. resigned.

A resolution passed authorizing the governor to procure clothing for the soldiers in the state service.

The business of the session being completed, the legislature adjourned to the third Monday of February next, when they will convene at East Greenwich.

Proceedings of Congress.

IN SENATE.

Saturday, November 5. Mr. Giles, from the committee on military affairs, reported the following bill, which was read and passed to a second reading.

A bill to authorise the president of the United States to call upon the several states and territories thereof, for their respective quotas of thousand militia, for the defence of the frontiers of the United States.

Be it enacted, &c. That the president of the United States be, and he is hereby authorised and required to call upon the several states and territories thereof, for their respective quotas of thousand militia, to serve for the term of two years, from the time of meeting at the place of rendezvous, unless sooner discharged, that is to say:

From New-Hampshire, thousand:

From Massachusetts, &c.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That the whole number of militia of each state and territory, shall be divided into classes, in such manner, as that one man from each class, shall, in the whole, amount as nearly as may be, to the number required from such state or territory; and after such classification, each class shall furnish, by draft or by contract, one effective able bodied man, to serve in the militia for the term of two years as aforesaid, unless sooner discharged. Provided nevertheless, That if any state or territory shall, within months after the passage of this act, raise its quota of militia, or any part thereof required by this act, in any other manner, for an equal or longer term of service, the same shall be received into the service of the United States in substitution of the same number of the militia called for by this act, and in that case, the draft shall so far cease to take effect. And the draft shall also cease to take effect in every case in which any class shall furnish a militiaman by contract as aforesaid.

Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That it shall be lawful for the president of the United States to issue his orders to such officers of the militia as he may think proper, to divide the whole militia of each state and territory into classes, and to make drafts therefrom according to the provisions of the 2d section of this act. And for the purpose of equalizing, as much as possible, the contributions of the respective classes, in all cases, where any class shall furnish a militiaman by contract, it shall be the duty of such militia officer or officers, in laying off the respective districts comprehending each class, to apportion the same, as nearly as possible, according to the value of property, and the number of militiamen subject to draft within each district.

Sec. 4. And be it further enacted, That for the purpose of carrying into effect the provisions of this act, with equality and justice to all descriptions of the militia, it shall be the duty of every officer commanding a company of infantry, to enter upon his muster-roll every person subject to militia duty within the beat or district comprehending his company, whether of artillery, cavalry, grenadiers, light infantry, volunteers, or by whatever other denomination distinguished, including all non-commissioned officers and musicians; which muster-roll he shall make out on oath, and return to the officer commanding the battalion or regiment to which he belongs; whereupon all the militia of every description, entered upon such muster-roll, shall, in like manner, be subject to classification for the purpose of draft or contribution required by this act; and in all cases of making the draft, where the person drafted shall heretofore have faithfully performed any tour of duty in the militia since the commencement of the war, either as a volunteer or drafted militiaman, whether upon the requisition of the United States, or of any state or territory, he shall be entitled to a deduction for the whole of his former term of service, as aforesaid, from the term of service required by this act; and it shall be the duty of the officer making such draft, at such time, to make a true and faithful report to the department of war of all persons drafted by him, who shall previously have performed a tour of service as aforesaid, specifying the nature and duration of such service; whereupon it shall be the duty of the secretary for the department of war to cause discharges to be granted to all such persons, according to the principles of the aforesaid provisions.

Sec. 5. And be it further enacted, That the president of the United States be and he is hereby authorised and required to organize the militia of each state and territory, called forth in virtue of this act, into divisions, brigades, regiments, battalions, and companies, as the numbers from each state and territory shall render necessary and proper, conformably to the laws and regulations respecting the military establishment of the United States; and it shall be lawful for the proper authority of each state and territory to appoint and commission all officers which may be required to complete such organization.

Sec. 6. And be it further enacted, That every officer, non-commissioned officer, or private, of the militia, who shall fail to obey the orders of the president of the United States in carrying into effect any of the provisions of this act, shall forfeit and pay a sum not exceeding—years pay, nor less than—months pay, and such officer shall, moreover be liable to be cashiered by sentence of a court martial, and be incapacitated from holding a commission in the militia for a term not exceeding—at the discretion of the said court; and such non-commissioned officer and private shall be liable to be imprisoned, by a like sentence, on failure to pay the fines adjudged against them being respectively for one calendar month for every 5 dollars of such fine.

Sec. 7. And be it further enacted, That the militia while employed in the service of the U. States in virtue of this act, shall not be compelled to serve beyond the limits of the United States, nor beyond the limits of the state or territory furnishing the same, and the limits of the adjoining state or territory; except that the militia from Kentucky and Tennessee may be required to serve in the defence, and for the protection of Louisiana.

Sec. 8. And be it further enacted, That the militia aforesaid, whilst in the service of the United States, shall be subject to the same rules and articles of war, as the troops of the United States; and in like manner, shall be allowed the same pay, clothing, rations and forage; and entitled to the same privileges and immunities, in all respects, as the troops of the U. States.

Sec. 9. And be it further enacted, That after the classification of the militia as aforesaid, any three classes within any state or territory, which shall furnish according to law, two effective able-bodied recruits, to serve in the army of the United States during the war, shall thereafter be exempt from the militia service required by this act; and to aid them in this respect, such recruits shall be entitled, respectively, to receive the bounty in money and land, which is allowed to other recruits respectively for the army of the United States; and in all cases where recruits shall be furnished as aforesaid, the same shall be delivered to some recruiting officer in the service of the United States, who shall immediately give his receipt therefor, on account of the classes furnishing them, and shall forthwith report the same to the department of war, specifying in such report, the names and description of such recruit, respectively, and the description of the classes of the militia furnishing the same; whereupon it shall be the duty of the secretary of the department of war, to grant, without delay, to such classes, a certificate of exemption from the militia service required by this act; which certificate shall, to all intents and purposes, be good and available to them for their absolute exemption therefrom.

Sec. 10. And be it further enacted, That in case the recruits furnished under the provisions of this act, in addition to the recruits now authorised by law, should amount, in the whole, to a greater number than sufficient to fill the present military establishment, it shall be lawful for the president of the United States to receive such recruits into the service of the United States, notwithstanding such excess; and to form them into regiments, battalions, and companies, as the numbers, of such excess may render necessary, conformably to the regulations of the present military establishment; and the president of the United States is hereby authorised and required to nominate, and by and with the advice of the senate, appoint as many officers to command such recruits as may be necessary for the purpose, conforming in all respects to the laws and regulations respecting the organization of the present military establishment, and the appointment and relative rank of officers therein. And the officers hereby authorised to be appointed, shall be placed on the same footing in all respects, with the officers of the same grade in the present military establishment.

[On Saturday last, this bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.]

Thursday, November 10.—The senate were engaged nearly the whole day in the discussion of the bill "making further provision for filling the ranks of the army of the United States."

[The first section of this bill provides that recruiting officers shall be authorized to enlist into the army of the United States any free, able-bodied, male citizen of the United States between the ages of eighteen and fifty years.]

The second section repeals so much of former acts as requires the consent in writing of the parent, master or guardian, to authorize the enlistment of persons under twenty-one years of age, provided masters of apprentices who enlist shall receive a certain portion of the bounty money, &c.

The third section allows to future recruits three hundred and twenty acres of land, in lieu of the land bounty now allowed by law.

The fourth section provides "that any person subject to militia duty, who shall, according to law, furnish a recruit for the army, at his own expense, to serve during the war, shall thereafter be exempt from militia duty during the war." &c. &c.]

The question now depending in the senate is on a motion, by Mr. Dana, to strike out the vital part of the second section as above described.

[The motion to strike out, was lost on a subsequent day.]

It is believed the bill will pass the senate without material amendment.

The following bill was also reported in the senate, on the 8th inst. by Mr. Worthington, chairman of the militia committee. A bill further in addition to the act, entitled "An act more effectually to provide for the national defence by establishing an uniform militia throughout the United States."

Be it enacted, &c. That in addition to the citizens directed to be enrolled by the first section of an act, entitled "An act more effectually to provide for the national defence by establishing an uniform militia throughout the United States," each and every free, able-bodied, white, male citizen of the United States, and the territories thereof, who is or shall be between the ages of sixteen and eighteen years shall severally and respectively be immediately enrolled in the militia, by the captain or commanding officer of the company within whose bounds such citizen shall reside, and when enrolled and notified according to law, shall be beholden to arm and equip himself, and to do and perform all the duties, and be subject to all the penalties in cases of neglect, as now are, or shall hereafter be, provided for by law, for the government of the militia of the United States, except that such citizen shall not be subject to be drafted into the actual service of the United States while he remains under the age of eighteen years.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That each and every free, able-bodied, white, male citizen of the United States and territories thereof, who by the laws of the United States or any other state or territory thereof, have been exempted from common trainings for the purpose of discipline, or from militia duty generally, with every free, able-bodied, white, male citizen, of the age of forty-five years, and under the age of fifty years, except ministers of the gospel, shall be immediately enrolled in the militia by the captain or commanding officer of the company within whose bounds such citizen shall reside, and when so enrolled and notified according to law, such citizen shall be beholden to arm and equip himself, and to do and perform all the duties, and be subject to all the penalties, in case of neglect, as now are, or shall hereafter be, provided for by law, for the government of the militia of the United States, except that such citizen shall not be subject to attend the trainings of militia for discipline.

Tuesday, November 22.—The senate having resumed the consideration of the bill to authorize the president of the United States to call upon the several states and territories thereof, for their respective quotas of eighty thousand, four hundred and thirty militia, for the defence of the frontiers of the United States.

Mr. Gore of Mass. moved that the bill be referred back to the committee who reported it, with the following instruction:

"That the committee be instructed so to modify the bill, that it shall provide for calling into the service of the United States from time to time, in execution of the provisions of the constitution, and according to the mode heretofore practised, thousand militia, to serve for terms not exceeding nine months; with an option to the several states, in lieu of such detachments of militia, to raise and furnish for the service of the United States, for the term of two years unless sooner discharged, bodies of state troops, equal in number to their respective quotas of militia: such state troops to be organized and armed and equipped according to law, their officers to be appointed by the respective states, their services to be limited within the states in which they shall be raised, or within an adjoining state, to be subject to the rules and articles of war, and to receive the same pay, clothing, rations and forage, and to be entitled to the same privileges and immunities as the troops of the United States.

After a long debate, the question on this motion was negatived by the following vote:

YEAS—Messrs. Anderson, Daggett, Dana, Gaillard, German, Goldsborough, Gore, Horsey, Hunter, Lambert, Mason, Thompson, Vanuise—19.

NAYS—Messrs. Bibb, Bledsoe, Brent, Brown, Chase, Condit, Edwards, Giles, Lacombe, Morrow, Roberts, Robinson, Smith, Tait, Taylor, Turner, Walker, Wharton, Worthington—20.

The question on the final passage of the bill was then decided follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bibb of Geo. Bledsoe, Brent, Brown, Chase, Condit, Fremont, Gaillard, Giles, Lacombe, Morrow, Roberts, Smith, Tait, Taylor, Turner, Walker, Wharton, Worthington—20.

NAYS—Messrs. Anderson, Daggett, Dana, German, Goldsborough, Gore, Horsey, Hunter, Lambert, Mason, Thompson, Vanuise—12.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

Thursday, Nov. 10. Mr. Calhoun offered for consideration the following resolutions:

Resolved, That the committee on military affairs be directed to enquire into the expediency of changing the present mode of supplying the army by contracts to some other better calculated for a state of war, and that they have leave to report by bill or otherwise.

Resolved, That the secretary of war be directed to inform the house whether the army of the United States is trained by any one uniform system of discipline; and if not, what are the causes which have prevented it.

Mr. Calhoun said, it was not necessary to state to the house, that next to having an army, to have it well supplied and well trained was an object of the greatest importance. He had been informed, from a source to be relied on, that the present mode of supplying the army, whilst it subjected the public to speculations by the contractors, was frequently on great emergencies found wholly inefficient. One of the most important enterprises in the south would have failed in consequence of the delay and loss of the contractors, had not the difficulty been overcome by the great energy of the commanding general on that occasion. There was, he had also understood, a variety in the discipline of the army, in consequence of five or six different systems employed in the training of the army. So great was the variance, that in large bodies of our army, Brown's campaign perhaps excepted, could be properly exercised together.

The resolutions were agreed to.

The bill to authorize the secretary of state during the present war, to make an additional allowance to masters of vessels for bringing home destitute and distressed American seamen, was read a third time, passed and sent to the Senate.

Mr. Loper, by general consent, made a report from the committee of ways and means, on the amendment proposed by the senate to the three billion loan bill. [This amendment proposes to pledge, to pay the interest and gradually redeem the principal of this particular loan, a portion of the internal duties now existing, or to be hereafter imposed.] The committee of ways and means recommended a disagreement to this amendment of the senate.

The amendment of the senate was disagreed to without a division on the consideration that the committee of ways and means had before them the property of estimating a general sinking fund, to place all the public debt on the same basis, &c.

Friday, Nov. 15. Mr. Loper reported a bill to provide additional revenue for defraying the public credit, by laying duties on sales at auction, on the passage of letters, on incomes to retailers of wine, spirituous liquors and foreign merchandise, on earnings for the conveyance of persons and on plated harness, which was twice read and adopted.

The Speaker held before the house a report from the war department, stating that few or no material papers were lost, during the late incursion of the enemy.

A message was received from the senate insisting on their amendments to the three million loan bill, and having a conference. On motion of Mr. Loper, the house insisted on their disagreement, and accepted the invitation of the senate to a conference.

The order of the day on the bill making further provision "for filling the ranks of the regular army by classifying the free male population of the United States" having been called over—

[The consideration of the bill was postponed until Tuesday next, as the senate had before them a bill for similar purposes.]

Mr. Harris, submitted for consideration the following resolution:

Resolved, That the committee of ways and means be instructed to enquire into the expediency of providing by law that any kind of money which may be and by the government to the troops in the service of the United States, for military services, shall be receivable in payment from the people for their taxes.

This resolution was referred as proposed. Mr. H. brought it forward on account of certain payments made to the militia of Tennessee in Chicago bank notes, which the tax gatherers were not authorized to receive in payment, and on which the people had to lose 10 per cent. of their amount to get off.

Mr. Plattsburgh, from the committee of concurrence on the disagreeing votes of the two houses relative to the bill authorizing the purchase or building of not more than 25 small armed vessels, made a report recommending the house to strike out the words, twenty-five guns and insert sixteen; so as that the vessels to be built or purchased, shall not carry less than 8 nor more than 16 guns.

The proposition was agreed to, and the bill has passed both houses.

Saturday, Nov. 12. Mr. Hall of Geo. submitted for consideration the following resolutions:

1. That the committee of ways and means be directed to enquire into the expediency of authorizing the secretary of the treasury to issue notes, convenient for circulation, to the amount of millions of dollars, and such checks may be thought best calculated to detect counterfeits; in which case, and gold and silver, shall all taxes, duties, imposts, or debts due or which may hereafter become due to the U. States, be paid.

2. That the treasury notes which may be issued as aforesaid shall be a legal tender in all debts due or which may hereafter become due between citizens of the United States, or between citizens of one state, or a citizen and subject of any foreign state or power.

3. That the secretary of war, under direction of the president, shall cause to be purchased in each state and territory, and in each collection district thereof, as nearly as circumstances will permit, supplies for the army and navy of the United States, to the amount of the taxes to be collected from each state, territory or collection district.

4. That any individual, or body politic, or corporate, at the expiration of twelve months from the date of the treasury notes by them held, and annually thereafter, may fund the same, and receive in lieu thereof 6 per cent. stock.

5. That after paying the annual amount of principal and interest of the existing public debt, and the interest which may accrue on the stock to be created by funding the treasury notes to be issued by the secretary of the treasury, the whole amount of taxes, duties, imposts, and sales of public lands, may be pledged for the redemption of the notes which may remain in circulation.

Upon extra of these resolutions, Mr. H. made a number of remarks. He said they embraced, together, a system he verily believed was the only one which would relieve the United States from their present difficulty, and support the public credit in the future. The want of a circulating medium was generally felt; and indeed without it the people in the interior would be unable to pay their taxes, deprived as they were of a market for their surplus produce. A bank paper of one section of the country was in a state of depreciation in another; and unless some medium of general credit was immediately established, incalculable evils would result &c.

The question on consideration of these resolves was taken separately, at the instance of Mr. Oakley.

The house agreed to consider the 1st, 3d, 4th, and 5th, but refused to consider the second, by the following vote, as taken by yeas and nays.

For considering it	42
Against it	95

After some remarks from Mr. Gaston to which Mr. Hall replied, the resolutions were laid on the table.

A bill was received from the senate, entitled "an act making further provisions for filling the ranks of the army of the United States." This bill was twice read and referred to the same committee of the whole house, to whom is committed the classification of this house.

Mr. McKim of Md. offered for consideration the following resolution:

Resolved, That the committee of ways and means be directed to enquire into the expediency of imposing a duty on all goods and merchandise imported into the United States, which under existing laws may be admitted to entry free of duty."

Mr. McKim said the resolution would explain itself, and he would only add, that it presented a mode of bringing a small amount of duty into the treasury without any inconvenience to the public. The resolve was agreed to.

Mr. Epes made the following report from the committee of conference.

"The managers on the part of the senate and on the part of the house of representatives at the conference on the amendments of the senate disagreed to by the house of representatives to the bill entitled 'an act to authorise a loan for a sum not exceeding three millions of dollars,' report, that the senate do recede from their amendments to the said bill, except so much thereof as strikes out the last clause of the 5th section, and do agree as a substitute therefor to the two following sections, &c.

"Sec. 6. And be it further enacted, That in addition to the annual sum of eight millions of dollars heretofore appropriated to the sinking fund, adequate and permanent funds shall, during the present session of congress, be provided and appropriated for the payment of the interest and reimbursement of the principal of said stock created by this act.

"Sec. 7. And be it further enacted, That an adequate and permanent sinking fund gradually to reduce and eventually to extinguish the public debt contracted and to be contracted during the present war, shall also be established during the present session of congress."

The report having been read, it was on motion of Mr. Epes, ordered to lie on the table, until the bill should be returned from the Senate. It was subsequently taken up, and the report agreed to.

The house resolved itself into a committee of the whole on the bill to establish a national bank—which being read through, the committee rose and reported progress, &c. and the house adjourned.

Monday, Nov. 14. Mr. Troup from the committee on military affairs, reported a bill to authorise a donation in land, to persons in the military or naval service of the enemy, who shall come within the limits, and claim the protection of the government of the United States. Twice read and committed.

After some other business, the house went into committee of the whole on the bill to establish a national bank—and the first section being read (which goes to establish the bank, appoint the commissioners to receive subscriptions, and regulate their conduct, &c. Mr. Fisk gave the reasons of the committee why they had confined the books of subscription to a few cities and towns* which was because they were supposed to be the chief depositories of specie and superfluous wealth, &c. Mr. Sharp moved to add Lexington, Ky. Mr. Koonson proposed New Orleans—and they were added and commissioners thereat appointed—as were also Nashville, Washington city, Raleigh, Savannah, New Brunswick, N. J. Utica, N. Y. Portsmouth, N. H. Hallowell, Me.—and "Pittsburg" was struck out and Chillicothe inserted in its place. Mr. Lewis then moved that the principal banks be at Washington city, instead of Phila delphia, as proposed in the bill—negatived, only 39 rising in favor of it. Mr. Gaston after a speech of considerable length, favorable to the establishment of a national bank, but not upon the plan proposed, moved to strike out "fifty" millions for the capital and insert twenty.

Mr. Condit moved to reduce the shares to 100 dollars each, rejected, only 39 rising in favor of the proposition. The 2d section of the bill was then read, a considerable diversity of opinion was manifested, of little importance to the real merits of the business, and after some time indulged in expressing them, the committee rose after a session of five hours, reported progress and the house adjourned.

Tuesday, Nov. 15. Mr. Epes offered the following resolution. Resolved, That the committee on military affairs be instructed to enquire into the expediency of authorising the secretary of war, on the application of the commanding officer of any detachment of the militia, to furnish the necessary clothing to such of the private soldiers of the militia as may require it, and to deduct the same from their pay. The motion was agreed to.

Wednesday, Nov. 16. Mr. Troup from the committee of military affairs, reported that there was no occasion for any provision in respect to furnishing the militia with clothing, as contemplated by the resolve adopted yesterday—such a provision being already in existence.

After some other business, the consideration of the bill to establish a national bank, was taken up in committee of the whole.

Mr. Calhoun, then in a very ingenious and elaborate speech (as observes the National Intelligencer) common justice to which requires it to be published at full length, laid before the house his views on this subject, and the reasons why he should propose a total change in the features of the bill. The motion he now made was one of limited character, but such a one as he proposed to follow up other amendments, or by distinct legislative provisions, which should together embrace a plan of which the following is a brief outline: The capital of the bank remaining unchanged at fifty millions, the payments of subscriptions to this capital stock to be made in the proportion of one-tenth in specie (which he afterwards varied to six-tieths) and the remainder in specie, or in treasury notes to be hereafter issued; subscriptions to be opened monthly in the three last days of each month, beginning with January next, for certain proportions of the stock until the whole is subscribed—payment to be made at the time of subscribing; the shares to consist of one hundred instead of five hundred dollars each; the United States to have no stock in the bank, nor any agency in its disposal, nor control over its operations, nor right to suspend specie payments. The amount of treasury notes to be subscribed, viz. forty-five millions, to be provided by future acts of Congress, and to be disposed of in something like the following way, viz. fifteen millions of the amount to be placed in the hands of the agents, appointed for the purpose, or in the hands of the present commissioners of the sinking fund, to go into the stock market, to convert the treasury notes into stock; another sum, say five millions, to be applied to the redemption of the treasury notes becoming due at the commencement of the ensuing year; the remaining twenty millions he proposed to throw into circulation as widely as possible. They might be issued in such proportions monthly as to be absorbed in the subscriptions to the bank at the end of each month, &c. This operation, he presumed, would raise the value of treasury notes perhaps 20 or 30 per cent. above par, being the value of the privilege of taking the bank stock, and thus afford at the same time a bonus and an indirect loan to the government; making unnecessary any loan by the bank until its extended circulation of paper shall enable it to make a loan which shall be advantageous to the United States. The treasury notes to be issued to be redeemable in stock at 6 per cent. disposable by the bank at its pleasure, and without the sanction of government; to whom neither is the bank to be compelled to loan any money. This, it is believed, is, in a few words, a fair statement of the project of Mr. Calhoun, which he supported by a variety of explanations of its operations, &c. the notes of the bank, when in operation, to be received exclusively in the payment of all taxes, duties, and debts to the United States. The operation of this combined plan, Mr. C. conceived, would be to afford, 1. Relief from the immediate pressure on the treasury; 2. A permanent elevation of the public credit; and, 3. A permanent and safe circulating medium of general credit. The bank should go into operation, he proposed, in April next. He concluded his exposition by a motion, the effect of which is to deprive the United States of any share in the stock of the bank, and to change the proportions of specie and paper in which it shall be payable to one-tenth in specie, and nine-tenths in treasury notes.

The house of representatives have been occupied up to Thursday, Nov. 23, inclusive, in discussing the bill to establish a national bank, except as noticed below. The detail is tedious, and of very little interest to the majority of our readers. It is not yet settled, but it appears probable that Mr. Calhoun's amendments without essential alteration, will prevail. Some notice of the yeas and nays, for reference sake, may be taken hereafter. On Monday, Nov. 21.—The committee to whom was referred the enquiry as to the expediency of repairing the public buildings at Washington, destroyed by the enemy, reported favorably, and offered a bill for that purpose which was twice read and committed. It appears from the report of the committee, that the whole first cost of the buildings injured by the enemy was

*Note—Boston, New York, Philadelphia, Baltimore, Richmond, Charleston and Pittsburg.

$1,215,110 10; and that the same, averaging several estimates, may be repaired for 438,000—the capital for $250,000.

Thursday, Nov. 23. A message was received from the Senate announcing their passage of the bill "to authorise the president of the United States to call on the several states and territories for their respective quotas of 80,430 militia for the defence of the frontiers of the United States; which bill was twice read and committed to the same committee of the whole to whom was referred the bill for filling the ranks of the regular army, by the classification of the free male population of the United States.

The following report was received from the secretary of war:

War Department, Nov. 22, 1814.

The secretary of war, to whom was referred the resolutions of the house of representatives of the 10th inst. requesting information whether the army of the United States was trained by any uniform system of discipline, and, if not, what were the causes that have prevented it, and whether any legislative provision was necessary to effect the same, has the honor to report—

1. That no uniform system of discipline has heretofore been practised in training the armies of the United States, either in line, by battalion or company.

2. That in the opinion of the secretary of war, it would be advisable to institute a board of general and field officers, to digest and report to this department a system of discipline for the army of the United States, which report, when approved by the president of the United States should be carried into immediate effect under the orders of this department.

3. That the sanction of congress, by a resolution of the senate and house of representatives, to this measure, if not absolutely necessary, in consideration of the powers already vested in this department by law, would nevertheless have a very salutary effect.

JAMES MUNROE.

Hon. Speaker of the

House of Representatives.

The report was, on motion of Mr. Calhoun, referred to a select committee.

After which the bill to establish the bank was again taken up, but the secretary of the senate being introduced, announced the decease of the Vice President of the U. S. with the resolve inserted below, in which the house unanimously concurred, and appointed a committee accordingly.

IN SENATE—Wednesday Nov. 23.—About the hour of meeting, a report having reached the senate chamber of the death of the vice president of the United States, the members from Massachusetts, Mr. Varnum and Mr. Gore, proceeded to his lodgings to ascertain the fact; and on their return, having announced the fact to the senate, the following proceeding took place, on motion of Mr. Bledsoe.

The senate, being informed of the death of their distinguished fellow-citizen ELMURGE GERRY, Vice President of the United States.

Do resolve, That a committee be appointed, jointly with such committee as may be appointed, on the part of the house of representatives, to consider and report measures most proper to manifest the public respect for the memory of the deceased, and expressive of the deep regret of the congress of the U. States for the loss of a citizen so highly respected and revered.

Ordered, That Mr. Gore, Mr. Varnum, Mr. Smith, Mr. Anderson and Mr. Gaillard be a committee.

On motion of Mr. Bledsoe, ordered, that the secretary inform the house of representatives of the decease of the Vice President of the U. States, and communicate the foregoing resolution.

"Should the congress possess spirit and independence enough to place their popularity in jeopardy by so strong a measure, [as to declare war,] the legislature of Massachusetts will give the tone to the neighboring states; will declare itself permanent, until a new election; invite a congress of delegates from the federal states, and create a separate government for their common defence and common interests."

JOHN HENRY.

If any man had really doubted what JOHN HENRY stated, as to the design of Great Britain to effect a separation of these states, or of the willingness of her jacobins at Boston and some other places to engage in the plan—the late proceedings in the legislature of Massachusetts, with the spirit of the press and general tone of observation and remark in that quarter, must convince him that the emissary told the truth, as far as he went, and inspire a confidence that he might have disclosed particulars of more immediate importance. It would be well for the readers of the REGISTER to turn to Vol. II. page 19, and give an attentive perusal to his disclosures, and compare his movements with things that transpire.

The madness of these jacobins shews the superior power of ambition to avarice, even in a class of persons, who, as the Dutch merchant said, "would scorch their sails by trading with h—l, to make a penny." For, however depraved I may believe them to be, I have a better opinion of their intellect than to suppose they possess an idea, that Massachusetts, or, the "nation of New England" if they please would be benefitted by the revolution they aim at. They know it would produce POVERTY, MISERY AND SLAVERY to the people. But what are these, provided the elect, the "legitimate," have office, and power and emolument, and "ARE CALLED OF MEN RABBI?" So anxious are they to rule, that they seem rather willing to be dog-whippers [pardon the (low) words, reader, they suit my idea of them] to king George, than private citizens of the freest, most enlightened and happiest country in the world.

*On several occasions of public rejoicing, they have fired five guns, as a national, or New England, salute. A thousand other incidents, with the general scope of their writers, point to the same thing.

†That a revolution is designed is beyond all doubt. A few, some half-a-dozen of the leaders may have other objects, but the bulk of the jacobins look to it as the result of their proceedings. The Boston Centinel, of the 9th inst. noticing the appointment of delegates by Connecticut and Rhode Island, says they are the second and third "pillars of a new federal edifice." However, this "edifice" is likely to be nothing more than a three-legged stool. New-Hampshire has neglected, and Vermont refused to come under it.

The people at large have little idea of the perfect degeneracy of the British jacobins at Boston. The following incident is so completely characteristic of it that I cannot refuse to insert it:—A respectable merchant of Baltimore proceeded to Boston, twelve or eighteen months ago, on important business, which he was anxiously engaged to settle with the least possible delay. He was often assailed on political subjects, which he avoided discussing, observing that he came to do business; when his mind was relieved of that, if he had leisure, he would talk with them on politics as long as they pleased. Well, said they, but what are you? "A merchant," affecting not to understand their allusion: "yes—yes—but what are your politics?" "That of an AMERICAN," said the merchant. "It is then as we suspected; you are a d—d democrat," said the "moral and religious" jacobins of Boston. The Baltimorean, on this, observed, he had not the least objection to be considered a "democrat," but that the qualifying term should not be applied to him. He was "understood," and the word was as meanly apologised for as it had been impudently used.

As I observed on a former occasion, there is nothing in my nature that has affinity, moral or social, with these jacobins that lead the people to ruin. I consider them as sold to ambition and the enemy; irreclaimable, and not worth the trouble, if they could be reclaimed. But the body that follows the knot of knaves, through the pride of political opinion, and mistaken idea of sticking to their party, is honest; and no reasonable effort should be left untried to undeceive them and bring them to a pause. This body is the federalists of the eastern states; real disciples of Washington, and sincere friends to their country; who, by all the various means of faction, have went on step by step until they have nearly arrived at the precipice where destruction waits.

Let it be perfectly understood, that I no more admit the jacobins alluded to to be federalists, than to aver that Mary Ann Clark is a virgin. I consider the faction and the lady as "common sewers" of pollution; and a federalist—I mean a man attached to the constitution of the United States—cannot be more justly offended with my remarks upon them (the said jacobins) than a modest woman ought to be, if I called that infamous creature a strumpet. There is, intrinsically, as much difference between the one as the other.

I also wish it understood, that, while I would guard against it, I do not apprehend any serious result from the proposed meeting at Hartford, other than the aid and encouragement it may give to the enemy. New Hampshire stands aloof; Vermont has absolutely refused; Connecticut has restricted her delegates, and the great state of New York has taken a stand that says, "thus far shall thou go and no further." It may be well here to remark, that some time ago, (from two to three years) a person that seems destined for the Robespierre of New-England, if the plans of his brethren be perfected—the creature who declared in his place in the senate of Massachusetts, that he was ready to receive the government of England "monarchy and all," was sent on a mission to New-York to induce that state to join what was then to be denominated the "northern confederacy." But it would not do!—and, that recently, in October last, a convention was invited at Albany to feel the pulse of the party, which was slenderly attended, and closed in smoke. The late unanimous resolve of the legislature of New-York, to stand by the government and repel the base propositions of the enemy at Ghent (see page 123) connected with other proceedings of the session, speaks a language that cannot be misunderstood or misinterpreted. It is the language and the conduct of the best times of the revolution; and has exalted New York to the first rank in patriotism, as she is superior in population, wealth and resources. But to return to the subject. There is nothing in the proposed convention to excite my fears further than that measure may add to the duration of the war.† They have been acting upon the principle ever since they had no prospect of getting into legitimate power. They want offices, and as the people will not grant them, they might, "as above excepted," "build castles in the air" and inhabit them in idea, surrounded by all the paraphernalia of royalty itself—but here they must stop. The stamina, the bone and nerve of Boston itself, is with the constitution. The bayonet pays less respect to the tongue of a lawyer on the purse of a merchant, than to the sinewy arm of the yeoman. The speculations of the counting house or chicanery of the bar are nothing in the field of battle.

It is not my design to point out the horrors of the CIVIL WAR that must follow the projects of the jacobins, if the people do not "frown indignantly" upon them. Let the honest man, who, directly or indirectly, countenances their proceedings, come to a pause—and retire within himself, a few minutes, to reflect upon the state of things as they will inevitably be. Let him suppose one half the fighting men of New-England—his neighbors and friends, nay, his own sons, arrayed with deadly weapons in their hands against each other, mutually slaying one another, and desolating the country by fire and sword. My pen cannot do justice to the terrible subject—the most fertile imagination cannot picture to itself the horrors that must be realized. For, be it remarked, that though a majority of the men of wealth and influence are apparently with the jacobins, the body of the people, the hardy farmers and mechanics, among whom are thousands who do appear on the "lists of voters" cunningly made up, will not easily become the slaves of England. The alliance the jacobins seek will destroy them; and dreadful will be the vengeance of the people on the miserable wretches that shall introduce insolent foreigners to settle domestic questions of right! Look at it, men of New-England—"your cornfields will be fattened with the blood of your sons," murdered by the hands of other sons! The darkness of night will be chased away by the flames of your villages; and the shrieks of the virgin, mingling with deep groans of the matron, fill up the hours devoted to repose! Even the dead shall be denied sepulchre, and the stench of the carcases of men pollute your highways. The priest shall be slain at the altar—the bride murdered in the nuptial bed—the infant destroyed in its cradle! What is sacred—what is holy—what is respected in a civil war? Nothing—all the charities of the heart and ordinances of God will be prostrate. What will you do? Where will you fly? Who will you trust? Alas! you know not. Ruin, desolation and death encompass you on every side. All history tells you this—call to mind the wars of the houses of York and Lancaster in England, and the late revolution in France, and finish the scene of terror! Color it as high as you will, you cannot reach the perfection of misery that must be accomplished.

* "The name of AMERICAN, which belongs to you, in your national capacity must always excite the just pride of patriotism," says WASHINGTON.

† It might, however, be expected that those who were really the authors of this war, should desire its continuance. I will undertake to prove to the satisfaction of any man who will listen to truth, that the very jacobins I speak of, the merchants and lawyers of Boston, were the origin of the war with Great Britain; that they basely goaded on the government until no alternative but war or unutterable disgrace was left it—and then as basely deserted all their pledges and promises. This is not mere verbiage—I can demonstrate it, and will, on some future occasion. What is past cannot be recalled; but these folks may rest assured they will not "play the same game" a second time. The people know, and will remember them.

Why should these things be? Because some ten or twenty wicked men want power—because the minority ought to rule! Gracious God!—rather annihilate the wretches than permit the thing they aim at! *

But let us suppose (if the supposition be not political blasphemy) that the jacobins of New-England assisted by a British force, have subdued their brethren, and effected a separation from the rest of the states. Let us suppose that Great Britain will permit the establishment of a sort of an independent government, and that those who so much desire to reign, are fixed in their seats—What will be your condition? A pursuit of this query may serve to unfold some important facts you little think of. As to the probable government you might have, I shall say nothing at this time—I propose only to touch upon your prospects of business, and your ability to support the new order of things.

You will have trade and commerce!

What will you trade with?—Flour, corn, tobacco, cotton, manufactures? You do not raise bread-stuffs enough for your own consumption—nor any tobacco or cotton. You have no staple but fish and oil, and these are, in a great degree, at the mercy of England, who is your rival in them. The value of all your native exports, in which I include the produce of your fisheries, have amounted to only from 5 to 7 millions a year, for all the New-England states—I mean to foreign ports; whereas the other states have exported fifty millions. Your export, the business of your merchants, was bottomed upon the agriculture of the middle and southern states, and built up by the industry of your people. How are you to laden your vessels without our goods? The products of your own soil and industry will not freight a twentieth part of your tonnage. Will you compete with England for the carrying trade? The idea is preposterous; for, supposing she might suffer it, what will you give in exchange for the commodities that found the bases of it? You have little of your own; and in the states from whence you lately draw the supplies, will be foreigners; on at least as bad terms as the British. They who loaded your ships will encourage their own, by the same duties that protected yours; and like causes will produce like effects. Will you send to the West-Indies and get sugar and coffee, &c. to carry to Europe? All you raise and have to exchange for those articles will hardly supply your own consumption, even if the British would receive your fish and beef, which they will not. The only remaining staple is lumber, and of that your great resource is cut off by the "restoration" of a large tract of your best timbered country "to the arms of its legitimate sovereign," as the meekness with which your rulers admit the invasion seems to allow. These things are true. But you will trade to the East Indies, and bring home rich cargoes of teas, silks, &c? What will you give in exchange for the specie to purchase them, and where will you sell them? You will not, in the case of a separation, send the value of millions a year to the single port of Baltimore as you have done—the duties you will have to pay there will put you on a worse footing than that a British ship immediately from the countries where the things are to be had; which ships, though those duties, have long been driven from our ports, in your favor. However, you are industrious and very ingenious and economical, and will turn your attention to manufactures. Very well. You may raise wool enough, but for cotton and all the rest of the great original articles you must depend upon us, or some other foreign nation, and you will have to pay a duty on the raw material: but what is to become of the goods when manufactured? Will they bear the duties we impose on British goods—will they, so encumbered, meet our own in the market—will they withstand the British in the great commerce of the world?

A man who knew nothing of the matter might think, from the continual shouting about commerce to the eastward, that the stout-lunged folks at Boston owned all the ships, and done all the business, of the United States. Never was a more false idea presented. The foreign export of all the "nation of New England," that is, the states of New-Hampshire, Massachusetts, Rhode-Island, Connecticut and Vermont, for five years ending with 1800, was only valued at 61,432,000 dolls. During these years the simple city of Baltimore (to be sure the only exporting place in Maryland) exported the value of 60,321,000 dollars, leaving a balance of about one million in favor of all the "great commercial states" against the city of Baltimore—the "mob-town" and "hater of commerce."§ In 1813, this city's exports were valued at 3,787,865; those of all the "nation" above named, at 3,049,024, leaving a balance in favor of Baltimore against the five "commercial states" of nearly three-fourths of a million! These are official facts; and shew where the basis of commerce lies; without saying any thing of New-York, or Philadelphia, or Charleston, though the general average of these three cities of the value of articles sent to foreign countries, give, to each, nearly as much as all the New-England states exported for many years past. From 1799 to 1810 inclusive, the city of New-York exported to the value of 24 millions more than the state of Massachusetts, and eight millions more than all the "nation." Enough of this blasted subject. The clamor about commerce is receiving its proper estimation. It is found that the lawyers of New-England are the people most interested in it—if we can believe the lawyers. For further information, I refer the reader to a collection of facts inserted in the last volume of the Register page 185, &c. and especially to an admirable work lately published in Philadelphia, entitled the "OLIVE BRANCH."

The truth, was, and it must so be evident to all thinking men, that the foreign commerce of the New-England states depended on the freights and coasting trade afforded to them by the other states—for the simple reason (and I think it a tolerably good one) that they had, comparatively, nothing of their own to load their vessels with. We found the people of that section of our country in every bay and harbor, and almost every river and creek, on the § Baltimore is a new place compared with Boston—when the latter was populous, and, as it were, the "cradle of the revolution," the former was an insignificant town, of 2 or 10 thousand inhabitants. Baltimore is now more populous than Boston, and on a renewal of trade will export and import more goods than Massachusetts. Why?—because we have an immense inland navigation before us, and an immensely rich country behind us. Boston has neither.

coast, from the Hudson to the Mississippi, seeking a freight or disposing of their kick knacks—the proceeds of the LABOR this immense business afforded, were laid out in the productions of the middle and south; which, transported immediately to the West Indies and Europe, or, intermediately sent there through the New-England ports, was the real principle of their foreign commerce. It enabled them to trade to all parts of the world, and especially supported their dealing with beloved Old England: without it, they could not have supported that commerce, alone, for three years—the whole disposable articles of the eastern states would not have paid for the British goods imported. This is not said at random.

It is then a corollary that the commerce of the New-England states depended on the labor, enterprise and economy of their people, (applied as aforesaid) and not on their national productions. Nor is it less clearly demonstrated, that when the field for that labor, &c. shall become foreign soil, that their commerce must fail. If it was through this labor that Boston became rich, it follows that for the want of its exercise Boston will be made poor. Great Britain has monopolized what may be strictly called the carrying trade of all the world—her design to restrain us, even in the transport of our own commodities, was one of the original causes of the war—will she deny to her own subjects the advantages of it in favor of the “nation of New-England”? Pshaw!—But, and if she did, where—I ask emphatically where, would the merchants of New-England obtain its commodities? They raise nothing of themselves to support it—they have no colonies; and would be foreigners, paying duties as such, in all parts of the world, where they used to obtain and dispose of the articles that sustained it; and the tonnage of Massachusetts, so much vaunted of, with the seamen that navigated it, would be transferred to the middle and south, or rot or starve at home.

The jacobins know all this—but what are such considerations to men

“Resolved to ruin or to rule the state?”

Many “reports” that disgrace the journals of the state of Massachusetts (introduced by the jacobins and carried through by party) have been laid before our readers.—There is a sort of cunning runs in them all that is very remarkable. The lawyers have specially acquired the faculty of uttering gross filth in the words of truth. I could point out fifty cases like the following:

“When the people of this commonwealth are reminded that since the adoption of the constitution, thirty millions of dollars have been collected in this state and paid into the treasury of the United States,” &c. see page 152.

Such is the language of a report signed “D. A. White,” meant to convey the idea to the people of Massachusetts, that they had really contributed so much money to the general government. What a pity that Mr. White was not better informed of the thing he spoke of! If he had applied to me, I would have told him that duties to the amount of more than forty millions, instead of “thirty,” had been collected in Massachusetts “since the adoption,” &c. Now this would have sounded much louder; it would have been exactly as a 24 pounder to an 18!—How much would have been added to the noise, for the paltry sum of 20 cents postage on a letter to “H. Niles,” by a committee of the legislature of Massachusetts, on business belonging to Massachusetts, as that committee supposed!—But I would also have told the gentleman, that Massachusetts had not contributed one half, if more than a third or a fourth of that sum to the revenue, though it was “collected” there. That another state “collected” one fourth more than Massachusetts; another nearly as much—and that several of them really paid a greater revenue than that state, by millions.

When it shall be a fact that the merchant, and not the consumer pays the duty on an article, then may the insinuation of this Mr. White become a truth. But as I hardly expect the proposition will ever be realized until white is black, I put it down as a gross misconception of fact or wicked perversion of justice, and shew it to be so.

Massachusetts, though a great importer of foreign articles, has been less a consumer of them than Virginia—ergo, Virginia paid more to the revenue than Massachusetts, though there has been “collected” in that state only about 14 millions, “since the adoption,” &c. When we look for a moment at the different habits of the citizens, this appears evident. The one is a plain and economical people, making within themselves the chief articles of their clothing, and they of the most substantial kind, as one of their poets says, they “Leather aprons use to keep their bellies warm;”

Whereas, the other had little manufactured at home; and, blessed with a rich soil, indulged themselves in all sorts of foreign luxuries. I venture to say, that many farmers in Virginia paid more to the government for duties on bridles and saddles and other appurtenances for their horses, than thousands of farmers in New-England, perhaps equally substantial, contributed for the clothing of their individual families. Heaven forbid that this proposition should be construed into the dispraise of New-England habits compared with those of Virginia! I am devoutly a friend to domestic manufactures, and especially to those of the household kind, that flourish so happily to the eastward; but which have also began in Virginia—and the general simplicity of the former comports much better with my ideas of republicanism and a “home feeling” than the extravagant conduct of the latter: but these opinions have nothing to do with the fact, which I think every one will admit, as I have stated it.”

While the goods imported by the merchants of Massachusetts, were to be found scattered in every part of the United States, very little of those received in other states found their way to Massachusetts; for the reason that her people had monopolized the carrying and coasting trade of the country, as observed above. And from much personal observation and some enquiry among the commission-merchants of Baltimore, I venture to say, that at least three millions of the said forty millions “collected” in Massachusetts, was really paid through Baltimore. One house in this city received foreign goods from Boston, Salem, and a few other eastern ports, to the value of a million per annum, which might be about a fourth of the whole, and as a great portion of this value was made up of wines, teas and India goods, on which the duties are exceedingly high, the amount supposed to have been paid through Baltimore appears very moderate. I am not accustomed to assert a statistical fact without good grounds for it; and the preceding will afford a criterion by which to estimate the general statement.

* When some of the militia arrived at Boston last summer from the interior of the state, it was remarked in the papers of that town, that, “with characteristic economy,” they “marched barefoot,” carrying their boots and shoes in their hands, or attached to their knapsacks. It is by such “economies” and the invincible fortitude, and patient industry of the people, than the thin soil of New-England sustains its thick population—and the same labor and economy that enables a poor man to live there, makes him rich in the middle, western and southern states, as we have tens of thousands of instances, especially in the western district of New-York and state of Ohio. But their very rigid habits give way to the luxuriandy of the soil which tempts to enjoyment, and they live like others on the fatness of the land, in happy moderation.

But in the years from 1791 to 1810, inclusive, there was "collected" in the state of New York duties to the amount of

$ 57,215,000

And in all the "great commercial states" of New-Hampshire, Massachusetts, Rhode-Island Connecticut and Vermont, only

40,319,000

Leaving a balance in favor of the state of New York against the whole commercial "nation of New England," of 7,896,000

Or one seventh more than all that all of them paid!

In the same years, the "commerce-hating" state of Pennsylvania, in the whole of which there is less jabber about commerce in a year than is heard in a lawyer's office at Boston in one week, collected duties amounting to

$ 37,305,000

Or about a 38th part less than all that the "great commercial state" of Massachusetts paid—which was $38,407,000!

In the same time also the "iron towns" Baltimore "collected" $17,831,000, which rises nearly to one half of all that was collected in the "great commercial state" of Massachusetts, and approaches nearly to double the sum (10,591,000) collected in all the other "commercial states" of New-Hampshire, Rhode-Island, Connecticut and Vermont!

Much more might be said, but the above may suffice. Where is that boasted pre-eminence that the jacobins have arrogated to themselves? It is dissolved into "thin air" by the rays of truth; and the wretched hullobaloo they have made about their superior commercial interests is found to be—tax et preterea nihil.

When a man soberly looks at these things—can he fail to be astonished at the impudence and falsehood of the jacobin crew?

The length to which this article has extended, prevents a notice of other points not less interesting, at present. In another number, we may make contrasts of population and resources, and shew the probable effects that must follow the thing the traitors would accomplish; not that we fear the hardy sons of the north will do the deed the jacobins desire, but to prove to them the vileness of the faction that manages their press and pulpit, yes, the rulers, to deceive and mislead them, and to demonstrate the necessity of union with the rest of the states, advantageous to all, and not to be violated but by sacrifices the most dreadful, and privations terrible to think of—that they may "frown" the wretches to the insignificance that their numbers and base intentions deserve.

☞ Since this essay was planned in the mind of the editor, and, indeed, in part written, the work above alluded to, entitled the "OLIVE BRANCH" was received. I have used it liberally towards the close, and acknowledge myself indebted to the author for a better collection of political facts, relating to our affairs with Europe, and especially to our party disputes, than ever was published, and the arrangement of them is equally lucid. It is a handsome duodecimo volume of 252 pages, and ought to be placed in the hands of every man east of the Hudson that desires to know the truth.

Events of the War.

MISCELLANEOUS.

FOREIGN NEWS. From London papers up to Sept. 15. There are several notices of the reported sailing of small detachments of troops and vessels for America—but what has left England for the three months preceding that time, (in our opinion) is not equal to the waste of her men in this country and on our coasts. Hill had not sailed—it was now said he would depart early in October. It is not probable we shall be honored with his lordship's company the present year; and in the spring we apprehend he will have something else to do, much nearer home. The negotiation at Ghent, they say, was not broken off—only "suspended."—But another account states, that our commissioners were to leave Europe for the United States, in the Neptune, early in October. It is stated that Sir James Yeo, (who retires on account of his ill health) is to be succeeded in the command of the lakes, by a captain Hall. The cartel Chamcey, says a London paper of the 11th September, is expected to sail in a few days from Ostend, with despatches from our ministers at Ghent.

Seventy-two French officers (says a London paper) are said to have gone to America to offer their services to Mr. Madison.

LATER.—London dates of September 22—by these it appears that several vessels had sailed from Plymouth for America. They call it the "great expedition," but, only four regiments are mentioned as having embarked, with a brigade of artillery and rocket brigade*—we see nothing in the news to give us great alarm. It is rumored that Hill is to command in Scotland. The Valiant, in which he was to have come out, is ordered to Brazil to bring home the Prince Regent. At this date, the negotiation at Ghent was not known in London to have been broken off. Indeed the contrary is implied—saying that our commissioners were waiting for further instructions: more probably, (we think), for the result of the congress at Vienna.

☞ We have frequently cautioned our readers, as to a reliance upon the items we give of foreign news. We insert them as the truth appears on a deliberate investigation of the articles suffered to reach us. The greater part of such intelligence is received by way of London, and even what the hostile press in that city is permitted to publish favorable to the United States, is often suppressed by a more corrupted press on this side of the water, to whose correction the foreign details, at this time, are chiefly committed. I have no hesitation to say, that I would rather accept as truth the London Courier than many American papers I could name. The latter have so far carried their villainy as to leave out paragraphs of official accounts they pretended to publish entire, and no faith is due them.

Extract of a letter from an American gentleman residing at Nantz, received at N. York, dated 25th August, 1814.

"The political state of Europe, and particularly of this country, is so far from being settled, that we look forward with great anxiety to the congress of Vienna. Our good king has a hard time of it, as the emperor has left many friends; almost all the military and those who held places under him, are devoted to him, so that it requires much time and labor to settle things on a solid basis. The English are more detested than ever, and I believe the most popular step the king could take, would be to go to war with them.

* A brigade of artillery, we believe, is about 500 men—and of Rocketeers between 20 and 30 only.

"France is too much humbled to remain long at peace; as yet we have experienced none of its benefits. The taxes are still kept up, and no commerce to support them. England must be humbled before the world can have a solid peace.

"For it is folly to talk of a balance of power, while she holds all the strong keys of commerce, and most of the colonies; and I am fully persuaded that the principles for which America is contending, will be supported by all the continental powers in the congress at Vienna. Russia and France, I am sure, are with us."

OUT PRIVATEERS. A great many additional privateers are fitting out. They sail from and return to the most of our ports as they please, the rigid blockade notwithstanding. The Chesapeake is, unfortunately, in the power of the enemy, but the spirit of enterprize and skill of the people residing on its waters, is not thereby restrained—"Baltimore schooners" are built at many other places!—that is, the skill of our naval architects and the capital of our merchants is as fully employed against the enemy as ever they were, at ports and places not to be blocked up at all times, and our models are in request from Maine to Georgia.

Among those lately fitted out are some stout vessels—one with 22 long heavy guns has sailed, and two others carrying from 30 to 36 guns will soon be off to ——. In a single newspaper we notice the sailing of five privateers, and the building of three in the neighborhood of Boston—one called the Reindeer, pierced for 22 guns, a noble vessel, coppered, built of the best materials, in 35 working days. On her cradle the Avon, of the same rate, has been laid, to be finished in 18 working days—and they are also building the BLAKELEY, of like size and dimensions, to be built with the same dispatch! In New York they are exceedingly busy with vessels of this kind. And the exertions of individuals aided by the project lately adopted in congress, to fit out 20 vessels (an idea, I believe, I had the honor first to give publicity to) which is to be carried into immediate execution, will make the enemy feel the war much more sensibly than he has done, giving a "demonstration" of his inability to defend his own coasts, much less to blockade all the ports of the world. But some measure must be provided to bring in a part of the prisoners they take. The enemy does not acknowledge paroles made at sea, and has many of our gallant seamen in captivity—the brave fellows must be released to repay favors received. The balance of prisoners of this class, would have been greatly in our favor, if one half of those taken had been brought in. There is a real difficulty in doing it—but it must be done, one way or another.

The English papers teem with articles about our privateers. Their fears and sufferings have magnified their numbers prodigiously! The master of a vessel, that was captured three times and as often re-captured, reported in London, that he had seen no less than ten of these terrible things crossing his voyage! The Wasp has excited a wonderful noise—and the U. S. brig Syrén is playing a noble tune—she has burnt many vessels.

These schooners are joking themselves into their very ports; and John Bull while he grumbles most lustily, is sorely mortified, and not a little surprised at their impudence!—Meetings of merchants have been held at several places to remonstrate against their depredations!—We notice the proceedings at Liverpool and Glasgow as samples. At Halifax, insurance has been absolutely refused, on others 33 per cent. has been added to the former premiums!—We have not heard of the capture of but one privateer for a long time; That was the Harlequin, a new vessel, elegantly fitted from an eastern port, taken by the Bulwark, by stratagem.

AMERICAN PRIVATEERS.

The depredations of the American privateers on the coast of Ireland and elsewhere, have produced so strong a sensation at Lloyd's, that it is difficult to get policies underwritten at any rate of premium!!!

Thirteen guineas for 100£ has been paid to insure vessels across the Irish channel! such a thing never happened, we believe, before.

London, Sept. 9.—At a meeting of merchants, ship-owners, &c. at Liverpool, to consider of a representation to government on the subject of the numerous captures made by American cruizers, Mr. Gladstone proposed an address to the lords of the admiralty; but after many severe observations that representations had been made to that department without redress—Mr. Clear proposed an address to the prince regent, which, after warm opposition on the part of Mr. Gladstone, was carried. The address conveys a censure upon the admiralty. Subsequently a counter address to the admiralty was voted at another meeting, to which Mr. Crocker replied on the 3d inst. that an ample force had been under the orders of the admirals commanding the western stations; and that during the time when the enemy's depredations are stated to have taken place, not fewer than three frigates and 14 sloops were actually at sea for the immediate protection of St. George's channel, and the western and northern parts of the united kingdom.

In the memorial of the merchants, &c. of Liverpool to the admiralty complaining of a want of sufficient naval protection against American captures, they speak of privateers destroying vessels as a novel and extraordinary practice, which they say they are informed is promoted by pecuniary rewards from the American government, and they wish measures adopted to prevent as much as possible, the ruinous effects of this "new system of warfare."

At a very numerous meeting of the merchants, manufacturers, ship owners, and underwriters of the city of Glasgow, called by a public advertisement, and held by special requisition to the lord provost on Wednesday the 7th of September, 1814, the lord provost in the chair, it was Unanimously resolved, That the number of American privateers with which our channels have been infested, the audacity with which they have approached our coasts, and the success with which their enterprize has been attended, have proved injurious to our commerce, humbling to our pride and discreditable to the directors of the naval power of the British nation, whose flag till of late waved over every sea and triumphed over every rival.

That there is reason to believe, in the short space of less than twenty-four months, above eight hundred vessels have been captured by the power, whose maritime strength we have hitherto impolitically held in contempt.

That at a time when we were at peace with all the rest of the world, when the maintenance of our marine costs so large a sum to the country, when the mercantile and shipping interests pay a tax for protection under the form of convoy duty, and when, in the plenitude of our power, we have declared the whole American coast under blockade, it is equally distressing and mortifying, that our ships cannot with safety traverse our own channels, that insurance cannot be effected but at an excessive premium, and that a horde of American cruizers should be allowed, unheeded, unresisted, unmolested, to take, burn or sink our own vessels in our own inlets, and almost in sight of our own harbors.

That the ports of the Clyde have sustained severe loss from the depredations already committed, and there is reason to apprehend still more serious suffering not only from the extent of the coasting trade and the number of vessels yet to arrive from abroad, but as the time is fast approaching when the outward bound ships must proceed to Cork for convoys, and when during the winter season the opportunities of the enemy will be increased, both to capture with ease and escape with impunity.

That the system of burning and destroying every article, which there is fear of losing, a system pursued by all the cruisers and encouraged by their own government, diminishes the chances of recapture, and renders the necessity of prevention more urgent.

That from the coldness and neglect with which previous remonstrances from other quarters have been received by the admiralty, this meeting reluctantly feel it an imperative duty at once to address the throne, and therefore that a petition be forwarded to his royal highness the prince regent, acting in the name and on behalf of his majesty, representing the above grievances, and humbly praying that his royal highness will be graciously pleased to direct such measures to be adopted, as shall promptly and effectually protect the trade on the coasts of this kingdom, from the numerous insulting and destructive depredations of the enemy; and that the lord provost be requested to transmit the third petition accordingly.

That the thanks of this meeting be given to Mr. Ewing for the ability with which he prepared and introduced the business of this day.

That the thanks of this meeting be given to the gentlemen who signed the requisition.

K. FINLAY, Provost.

The lord provost having left the chair,

Resolved, unanimously, That the thanks of this meeting be given his lordship for his prompt compliance with the requisition, and for the manner in which he conducted himself in the chair.

MILITARY.

Maj. gen. Pinkney proceeded to the southward from Savannah, on the 13th inst. and on the same day maj. gen. McIntosh, of the Georgia militia, set out for Fort Hawkins.

The legislature of Virginia have before them a bill to raise 10,000 men, to serve for two years, to relieve the militia, to be supported by the United States, for local defence. We heartily wish entire success to the proposition.

Extract of a letter to the editor of the Albany Register, from a gentleman of rank in the army, dated Camp, Plattsburg, Nov. 9, 1814.

"I have nothing of importance to communicate. Reports say, that the enemy are about 3000 strong between this and Montreal, and that they are preparing for a winter campaign."

There is reason to fear that the allies of the British in the Missouri territory may be troublesome. In evidence of their services to the "bulwark of religion," they have lately murdered a lady.

We have nothing new from gen. Izard's division since the blowing up of Fort Erie. Gen. Brown, at Sackett's harbor, has discharged the chief part of the militia. Gen. Maccomb is on a visit to his family at Belleville, N. J. where he was rapturously received.

Maj. gen. Riall, and his aid, are on their way to Easton, Pa. (or rather, have probably arrived there) on parole, to wait the expected sailing of a cartel for Europe, from Philadelphia.

DISCHARGE OF THE BALTIMORE MILITIA.

Adjutant-general's office, 10th Military District
Baltimore, 18th Nov. 1814.

GENERAL ORDERS. The whole of the 3d Maryland brigade, with the exception of captain Thompson's troop, lieutenant colonel Harris' regiment artillery and captain Siles' corps of marine artillery, will as soon as mustered to-day, consider themselves discharged the service of the United States.

The major general in taking leave of this fine body of citizen soldiers, who have done themselves and country so much honor, offers to them the thanks of the United States, for their distinguished services.

To lieutenant colonel McDonald, who has for a short time commanded the brigade, the major-general tenders his thanks, personally, for his prompt and strict attention to duty; also to lieutenant colonel Sherrett, whose attentions to the guard for head quarters, furnished from his handsome regiment, have been highly pleasing.

The regiments and corps discharged will turn over to the military store keeper, the arms, ammunition, accoutrements and knapsacks, which have been received from the United States. The arms received from the state of Maryland will be retained by the troops.

NAVAL.

The U. S. sloop Hornet, so long blockaded in New London, slipped out a few nights ago, and safely arrived at New York.

Master com. Downes, capt. Porter's famous right hand man, or first lieutenant of the Essex, takes command of the U. S. sloop of war Epervier. She is to be fitted out immediately.

Copies of letters from Johnson Blakeley, Esq. commander of the United States sloop of war Wasp, to the secretary of the navy, dated

U. S. S. Wasp, at SEA, off Belle Isle, 27th Aug. 1814.

SIR—It is with sincere sorrow I have to announce to you the decease of Midshipmen Henry S. Langdon and Frank Toscan. They were wounded in the rencontre with the Reindeer, and all our efforts to save them after our arrival proved unavailing. It was their first essay, and although wounded, remained at their posts until the contest terminated. The constancy and courage with which they bore their sufferings leaves to the melancholy though proud reflection of what they might have been, had providence ordained otherwise. Every respect due to worth was shewn to their memory.

It is with regret that I have to inform you of the delays we have experienced at this place, but had they been of shorter duration we could not possibly have sailed, as one continued westerly wind has prevailed from the hour of our arrival up to the present day.

The course pointed out in your instructions having been interrupted, I shall endeavour to fulfil your further intentions as far as may possibly be in my power.

With great satisfaction, I add that every aid in the power of Mr. Crawford has been promptly afforded, and that I feel under many obligations to him for his attention and assistance.

We are now off this place with a fair wind and favourable prospects.

I have the honor to be,

Very respectfully,

Your most obedient servant,

J. BLAKELEY.

Hon. Wm. Jones, Secretary of the navy.

U. S. S. Wasp, at sea, 11th Sept. 1814.
Lat. 46° N. Long. 16° W.

SIR—After a protracted and tedious stay at L'Orient, had at last the pleasure of leaving that place on Saturday 27th August. On the 30th, captured the British brig Lettice, Henry Cockbain, master; and 31st August, the British brig Bon Accord, Adam Darno, master. In the morning of the 1st September, discovered a convoy of ten sail to leeward, in charge of the Armada 74, and a bomb ship, stood for them and succeeded in cutting out the British brig Mary, John D. Allan, master, laden with brass cannon taken from the Spaniards, iron cannon and military stores from Gibraltar to England, removed the prisoners, set her on fire and endeavoured to capture another of the convoy, but was chased off by the Armada. On the evening of the same day at 1-2 past 6, while going free, discovered four vessels nearly at the same time, two on the starboard, and two on the larboard bow, hauled up for the one most on the starboard bow, being the farthest to windward. At 7, the chase (a brig) commenced making signals, with flags, which could not be distinguished for want of light, and soon after made various ones with lanterns, rockets, and guns. At 29 minutes after 9, having the chase under our lee bow, the 12 pound carronade was directed to be fired into him, which he returned; ran under his lee bow to prevent his escaping, and at 29 minutes after 9 commenced the action. At 10 o'clock, believing the enemy to be silenced, orders were given to cease firing, when I hailed and asked if he had surrendered. No answer being given to this, and his fire having recommenced, it was again returned. At 12 minutes after 10, the enemy having suffered greatly and having made no return to our last two broadsides, I hailed him the second time to know if he had surrendered, when he answered in the affirmative. The guns were then ordered to be secured and the boat lowered to take possession. In the act of lowering the boat, a second brig was discovered, a little distane astern and standing for us. Sent the crew to their quarters, prepared every thing for another action, and awaited his coming up—at 36 minutes after 10, discovered two more sails astern standing towards us. I now felt myself compelled to forego the satisfaction of destroying the prize. Our braces having been cut away, we kept off the wind until others could be rove, and with the expectation of drawing the second brig from his companions but in this last we were disappointed. The second brig continued to approach us until she came close to our stern, when she hauled by the wind, fired her broadside which cut our rigging and sails considerably and shot away a lower main cross tree, and retraced her steps to join her consorts—when we were necessitated to abandon the prize; he appeared in every respect a total wreck. He continued for some time firing guns of distress until probably delivered by the two last vessels who made their appearance. The second brig could have engaged us if he thought proper, as he neared us fast, but contented himself with firing a broadside, and immediately returned to his companions.

It is with real satisfaction I have again the pleasure of bearing testimony to the merits of lieuts: Reilly, Tillinghast, Baury, and sailing-master Carr; and to the good conduct of every officer and man on board the Wasp. Their divisions and departments were attended and supplied with the utmost regularity and abundance, which, with the good order maintained, together with the vivacity and precision of their fire, reflects on them the greatest credit. Our loss is two killed, and one slightly wounded with a wad. The hull received four round shot, and the foremast many grape shot. Our rigging and sails suffered a great deal. Every damage has been repaired the day after, with the exception of our sails.

Of the vessel with whom we were engaged, nothing positive can be said, with regard to her name or force. While hailing him previous to his being fired into, it was blowing fresh (then going ten knots) and the name was not distinctly understood. Of her force, the four shot which struck us are all thirty-two pounds in weight, being a pound and three quarters heavier than any belonging to this vessel. From this circumstance, the number of men in her tops, her general appearance and great length, she is believed to be one of the largest brigs in the British navy.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, your most obedient servant,

(Signed)

J. BLAKELEY.

The hon. Wm. Jones, secretary of the navy.

P. S. I am told the enemy, after his surrender, asked for assistance and said he was sinking—the probability of this is confirmed by his firing single guns for some time after his capture.

Copy of a letter from commodore Macdonough to the secretary of the navy.

U. S. brig Eagle, Chazy, Nov. 6, 1814.

SIR—I have the honor to inform you, that about six tons 8 inch shells have been taken out of the lake by us at this place, which were thus secreted by the enemy in his late incursion into this country.

A transport sloop has also recently been raised at Isle La Motte, which was sunk by the enemy loaded with their naval stores, and various instruments of war. On weighing the powder taken on board the enemy's squadron, we find 17,000 pounds, with shot in proportion, besides much fixed ammunition.

I have the honor to be, sir, very respectfully, your most obedient servant,

T. MACDONOUGH.

The hon. Wm. Jones, secretary of the navy.

The Zealous 74, has arrived at Quebec, with 1,000,000 dollars on board. The British fleet on lake Ontario makes a splendid show. A Montreal paper says that the number of vessels and small craft carrying sail, that left Kingston for the head of the lake, amounted to 150. Sir James Yeo returned from a second excursion to the head of the lake, on the 2nd inst. The first was to supply the army with provisions—the second to bring the army to Kingston—as is supposed.

A New York paper says—We learn that captains M'Donough, Crane, Warrington and Blakeley, have been promoted to the rank of post captains in the U. States' navy. Five naval officers (whose names we have not learnt,) have been promoted to the rank of masters and commanders. We further learn, that government have it in contemplation to appoint two admirals.

A Philadelphia paper says—"We understand that commodore BAINBRIDGE is appointed secretary of the navy, in the room of capt. Jones, who has resigned."

During the ensuing week we expect to publish the number in arrear, and insert our recent omissions.

"New England Convention."

NO. II.

"The north, in an unrestrained intercourse with the south, protected by the equal laws of a common government, finds in the production of the latter, great additional resources of maritime and commercial enterprise in the precious materials of manufacturing industry. The south, in the same intercourse, benefitting by the agency of the north, sees its agriculture grow and commerce expand.—Turning partly into its own channels the seamen of the north, finds its particular navigation invigorated: and while it contributes to nourish and increase the general mass of the national navigation, looks forward to the protection of a maritime strength, to which itself is unequally adapted."

WASHINGTON.

It was thus that the "FATHER OF HIS COUNTRY" labored to quench petty jealousies, and inflame the mind of all with a love for the UNION; by shewing it the interest of all to cherish the general government. This extract from his "Farewell Address" happily strengthens the leading idea held forth in our last number,—that the commerce of the eastern states was mainly built upon the agriculture of the middle and southern. It also urges what none but mad jacobins will deny—the importance of all and every part of the union to the happiness and prosperity of the whole. And, though I would brush away the delusion that has existed as to the superior commerce of the New England states, I have less disposition to depreciate the character of the people or the natural advantages of that section of my country: to their courage, steadiness and virtue we were greatly indebted for our independence, in the first place, and for the establishment of our glorious constitution, in the second—and, to their industry, genius and enterprise we acknowledge ourselves much obligated for the common prosperity, general wealth, and singular happiness of our citizens: who, all the clamor about the war, or the real difficulties that that state of things subjects us to, to the contrary, have more of the comforts, conveniences and luxuries of life, and more enjoyment of all that is desirable by rational creatures, than any other people on earth.

It is, nevertheless, admitted that we suffer much by the war; but, if it were my present business, I think I could shew that a great part of those sufferings were, and are, occasioned by the wayward policy of the Boston jacobins. I religiously believe that, as to them the war may be justly attributed, so its continuance is also ascribable. In another number, I may point out the close connection of the Boston memorial to congress in 1806, (remonstrating against the outrages of the British, and pledging support to measures adopted to redress them) to the declaration of war in 1812: The steps to the controversy are astonishingly regular and progressive. And I will also give reasons for the opinion, that the continuance of the war may be ascribed to the same set of persons, by the divisions they have excited among the people, and the hopes held out to the enemy of a separation of the states (as has been talked of for several years); or at least, of such embarrassments of the general government as to compel it to make a disadvantageous peace. I will here observe, en passant, that those jacobins taunted congress to declare war, and now clamor for peace, for the same object. They hoped and believed that the people would not bear the government out in the contest, and that they would come into power: deceived in this calculation, they seem disposed to have peace on any terms—as I live, I almost think they would give up Boston itself, if the possession of it were made the sine qua non of the enemy) that may disgrace the prevailing party, and introduce them to public confidence and authority. We may all recollect that in their denunciations of the war against Canada, how solemnly they pledged themselves to resist and repel every invasion of the territories of the "good old United States," as they insidiously called the original thirteen. But how is it now?—Why—a state that has boasted of her 70,000 well disciplined militia—of the courage and resources of her people, more than any other—who pretended to feel indignant at the idea that a hostile foot should trample our shore, sits down quietly and at apparent ease in the loss of one fourth of its own territory, seized by proclamation and held by an insignificant force; and patiently hears arguments in the public papers why the British may hold the possession! This state is Massachusetts—such, alas! is the strange working of jacobinism.

But to proceed to the more immediate objects of the present essay:

We are astounded by the clamor of the jacobins for the loss of their commerce—for the great misery and distress that prevails—for the poverty that is about to encompass them on every side—for the wide ruin that is extending itself to all classes of the people, or any thing else that may assist to make a noise, or fill a newspaper column with ranting and toaring. But I will give evidence of the fact, that the people of Massachusetts, (and of the eastern states generally,) have suffered much less by the war than any other section of the United States; and perhaps make it appear that they have really prospered by it. I request the reader may not be surprised at this proposition, as well he may be if he believes one millionth part of what the jacobins say—but seriously examine the statements below:

While the ports of the eastern states were left free for "neutrals," as they were called, those of the middle and south were blockaded by the enemy; this threw an immense business into their hands, by which they have profited beyond the calculations of any man who has not reflected on the subject, and examined the facts that belong to it. The Bostonians made more money in the first eighteen months of the war than they had done for double that period, in any other time preceding; and the nature of their harbors are such, that, though now blockaded like the rest, there exists a very considerable commerce, and, somehow, they are full of business—while Baltimore, for example, has not had an arrival, I believe, from a foreign port for a twelvemonth. And, as it was only to commerce that Baltimore owed the sudden rise of its population (now greater than that of Boston) and as we exported more goods, it seems reasonable to suppose that we suffer as much as they do! But, instead of grumbling and growing against our own government, we do all that in our power lies to make an honest peace, by coercing that justice which our merchants, in conjunction with those of Boston, demanded in 1806, by memorials to congress—which memorials are on record: The city of New-York, blockaded as closely as the enemy can do it, and long cut off from trade, exported three times as much as Boston; and, as before observed, paid more duties into the treasury of the United States than all the "nation of New England" and one seventh over! But New-York is indignant at the base propositions offered our commissioners at Ghent; and prepared for any thing rather than dishonorable peace.

As to the misery and distress that is made so much noise about to the eastward, what portion of affliction have the people of that section suffered compared with those of other states? The whole "nation," leaving out gallant Vermont, has not furnished as many men even to repulse the enemy as the new state of Tennessee has sent out to meet and fight him! Nor have they lost as many lives, in all, as the state of Maryland, alone!—their coasts have not been ravaged like those of the middle and southern states, especially the shores of the Chesapeake, where things have been done by those they eulogize, that Napo- lean Bonaparte would have blushed at the idea of being thought capable of! Nor have their citizens, like those of Ohio, Kentucky, Georgia, &c. been liable to the scalping knife of the savage allies of Britain—their children have not been murdered; their wives have not been violated; their wounded soldiers have not been burnt to death! Of their poverty and the wide ruin that is extending itself among them, the following table gives us the proof!

If money—SPECIE—be the evidence of commercial prosperity, Massachusetts never was half so well off as now! From years ago, when the trade of the United States naturally sought the places where its commodities were to be had, one of the [several] banks of Baltimore had more specie than all the banks of Massachusetts; nay, perhaps and probably, more than there was in that state, whether in possession of the banks or of individuals—and so it will have again, when a regular and honest commerce shall succeed the British war and eastern smuggling. At the time alluded to (1810) and for several years preceding, a half eagle, of gold, was less a rarity in Baltimore than a half dollar, in silver, in New England. These are facts that should be called to the recollection—they arose from the regular state of trade, and will ensue the moment that a peace with England is signed; and then will the jacobins at Boston suffer those embarrassments in the due course of things, urged by a just resentment, that they have wontonly heaped upon their country through adventitious circumstances and a traitorous commerce and intercourse with the enemy.*

I give it as my deliberate opinion, that a plot was entered into between some persons to the eastward and the British, to destroy the public credit of the United States, by the aid of British funds, in various ways forced on the market. But this subject will require more time and room (and is worthy of it) than I can spare at present. Unhappily, the alli-

*With two or three years of regular trade—"Price trade and Sailor's rights"—the "mob-town" Baltimore, a new city, but yet in the gristle, (if it were to set seriously about it) could, of itself, draw off from Boston all its present horde of specie, and cause every bank in that "great commercial metropolis" to stop payment. This is not said unthinkingly. In that old established place of business there is great wealth; but the same combination here to effect this purpose that exists at Boston to depreciate the credit of the other banks in the United States, would assuredly accomplish it. And the reason why it might be done is simply this, that Baltimore is one of the great central points of those staple articles that command the general trade of the country. New York could do it in a few months; and so might Philadelphia in a little while. But until the late outrageous conduct of the Boston banks, in running upon others, a thing of this kind was never thought of. Let them look to it—so flagrant have been their proceedings, that thousands of men are ready to come under an engagement never to purchase, or use, anything that reaches them by the way of Boston.

ance has measurably succeeded, through all sorts of lying and deception aided by considerable power, which they use in every way, without regard to any thing but the grand object just stated.

The impertinence that belongs to men suddenly elevated, is manifested in a thousand ways by the jacobins. The Boston Patriot, an able "American" paper, observed some days ago, that treasury notes could be sold in Baltimore at par. On which a person said in the Daily Advertiser—a jacobin paper, "I believe it is true; but you must take pay in Baltimore bills. This sort of sale reminds me of a man that sold his dog at the enormous price of one thousand dollars, to take pay in pups at $500 each."

True abstracts of the statements of the several banks in the commonwealth of Massachusetts, rendered in June 1810, and in January 1814, published by order of the legislature.

The capitals of the several institutions are taken from the return of 1810; and, that being compared with the return of 1814, the following differences appear:

Maine and Nantucket and Northampton and Berkshire are omitted in the return of 1814. The two last, we believe are extinct.

Gloucester, Saco and Marblehead have capitals of 120,000 each, instead of 100,000.

Worcester, 200,000, instead of 150,000.

Hallowell and Augusta, 150,000, instead of 200,000.

None of those marked with an astrisk (*) are noticed in the return of 1810—and are presumed to have been established since that time.

From an examination of the facts shown by this comparative statement, we must conclude that the commerce of Massachusetts was never so flourishing; or, that the mighty and excessive funds are British, held in terrorem over the rest of our banking establishments; immediately operating to depress the public stocks at will, and embarrass the financial concerns of the government. On the most careful reflection, I cannot find any other way than one of these to account for the immense increase of funds, being nearly four times as much as in 1810. If a man that was notoriously poor and meagre [as the Massachusetts banks were in 1810]—who was dependent on the charity of his neighbors for a character in business [as the banks of Massachusetts were—every one of which New York could have made stop payment in a month] suddenly sports with thousands (or millions), and affects to command the market where he had been an humble dependent, we naturally suspect that he has made money very rapidly, by his business—by a prize in the lottery—by a legacy—by finding a hidden treasure—or some great knavery.

If this great monied capital be honestly acquired, may we not hazard an opinion that the Hartford convention is called, and the talk about separation kept up, with the sole view of inducing the enemy to continue the war, that the prosperous business may last? The Dutch merchants supplied the enemies of the republic with gun-powder—The British in Upper Canada had long since been compelled to retire for want of provisions but for the supplies they received from the “friends of peace” in the United States—and why may not this foul thing be a money speculation? A plan adopted to acquire, through the course of trade as subject to the war, a degree of wealth that could never be hoped for in peace?

If this capital be acquired by smuggling, it shews a prostration of honor that fits the actors for any thing else, and strengthens the insinuation that the intent of the convention may be as stated. The honest man blesses the moon, because it guides him in his way; but we frequently hear of “moon-cursers”—gangs of wretches who frequent dangerous coasts to plunder wrecked ships, rejoicing in the misfortunes of others, affording business to themselves. That smuggling has prospered to a very great extent in the eastern states, we have abundant proof. It is so far from being denied, that it seems to have become a sort of a negative virtue with the self-styled “friends of peace,” if we may believe their great writer, who says:

“ENCOURAGED and protected from infamy “by the just odium against the war, they “engage in lawless speculations, [smuggling] “sneer at the restraints of conscience, LAUGH “AT PERJURY mock at legal restraints, and “acquire ill-gotten wealth at the expence of “public morals, and of the more sober, conscientious part of the community”†

Such is the state of society as drawn by “the gentleman who wrote the Analysis,” spoken of by John Henry. He is a lawyer, I believe, of the name of Lowell; the champion of “commerce” and of “honest men!”—Perhaps no man has ever wrote so much for the public papers as he has done for some years past. He uses as many shapes in his essays to cheat the unthinking, as sin assumes to lead mankind to condemnation. It is his daily business, though apparently unconnected with any newspaper establishment—he writes for all, for any that will insert his pieces, and under many signatures. Nine tenths of the violent essays that appear in the Boston jacobin papers are the productions of his pen. I believe what he says in the extract, because it is supported by a multitude of notorious facts. This Lowell is the first American citizen, that I name in the REGISTER for reprehension; and he, probably, may be the last. I should not have named him except to caution the people, that the various infuriated essays in the Boston papers, written under different appearances, as if to shew a general sentiment, are chiefly the work of this individual. I wish not to judge him wrongfully—but when opportunity is fit, we may hear his being deemed “worthy of a statue of gold” by some member of the British parliament for “his services in America,” as Cobbett was esteemed for his.

If this capital be British, the same inducement prevails—the jacobins not being able to rule the state, would rule the banks—they must govern something, or somewhere, and

"Rather to reign in hell than serve in heaven." be loath to part with the power committed to them by the enemy. Besides they are making profitable speculations on this money, dealing greatly in the public securities, like jeu brokers. The capital being taken as British, every reader will form his own conclusions why it is deposited at Boston. It certainly is not there "to build churches."

Men of New England, what interest have you in any of these things? Will you be plunged in civil war that some twenty or fifty of the ambitious may have power? Will you continue the war, "affording the enemy aid and comfort," that the same set may prosecute a smuggling business, or hold British funds to speculate on the public stocks? This war was yours—it began for your commerce and at your instigation. Your jacobins now appear willing to abandon every species of trade that Great Britain pleases to "regulate" by an order in council, or otherwise. Take care that the people of the other states do not pledge themselves, if an honorable peace can now be obtained, never hereafter to concern themselves about the carrying trade, and to become really, what you have falsely been told that they were, "enemies of commerce." I will caution you that a principle is prevailing to a considerable extent, that we shall never interfere with any regulations of trade, that do not immediately affect the carrying of our own productions to their immediate market, and the immediate transportation of goods hither. Take the matter into consideration and see how it will operate on the general relations of the commerce you had so boasted of by your lawyers. I fear the proceedings of your jacobins may establish this principle. If so—better than one half of the trade you possessed is lost without hope of redemption. Put down these base men, "frown" them into the insignificance that their numbers deserve; vote against the administration, if you cannot approve its measures, and turn them out if you can—but obey the laws, repel the invader, and give us evidence of your "religion, morality and steady habits" by expelling traitors from influence amongst you. THE MAJORITY MUST RULE; bad, indeed, would it be if three states should dictate to fifteen, one of which states (New-York) is at this time, perhaps, quite as populous and as wealthy as all those to be represented in the Harford convention; and if not so now, will, in 10 or 20 years, be twice as powerful. Redeem yourselves from the ins of those wicked persons—obey Washington; and suspect every one for a villain that splutters about "geographical distinctions." Our interests are not separate—regard him as a British pensioner (and nine times out of ten you will be right, unless he be one of those little creatures that retails the wholesale falhood of the great jacobins) who shall say that the south and the north are "natural enemies," as some of your vile paragraphists have declared. Give us the hand of fellowship—we are men flesh and blood like yourselves; and, supporting and supported, we may defy "a world in arms."

Attack upon Baltimore.

BRITISH ACCOUNT.

From the London Gazette Extraordinary—October 17.
Colonial Department, Downing-st. Oct. 17.

Captain McDougall arrived early this morning with a despatch addressed to Earl Bathurst, one of his majesty's principal secretaries of state, by Colonel Brook, of which the following is a copy.

MY LORD—I have the honor to inform your lordship, that the division of troops under command of major-general Ross effected a disembarkation on the morning of the 12th of September, near North Point, on the left point of the Patapsco river, distant from Baltimore about 13 miles, with a view of pushing a reconnoissance, in co-operation with the naval forces, to that town; and acting thereon as the enemy's strength and positions might be found to dictate.

The approach on this side to Baltimore lays through a small peninsula formed by the Patapsco and Back rivers, and generally from two to three miles broad, while it narrows in some places to less than half a mile.

Three miles from North Point the enemy had entrenched himself quite across this neck of land, towards which (the disembarkation having been completed at an early hour) the troops advanced.

The enemy was actively employed in the completion of this work, deepening the ditch and strengthening its front by a low abatis, both which, however, he precipitately abandoned, on the approach of our skirmishers, leaving in our hands some few dragoons, being part of his rear-guard.

About two miles beyond this post our advance became engaged; the country was here closely wooded, and the enemy's riflemen were enabled to conceal themselves. At this moment the gallant general Ross received a wound in his breast, which proved mortal. He only survived to recommend a young and unprovided family to the protection of his king and country.

Thus fell at an early age one of the highest ornaments of his profession; one who, whether at the head of a regiment, a brigade, or corps, had alike displayed the talents of command; who was not less beloved in his private than enthusiastically admired in his public character; and whose only fault, if it may be deemed so, was an excess of gallantry, enterprise and devotion, to the service.

If ever it were permitted to a soldier to lament those who fall in battle, we may indeed in this instance claim that melancholy privilege.

Thus it is, sir, that the honor of addressing your lordship, and the command of this army, have devolved upon me; duties which, under any other circumstances, might have been embraced as the most enviable gifts of fortune; and here I venture to solicit through your lordship, his royal highness the prince regent's consideration to the circumstance of my succeeding, during operations of so much moment, to an officer of such high and established merit.

Our advance continuing to press forward, the enemy's light troops were pushed to within five miles of Baltimore, where a corps of about 600 men, six pieces of artillery, and some hundred cavalry, were discovered posted under cover of a wood, drawn up in a very dense order, and lining a strong paling,* which crossed the main road nearly at right angles. The creeks and inlets of the Patapsco and Back rivers, which approach each other at this point, will in some measure account for the contracted nature of the enemy's position.

I immediately ordered the necessary dispositions for a general attack. The light brigade, under the command of major Jones, of the 4th, consisting of the 85th light infantry, under major Gibbins, and the light companies of the army under major Pringle, of the 21st, covered the whole of the front, driving in the enemy's skirmishers with great loss on his main body. The 4th regiment, under major Faunce, by a detour through some hollow ways, gained, unperceived, a lodgment close upon the enemy's left. The remainder of the right brigade, under the command of the hon. lieutenant-col. Mullins, consisting of the 44th regiment, under major Johnson, the marines of the fleet, under capt. Robbys, and a detachment of seamen under capt. Money, of the Taave, formed a line along the enemy's front, while the left brigade under col. Paterson, consisting of the 21st regiment, commanded by major Whitaker, the 2d battalion of marines, by lieutenant-col. Malcolm, and a detachment of marines, by major Lewis, remained in columns on the road, with orders to deploy to his left, and press the enemy's right, the moment the ground became sufficiently open to admit of that movement.

In this order, the signal being given, the whole of the troops advanced rapidly to the charge. In less than 15 minutes the enemy's force being utterly broken and dispersed, fled in every direction over the country, leaving on the field 2 pieces of cannon, with a considerable number of killed, wounded, and prisoners.

The enemy loss in this short but brilliant affair, was from five to six hundred in killed and wounded; while at the most moderate computation, he is at least one thousand hors de combat. The 5th regiment of militia, in particular, has been represented as nearly annihilated.

The day being now far advanced, and the troops (as is always the case on the first march after disembarkation) much fatigued, we halted for the night on the ground of which the enemy had been dispossessed. Here I received a communication from vice-admiral the hon. sir Alex. Cochrane, informing me that the frigates, bomb ships, and flotilla of the fleet, would on the ensuing morning take their stations as previously proposed.

At day-break on the 13th, the army again advanced, and at 10 o'clock I occupied a favorable position eastward of Baltimore, distant about a mile and a half, and from whence I could reconnoitre at my leisure the defences of that town.

Baltimore is completely surrounded by strong but detached hills, on which the enemy had constructed a chain of palisaded redoubts, connected by a small breastwork: I have, however, reason to think that the defence to the northward and westward of the place were in a very unfinished state. Chinkapin-hill, which lay in front of our position, completely commands the town; this was the strongest part of the line, and here the enemy seemed most apprehensive of attack. These works were defended, according to the best information which we could obtain, by about fifteen thousand men, with a large train of artillery.

Judging it perfectly feasible, with the description of forces under my command, I made arrangements for a night attack, during which the superiority of the enemy's artillery would not have been so much felt, and capt. Macdougall, the bearer of these despatches, will have the honor to point out to your lordship those particular parts of the line which I had proposed to act on.

During the evening, however, I received a communication from the commander in chief of the naval forces, by which I was informed, that in consequence of the entrance to the harbor being closed up by vessels sunk for that purpose by the enemy, a naval co-operation against the town and camp was found impracticable.

Under these circumstances, and keeping in view your lordship's instructions, it was agreed between the vice-admiral and myself, that the capture of the town would not have been a sufficient equivalent to the loss which might probably be sustained in storming the heights.

Having formed this resolution, after compelling the enemy to sink upwards of 20 vessels in different parts of the harbor, causing the citizens to remove almost the whole of their property to places of more security inland, obliging the government to concentrate all the military force of the surrounding states, harassing the militia, and forcing them to collect from many remote districts, causing the enemy to burn a valuable rope-walk, with other public buildings, in order to clear the glacis in front of their redoubts, besides having beaten and routed them in a general action, I retired on the 14th, three miles from the position which I had occupied, where I halted during some hours.

This tardy movement was partly caused by an expectation that the enemy might possibly be induced to move out of the intrenchments and follow us, but he profited by the lesson which he had received on the 12th, and towards the evening I retired the troops about three miles and a half further, where I took up my ground for the night.

Having ascertained, at a late hour on the morning of the 15th, that the enemy had no disposition to quit his intrenchments, I moved down and re-embarked the army at North Point, not leaving a man behind, and carrying with me about 200 prisoners, being persons of the best families in the city, and which number might have been considerably increased, was not the fatigue of the troops an object principally to be avoided.

I have now to remark to your lordship, that nothing could surpass the zeal, unanimity, and ardor, displayed by every description of force, whether naval, military, or marine, during the whole of these operations.

I am highly indebted to the vice admiral sir A. Cochrane, commander in chief of the naval forces; for the active assistance and zealous co-operation which he was ready, upon every occasion, to afford me; a disposition conspicuous in every branch of the naval service, and which cannot fail to ensure success to every combined operation of this armament.

Captain Edward Crofton, commanding the brigade of seamen appointed to the small arms, for the animated and enthusiastic example which he held forth to his men, deserves my approbation—as do also captains Nourse, Money, Sullivan, and Ramsay, royal navy, for the steadiness and good order which they maintained in their several directions.

I feel every obligation to rear admiral Cockburn for the counsel and assistance which he afforded me, and from which I derived the most signal benefit.

To colonel Patterson, for the steady manner in which he brought his column into action, I give my best thanks.

*This "paling" was a common post and rail fence!—nothing else, whatsoever.—Ed.

The hon. lieutenant colonel Mullins, deserved every approbation for the excellent order in which he led that part of the right brigade under his immediate command, while charging the enemy in line.

Major Jones, commanding the light brigade, merits my best acknowledgments, for the active and skilful dispositions by which he covered the movements of the army.

The distinguished gallantry of captain De Bathe 95th light infantry, has been particularly reported to me, and I beg to record my own knowledge of similar conduct on former occasions.

To major Faunce, 4th regiment, for the manner, in which he gained and turned the enemy's left, as well as for the excellent discipline maintained in that regiment, every particular praise is due.

The exertions of major Gubbins, commanding the 85th light infantry; and of major Kenny, commanding the light companies, were highly commendable.

Captain Mitchell, commanding the royal artillery; captain Carmichael, a meritorious officer of that corps, and lieutenant Lawrence, of the marine artillery, are entitled to my best thanks; as is captain B. Bedford, commanding royal engineers, for the abilities he displayed in his particular branch of service.

To lieutenant Evans, 3d dragoons, acting deputy quartermaster general to this army, for the unremitting zeal, activity, and perfect intelligence which he evinced in the discharge of the various and difficult duties of his department, I feel warmly indebted, and I beg to solicit, through your lordship, a promotion suitable to the high professional merits of this officer.

Captain Macdougall, aid-de-camp to the late general Ross (and who has acted as assistant adjt. gen. in the absence of major Debieg through indisposition,) is the bearer of these dispatches, and having been in the confidence of general Ross, as well as in mine, will be found perfectly capable of giving your lordship any further information relative to the operations of this army which you may require; he is an officer of great merit and promise; and I beg to recommend him to your lordship's protection.

I have the honor to be, &c.

ARTHUR BROOKE, colonel commanding.

HENRY DEBIEG,

Maj. A. D. A. A. general

Admiralty Office, Oct. 17.

Captain Crofton, acting captain of his majesty's ship the Royal Oak, arrived this morning at this office with despatches from vice admiral the hon. sir Alexander Cochrane, K. B. addressed to John Wilson Croker, Esq. of which the following are copies:—

H. M. ship Tonnant, Chesapeake, Sept. 17.

Sir—I request that you will be pleased to inform my lords commissioners of the admiralty, that the approaching equinoctial new moon rendering it unsafe to proceed immediately out of the Chesapeake with the combined expedition, to act upon the plans which had been concerted previous to the departure of the Iphigenia; maj. gen. Ross and myself resolved to occupy the intermediate time to advantage, by making a demonstration on the city of Baltimore, which might be converted into a real attack, should circumstances appear to justify it; and as our arrangements were soon made, I proceeded up this river,* and anchored off the mouth of the Patuxent, on the 11th inst. where the frigates and smaller vessels entered, at a convenient distance for landing the troops.

At an early hour the next morning, the disembarkation of the army was effected without opposition, having attached to it a brigade of 600 seamen under captain Edward Crofton (late of the Leopard); the second battalion of marines of the squadron, and the colonial black marines. Rear admiral Cockburn accompanied the general, to advise and arrange as might be deemed necessary for our combined efforts.

So soon, as the army moved forward I hoisted my flag in the Surprise, and with the remainder of the frigates, bombs, sloops, and the rocket-ships, passed further up the river, to render what co-operation could be found practicable.

While the bomb-vessels were working up, in order that we might open our fire upon the enemy's fort at day break next morning, an account was brought to me, that general Ross, when reconnoitering the enemy, had received a mortal wound by a musket ball, which closed his glorious career, before he could be brought off to the ship.

It is a tribute due to the memory of this gallant and respected officer, to pause in my relation, while I lament the loss that his majesty's service and the army of which he was one of the brightest ornaments, have sustained by his death.—The unanimity, the zeal which he manifested on every occasion, while I had the honor of serving with him, gave life and ease to the most arduous undertakings.—Too heedless of his personal security when in the field, his devotion to the care and honor of his army has caused the termination of his valuable life. The major-general has left a wife and family for whom I am confident his grateful country will provide.

*What river? the river Chesapeake? Ed.

The skirmish which had deprived the army of its brave general was a prelude to a most decisive victory over the flower of the enemy's troops. Colonel Brook, on whom the command devolved, having pushed forward our force to within five miles of Baltimore, where the enemy about six or seven thousand, had taken up an advanced position, strengthened by field pieces, and where he had disposed himself, apparently with the intention of making a determined resistance, fell upon the enemy with such impetuosity that he was obliged soon to give way, and fly in every direction leaving on the field of battle a considerable number of killed and wounded, and two pieces of cannon.

For the particulars of this brilliant affair, I beg leave to refer their lordships to rear-admiral Cockburn's dispatch, transmitted herewith.

At day break the next morning, the bombs having their stations within shell range, supported by the Surprise, with the other frigates and sloops, opened their fire upon the fort that protected the entrance of the harbor, and I had now an opportunity of observing the strength and the preparations of the enemy.

The approach to the town on the land side was defended by commanding heights, upon which was constructed a chain of redoubts connected by a breast work, with a ditch in front, an extensive train of artillery, and show of force that was reported to be from 15 to 20,000 men.

The entrance by sea, within which the town is retired nearly three miles, was entirely obscured by a barrier of vessels sunk at the mouth of the harbor, defended inside by gun boats, flanked on the right by a strong and regular fortification, and on the left by a battery of several heavy guns.

These preparations rendering it impracticable to afford any essential co-operation by sea, I considered that an attack on the enemy's strong position by the army only, with such disparity of force, though confident of success, might risk a greater loss than the possession of the town would compensate for, while holding in view the ulterior operations of this force in the contemplation of his majesty's government; and, therefore as the primary object of our movement had been already fully accomplished, I communicated my observations to col. Brook, who coinciding with me in opinion, it was mutually agreed that we should withdraw.

The following morning the army began leisurely to retire; and so salutary was the effect produced on the enemy by the defeat he had experienced, that notwithstanding every opportunity was offered for his repeating the conflict, with an infinite superiority, our troops re-embarked without molestation; the ships of war dropped down as the army retired.

The result of this demonstration has been the defeat of the army of the enemy, the destruction, by themselves, of a quantity of shipping, the burning of an extensive rope-walk, and other public erections, the causing of them to remove their property from the city, and above all, the collecting and harrassing of his armed inhabitants from the surrounding country; producing a total stagnation of their commerce; and heaping upon them considerable expenses, at the same time effectually drawing off their attention and support from other important quarters.

It has been the source of the greatest gratification to me, the continuation of that unanimity existing between the two services, which I have before noticed to their lordships: and I have reason to assure them, that the command of the army has fallen upon a most zealous and able officer in colonel Brook, who has followed up the system of cordiality that had been so beneficially adopted by his much lamented chief.

Rear admiral Cockburn, to whom I had confided that part of the naval service which was connected with the army, evinced his usual zeal and ability, and executed his important trust to my entire satisfaction.

Rear admiral Malcolm, who regulated the collection, debarkation and embarkation of the troops, and the supplies they required, has merited my best thanks for his indefatigable exertions; and I have to express my acknowledgments for the counsel and assistance afforded us in all our operations, I have received from rear admiral Codrington, the captain of the fleet.

The captains of the squadron who were employed in the various duties afloat, were all emulous to promote the service in which they were engaged, and, with the officers acting under them, are entitled to my fullest approbation.

I beg leave to call the attention of their lordships to the report rear admiral Cockburn has made of the meritorious and gallant conduct of the naval brigade; as well as the accompanying letter from colonel Brook, expressing his obligations to captain Edward Crofton, who commanded, and captains T. B. Sullivan, Rowland, Money, and Robert Ramsay, who had charge of divisions; and I have to recommend these officers, together with those who are particularly noticed by the rear admiral, to their lordships favorable consideration.

Captain Robyns of the royal marines, who commanded the marines of the squadron on this occasion, and in the operations against Washington, being severely wounded, I beg leave to bring him to their lordships recollection, as having been frequently noticed for his gallant conduct during the services on the Chesapeake, and to recommend him, with lieutenant Sampson Marshall, of the Diadem, who is dangerously wounded, to their lordships favor and protection.

First lieutenant John Lawrence, of the royal marine artillery, who commanded the rocket brigade, has again rendered essential service, and is highly spoken of by colonel Brook.

Captain Edward Crofton, who will have the honor of delivering this dispatch, is competent to explain any further particulars; and I beg leave to recommend him to their lordships protection, as a most zealous and intelligent officer.

I have the honor to be, &c.

ALEX. COCHRANE,

Vice admiral, and commander in chief.

To John Wilson Croker, &c.

REMARKS ON THE PRECEDING.

We shall not notice all the falshoods in those accounts. It would occupy too much room, and might have the appearance of incivility to go from paragraph to paragraph, and say that each contained an untruth. The following are some of the mammoth that tower over the lesser misrepresentations.

It is false, that we had entrenched ourselves quite across the neck of land, three miles from North Point. [See Brook's letter, 3d paragraph.] Some works at this place had been just begun; but there were no soldiers within two miles of it, except a few dragoons on the look-out. The advance of our corps was at the spot where Ross was killed.

It is false, that we had 6000 men, [see 9th paragraph.] The whole force under brig gen. Stricker was only 3185* men, infantry, artillery and cavalry, of these not more than 1500 were actually engaged. There were no other troops than Sticker's that went to meet the enemy; and of these, through the disorderly conduct of the 51st regt. many had no chance to fire a gun at him.

It is false, that we lost from 5 to 600 men in killed and wounded, or that "it is a moderate computation" we "were at least 1000 hors de combat." We had 24 killed, 139 wounded, and 50 prisoners—total 213. Of the wounded, 26 were made prisoners and paroled. The 5th regiment represented to "be nearly annihilated," in killed, wounded and missing lost less than 80 men out of 550. So much for paragraph the 12th.

It is false that col. Brook carried away "about 200 prisoners" [see paragraph 21.] He had exactly 49 and no more. This is wantonly erroneous.

It is false that the enemy had only 39 killed. The precise number we shall never know perhaps, but from the number we buried, it must have been much greater. The enemy himself buried many.

It is false that, we lost two pieces of cannon; one only was lost (a 4 pounder,) and that by the running away of the horses.

It is false that col. Brook took off all his own men—we picked up several stragglers.

The admiral's letter, though less abundant in downright falshood than the colonel's, is equally calculated to lead into error. A man may speak false ly in the words of truth. He lays great stress on the "sunken vessels in the harbor," and implies that they kept him from approaching the fort, which they did not; it was our cannon that prevented him. He says nothing more of the bombardment than that a "fire was opened!" He does not tell that it lasted from sunrise on the 13th to 7 o'clock, A. M. on the 14th, during which he threw from 15 to 1800 great bombs, weighing about 200lbs. each, with some round shot and rockets—he does not say that whenever he got within reach of our guns he was driven off with precipitation, nor tell the failure of his night attack—he gives us no list of killed or wounded, though the screams of his people were heard to the shore. He tells one truth, that we "burnt a rope-walk"—but all the rest about shipping destroyed or public buildings burnt, is false.

Such are "BRITISH OFFICIALS' LIES!"

¶ The entire force collected for the defence of Baltimore, and stationed in the forts, batteries and gun vessels, entrenched or in the field, was less than 15,000 men. The British force was not much less. It is true, they could not properly have divested their snips of all their men; but might have done it with as much propriety as we could have divested our forts and batteries of those who fought them, or who stood ready to support them, in case of a landing being made.

RECAPITULATION.

Killed—1 adjutant, 1 subaltern and 22 privates.

Wounded—1 major, 2 captains, 3 subalterns, 12 non. com. officers and 121 privates.

Made prisoners—1 subaltern, 49 non. com. officers and privates.—Total 213.

The recapitulation contains the aggregate of prisoners taken by the enemy, excepting those paroled at the meeting house, included in the wounded. I am unable at present to state to what regiments they were attached. As the honorable colonel Brook has vied with his compatriots in falsifying an official report, I beg you will favor the public with this account in any form you please. I pledge myself for its correctness. Yours respectfully, Proceedings of Congress.

IN SENATE.

Wednesday, November 30.—The senate proceeded to the consideration of the following report, made on the 28th by Mr. Tait from a committee appointed to enquire into the subject, which terminates with the following resolutions:

Resolved, That it is expedient to authorise by law the appointment of officers above the grade of captain in the navy of the United States.

Resolved, That it is inexpedient, at this time, to make any provision for conferring naval rank by brevet.

The first of these resolutions was agreed to and referred to the committee to report a bill accordingly; and the second resolve was postponed to the first Monday in January next.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

Friday, Nov. 25.—After some other business, the bank bill again occurring, and great diversity of sentiment still appearing on several points, the subject was referred to a select committee, and the house went into a committee of the whole on the tax bills. Before they were wholly gone through, the committee rose and the house adjourned.

Saturday, Nov. 26. The house in committee of the whole on the tax bills. An amendment was made therein by striking out twenty cents per gallon, as the duty on spirits distilled, and inserting fifteen, with which, however, the house refused to concur—78 to 72.

Five or six other amendments were proposed, which were rejected by large majorities, and the bill ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

Monday, Nov. 28. Mr. Lowndes, of S. C. from the select committee to whom was committed the bill to incorporate the subscribers to the bank of the United States of America, reported that the committee had had said bill under consideration, but not having been able to discover any means of uniting the conflicting opinions on the subject, had therefore directed him to report the bill without amendment. Mr. L. also laid before the house a letter obtained from the secretary of the treasury by the committee, on the subject of the amendments made to the bank bill.

[This letter was read. It is written with remarkable frankness, and expresses a decided disapprobation of the issue of treasury notes, proposed by the amendments made to the bill. The house not having ordered it to be printed—after a great deal of speaking, moving and voting, the business ended in refusing to give the bill a third reading—or in other words, it was rejected. For the third reading 45—against it 107.]

Tuesday, Nov. 29. This was a busy day. Mr. Johnson from the committee for the purpose, reported on the causes of the success of the invasion of Washington City—which, with some of the accompanying documents was ordered to be printed. They will make a volume. After some debate on the propriety of immediately printing the following correspondence, it was ordered to be done:

Washington, November 27, 1814.

Sir—The committee of the house of representatives, to which the bank bill was re-committed on Friday last, have directed me to request you to communicate your opinion in relation to the effect which a considerable issue of treasury notes (to which should be attached the quality of being receivable in subscriptions to the bank) might have upon the credit of the government and particularly upon the prospects of a loan for 1815.

As the bill, as it was referred to the committee, provides for the subscription of 44 millions of treasury notes to form with six millions of specie the capital of the bank, any information which you may think proper to give, either in relation to the practicability of getting them into circulation without depreciation, or in regard to their operation on any part of our fiscal system afterwards, will be very acceptable.

I am, sir, very respectfully, your obedient servt.
WM. LOWNDES.

To the Honorable

The Secretary of the Treasury.

Treasury Department, Nov. 27, 1814.

Sir—I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your letter, requesting for a committee of the house of representatives an opinion upon the following inquiries:

1. The effect which a considerable issue of treasury notes, with the quality of being receivable in subscriptions to a national bank, will have upon the credit of the government; and particularly, upon the prospects of a loan for 1815?
2. The practicability of getting forty-four millions of treasury notes (forming with six millions of specie, the capital for a national bank) into circulation, without depreciation?

The enquiries of the committee cannot be satisfactorily answered in the abstract; but must be considered in connection with the state of our finances, and the state of the public credit.

When I arrived at Washington, the Treasury was suffering under every kind of embarrassment. The demands upon it were great in amount, while the means to satisfy them were comparatively small; precarious in the collection, and difficult in the application. The demands consisted of dividends upon old and new funded debt, of treasury notes, and of legislative appropriations for the army, the navy, and the current service—all urgent and important. The means consisted:—First, of the fragment of an authority to borrow money, when nobody was disposed to lend, and to issue treasury notes which none but necessitous creditors, or contractors in distress, or commissaries, quarter-masters and navy agents, acting as it were officially, seemed willing to accept:—Second, of the amount of bank credits scattered throughout the United State, and principally in the southern and western banks, which have been rendered in a degree useless, by the stoppage of payments in specie, and the consequent practicability of transferring the public funds from one place, to meet the public engagements in another place. And, third, of the current supply of money from the imposts, from internal duties, and from the sales of public land, which ceased to be a foundation of any rational estimate, or reserve, to provide even for the dividends on the funded debt, when it was found that the treasury notes (only requiring, indeed, a cash payment at the distance of a year) to whomsoever they were issued at the treasury, and almost as soon as they were issued, reached the hands of the collectors, in payments of debts, duties and taxes; thus disappointing and defeating the only remaining expectation of productive revenue.

Under these circumstances (which I had the honor to communicate to the committee of ways and means,) it became the duty of this department to endeavor to remove the immediate pressure from the treasury; to endeavor to restore the public credit; and to endeavor to provide for the expences of the ensuing year. The only measures that occurred to my mind, for the accomplishment of such important objects, have been presented to the view of congress. The act authorising the receipt of treasury notes in payment of subscriptions to a public loan, was passed, I fear, too late to answer the purpose for which it was designed. It promises at this time little relief, either as an instrument to make money, or to absorb the claims for treasury notes, which are daily becoming due. From this cause, and from other obvious causes, the dividend on the funded debt has not been punctually paid; a large amount of treasury notes have already been dishonored, and the hope of preventing further injury and reproach, in transacting the business of the treasury, is too visionary to afford a moment's consolation.

The actual condition of the treasury, thus described, will serve to indicate the state of the public credit. Public credit depends essentially upon public opinion. The usual test of public credit is, indeed the value of the public debt. The faculty of borrowing money is not a test of public credit for a faithless government, like a desperate individual, has only to increase the premium, according to the exigency, in order to secure a loan. Thus public opinion, manifested in every form, and in every direction, hardly permit us, at the present juncture, to speak of the existence of public credit; and yet, it is not impossible that the government, in the resources of its patronage and its pledges, might find the means of tempting the rich and the avaricious to supply its immediate wants. But when the wants of to-day are supplied, what is the new expedient, that shall supply the wants of to-morrow? If it is now a charter of incorporation, it may then be a grant of land; but, after all, the immeasurable tracts of the western wild, would be exhausted in successive efforts to obtain pecuniary aids and still leave the government necessitous, unless the foundations of public credit were re-established and maintained. In the measures, therefore, which it has been my duty to suggest, I have endeavored to introduce a permanent plan for reviving the public credit; of which the facility of borrowing money in anticipation of settled and productive revenues, is only an incident, although it is an incident as durable as the plan itself. The outline seemed to embrace whatever was requisite, to leave no doubt upon the power and the disposition of the government, in relation to its pecuniary engagements; to diminish, and not to augment the amount of the public debt in the hands of individuals, and to create general confidence, rather by the manner of treating the claims of the present class of creditors, than by the manner of conciliating the favor of a new class.

With these explanatory remarks, sir, I proceed to answer, specially, the questions which you have proposed.

I. I am of opinion, that a considerable issue of treasury notes, with the quality of being receivable in subscriptions to a national bank, will have an injurious effect upon the credit of the government, and also upon the prospects of a loan for 1815.

Because, it will confer, gratuitously, an advantage upon a class of new creditors, over the present creditors of the government standing on a footing of at least equal merit.

Because, it will excite general dissatisfaction among the present holders of the public debt; and general distrust among the capitalists, who are accustomed to advance their money to the government.

Because, a quality of subscribing to the national bank attached to treasury notes exclusively, will tend to depreciate the value of all public debt not possessing that quality; and whatever depreciates the value of the public debt, in this way, must necessarily impair the public credit.

Because, the specie capital of the citizens of the United States, so far as it may be deemed applicable to investments in the public stocks, has already, in a great measure, been so vested; the holders of the present debt will be unable to become subscribers to the bank (if that object should, eventually, prove desirable) without selling their stock at a depreciated rate, in order to procure the whole amount of their subscriptions in treasury notes; and a general depression in the value of the public debt will inevitably ensue.

Because, the very proposition of making a considerable issue of treasury notes, even with the quality of being subscribed to a national bank, can only be regarded as an experiment, on which it seems dangerous to rely; the treasury notes must be purchased at par, with money; a new set of creditors are to be created; it may, or it may not, be deemed an object of speculation by the money holders, to subscribe to the bank; the result of the experiment cannot be ascertained, until it will be too late to provide a remedy in the case of failure; while the credit of the government will be affected, by every circumstance, which keeps the efficacy of its fiscal operations in suspense or doubt.

Because, the prospect of a loan for the year 1815, without the aid of a bank, is faint and unpromising; except, perhaps, so far as the pledge of a specific tax may succeed; and then, it must be recollected, that a considerable supply of money will be required, for the prosecution of the war, beyond the whole amount of the taxes to be levied.

Because, if the loan for the year 1815 be made to depend upon the issue of treasury notes, subscribed to the national bank, it will probably fail for the reasons which have already been suggested; and if the loan be independent of that operation, a considerable issue of treasury notes, for the purpose of creating a bank capital, must, it is believed, deprive the government of every chance of raising money in any other manner.

II. I am of opinion that it will be extremely difficult, if not impracticable, to get 44 millions of treasury notes (forming, with 6 millions of specie, the capital of a national bank) into circulation, with or without depreciation.

Because, if the subscription to the bank becomes an object of speculation, the treasury notes will probably be purchased at the treasury and at the loan offices, and never pass into circulation at all.

Because, whatever portion of the treasury notes might pass into circulation, would be speedily withdrawn, by the speculators in the subscription to the bank, after arts had been employed to depreciate their value.

Because, it is not believed, that in the present state of the public credit, 44,000,000 of treasury notes can be sent into circulation. The only difference between the treasury notes now issued, and dishonored, consists in the subscribable quality; but reasons have been already assigned for an opinion, that this difference does not afford such confidence in the experiment, as seems requisite to justify a reliance upon it, for accomplishing some of the most interesting objects of the government.

I must beg you, sir, to pardon the haste with which I have written these general answers to your enquiries. But knowing the importance of time; and feeling a desire to avoid every appearance of contributing to the loss of a moment, I have chosen rather to rest upon the intelligence and candor of the committee, than to enter upon a more labored investigation of the subject referred to me.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, sir, your most obedient servant,

A. J. DALLAS.

Events of the War.

MISCELLANEOUS.

FOREIGN NEWS.—The despatch vessel Chauncey, has arrived at New York from Ostend, which she left Nov. 1, and brings very late and highly important intelligence. The following summary with the articles below inserted at length, present the leading features. We have differed a little from our usual mode of separating the things that concern us, immediately, from those that belong to Europe, especially, because the affairs of that continent may have a powerful effect on our own.

A passenger in the Chauncey verbally states, "that the congress at Vienna had broken up—that Great Britain was sending 80,000 men to Belgium—that another continental war was daily expected—and that it was probable a peace would be concluded between Great Britain and the United States." These general statements are not fully supported by the details given. Lord Hill had not left England, but was expected to be ordered to the continent. News of the capture of Washington, and of the defeats at Baltimore, Plattsburg and on Champlain, had reached London—the three latter served as dampers to the former; for which Lord Wellington, at Paris, prepared a splendid entertainment inviting all the foreign ministers, &c. not one of whom attended. The Gothic conduct of the British in destroying our capitol, &c. has excited an universal sentiment of horror, except among those who, like our own jacobins, have no rule of conduct but to justify whatsoever they may or can do. The "glorious news" of the capture of Washington was translated into the French, German, and Italian languages, and many thousand copies sent to the continent.

Sir E. Pakenham is ordered to America to supply the place of Gen. Ross—he is a lieutenant-general. "It is reported that Sir Geo. Prevost is ordered home." A very hot press took place on the Thames in the night of Oct. 3, and 800 men were kidnapped—the alleged purpose was to enable the admiralty to man certain vessels "to chase away or capture American privateers, which are occasioning such general destruction to the trade!" A London paper of Oct. 6, says, that the Wasp in her affair with the Avon did not lose a man [she lost two] and had only one wounded; and adds, "she has since sent a cartel into Plymouth, with a challenge to engage any two brigs in his majesty's service!" The Chesapeake frigate had arrived with 800 prisoners, who were marched to Dartmouth. We notice the forwarding of some small bodies of troops to America, chiefly recruits for the regiments now here. The expedition that sailed from Plymouth (probably about 1000 men) some time ago, it is intimated is destined for New Orleans. The London papers complain grievously that American privateers have been fitted out in France. Mr. Crocker, (secretary to the admiralty) has gone to Paris to ascertain the facts respecting them, and to remonstrate as the case may appear. Prevost's force at Plattsburg is acknowledged at 14 or 15,000 men—his loss 1000, and the expense of the expedition £500,000 sterling. They feel excessively sore at his defeat. A French paper says that the English are to occupy the Floridas and Louisiana, with the consent of Spain, and that 9000 Spanish troops were preparing to sail for America—north or south not stated, probably for the Rio del Plata.

OF THE NEGOCIATION at Ghent we have a great mass of paragraphs and reports. It appears certain that the negotiation had not been broken off, and that our commissioners did not expect to return home this winter. They are, individually, on the best terms with the British commissioners, feasting and treating each other with great civility; and some hope may be indulged, especially if the congress at Vienna shall settle a peace for Europe, that we shall have one. But from the confused accounts it is impossible to gather the truth. It is said, that the Duke Constantine of Russia, brother of the emperor, and two secretaries of legation, have appeared at Ghent.

The following, published in a Wilmington (Del.) paper, and accepted as the substance of letters from Mr. Bayard, is perhaps more worthy of credit than any opinion we can form from what we have seen and heard.

We understand that letters were received in town yesterday, dated Ghent the 26th of October.

The negotiations were still pending; but in the opinion of our commissioners, with views on the part of the British government, exclusively to her own purposes, and not with any direct intention of making peace between the two countries.

England was anxious to see the campaign closed in this country, and would be regulated in her demands by the good or ill fortune which should attend her prospects here. She would also be disposed to wait the issue of the congress at Vienna, before she would close the negotiation one way or the other.

Our commissioners did not expect to return before spring.

There was a great probability that there would be a conflict between France and England for the Netherlands.

The National Intelligencer of Wednesday last says—"We are sorry we cannot gratify our readers to day with any statement of the contents of the despatches just received from Ghent, which have not yet transpired."

We have been favored, however, with the perusal of a private letter from one of our ministers, dated the 25th ult. which speaks with uncertainty of the time of their departure from Ghent, and with equal uncertainty of the state of affairs on the continent.

The congress at Vienna is said to have been postponed to the 1st of Nov. In the mean time M. Talleyrand has, it is said, presented a memorial to the envoys to that congress, protesting against the aggrandizement of other powers, and claiming on their part the same moderation which France is asserted to have manifested; in other words, claiming as to other powers the same return, as France has made, to the condition of 1792.

From what we can learn, it would be highly injudicious for our government or people to calculate on any advantages, to result to our interests, from events to happen across the Atlantic.

CONGRESS AT VIENNA.—The various reports of things belonging, or said to belong to the affairs of this meeting and that at Ghent, would fill our sheet. It has been a sore task to read the whole to attempt to discover truth—but we gather only a little. It is ascertained however that Talleyrand has protested "against the assemblage of troops and against the partition of territory proposed by Great Britain." It is also stated that the different sovereigns who had visited Vienna to attend the congress had retired, leaving their ministers to proceed in the business. There is considerable talk about maritime rights, and we trust that the law of nations will be fixed at this assembly. But nothing is certainly known, and it is useless to fill our paper, devoted to record, with the speculations of individuals.

VARIOUS ARTICLES.

The London Statesman asks, "Is it quite clear, that the expedition to Washington will meet universal approbation? Is it certain, that the destruction of the public edifices for destruction-sake alone, is a legitimate method of warfare?" The editor compares these ravages with the conduct of the buccanniers of old—and says, "Willingly could we throw a veil of oblivion over our transactions at Washington. The Cossacks spared Paris, but we spared not the Capital of America." He condemns the ministerial papers for justifying the conduct of general Ross, &c.

A letter from Europe received in Baltimore, says, "The conflagration of Washington has done more to open the eyes of Europe upon one subject, and upon the real conduct and character of our enemy than any event of the last twenty years. The whole continent is roused into indignation at it; the Gazettes of France have uttered one consentaneous expression of horror at this most savage warfare; and even some of the English prints have expressed their decided disapprobation in terms which does credit to their conductors."

Paris, Oct. 16.—Several of our journals have openly condemned the conduct of the English at Washington. The Gazette is the only paper that has, in that respect, contradicted the public opinion. According to its own ideas "the public edifices of a country belongs to the conqueror who renders himself master of them." This is a new maxim which was wanted to the rights of men, and of which no celebrated publishers who wrote upon this important subject had as yet thought of. Thus the general who should enter Rome by force of arms might blow up St. Peter's Church and the Pantheon. The right of war authorises only the destruction of fortresses, and of such establishments as contribute to the military strength of the enemy, and can afford him means of resistance. Civil establishments and intended for public use have always been respected by generals who have observed the rights of men, too much forgotten in Europe long since.

The stuff of the following may be traced immediately to our own chaste gazettes—

London Oct. 14.—We have this morning received New York papers to the 4th ult. brought to Plymouth by a Spanish brig, which arrived there on Wednesday. Their contents are interesting.

The official account of the capture of Washington is creditable to our troops.—The only acts of robbery and pilfering of private property are admitted to have been perpetrated by their own countrymen.

The members of the government have again made their appearance at Washington, and now that nothing is left to defend, they are filling the place with troops.

The expectation is very general throughout America, that Madison's speech to congress on the 19th Sept. will convey his resignation. Rufus King is mentioned as likely to be his successor.

From these papers it would appear that the Americans have no hope of success in any quarter. They expect every day to hear of a large British force having attacked and destroyed Sackett's Harbor.—Nor do they seem to have any resources, or even hopes left: for it is now admitted, that no loan can be obtained by the government;—and in consequence, the different states are attempting to negotiate individual loans for their own separate defence. How this is to be effected it is impossible to conceive; for all business is at a stand, and no money in circulation; even the banks of New York and Philadelphia have stopped all payments in specie, and an attempt is made by some of the merchants to induce the public to receive their paper in payments.

October 23.—Several millions of buck-shot are shipping at Portsmouth in the Leonidas frigate, which Americans have used so dexterously, from their being accustomed to wild fowl shooting. By rifles in such hands, England has to mourn the loss of a loss.

Miscellanies.—The works on the fortified places along the banks of the Danube, &c. are continued with great activity. The Russian ships of war, from England, have arrived in the Baltic. Sweden has refused to give up Pomerania to Denmark until the expense of her war against Norway is paid. There has been a serious riot at Nottingham (Eng.)—and a battle between the manufacturers and the civil officers, in which the former were defeated with two killed. Some parts of Ireland are out of "the king's peace." Bonaparte gave a great fete to his troops at Elba, on the 15th and 16th August, and they cried out "long live the emperor!" He is said to have had a correspondence with Austria to obtain his wife, who seems much attached to his fortunes. The congress at Vienna, it is stated, is to fix his permanent residence; that at Elba being only provisionary. Various troubles in Spain are spoken of. A spirit of revolution exists; and open rebellion prevails in Navarre. Troops were marching to quell it. Every thing seems in the worst state; and we would hope that Ferdinand, the ungrateful, totters on his throne—the stupid creature is fit for nothing but a convent. A civil war is the universal expectation.—The French appear to hate the English most cordially, and to talk of a war with them or a new revolution. Camps are forming, and troops marching, and armies collecting in various parts, as though the sword was about to leap from its scabbard, and involve Europe again in general war. The amicable relations of Russia and Denmark are expected to be restored. By a circular letter from the British chancellor of the exchequer to the members of parliament, it appears that important things will engage its attention immediately after its meeting (Nov. 8.) Naples and Saxony seem to present bones of contention. Ferdinand would get back his kingdom, and the allies would divide Saxony. The princess of Wales has arrived at Paris, instead of going to Italy,

CHARACTERISTIC ANECDOTE. The following occurred as nearly as possible in the words stated a few days ago, in a lottery and exchange office where the editor of the REGISTER happened to be—

A sailor, in due trim, entered the office and demanded, "if they exchanged United States bank notes?" On being requested to exhibit them, he pulled out his pocket-book, examined all its partitions, in each of which was money, but not the "bank notes" sought for. He then rammed both hands into his trousers' pockets, and drew out handfuls of notes ruffled into wads, with no better success—the waistcoat pockets were searched in the same way, and though full of money the notes required were missing: when as the last resort he impatiently put his hands into his jacket-pockets, out of one of which he drew two treasury notes for $100 each, and out of the other a like note for the same amount, squeezed and rumped in a seaman-like manner. On its being observed that he carried his money too carelessly and might lose it, he said—And 'spose I do, sir, where's the odds? I've only got to go and take some more of 'em." He was one of PERRY's men, and had just received his share of the fleet captured on Erie.

PROCLAMATION.

To the free colored inhabitants of Louisiana.

Through a mistaken policy you have heretofore been deprived of a participation in the glorious struggle for national rights in which our country is engaged. This no longer shall exist.

As sons of freedom, you are now called upon to defend our most inestimable blessing. As Americans, your country looks with confidence to her adopted children, for a valorous support, as a faithful return for the advantages enjoyed under her mild and equitable government. As fathers, husbands and brothers, you are summoned to rally round the standard of the Eagle, to defend all which is dear in existence.

Your country, although calling for your exertions, does not wish you to engage in her cause, without amply remunerating you for the services rendered. Your intelligent minds are not to be led away by false representations.—Your love of honor would cause you to despise the man who should attempt to deceive you. In the sincerity of a soldier, and the language of truth I address you.

To every noble hearted, generous, freeman of color, volunteering to serve during the present contest with Great Britain, and no longer, there will be paid the same bounty in money and lands, now received by the white soldiers of the U. States, viz. $124 in money, and 160 acres of land. The non-commissioned officers and privates will also be entitled to the same monthly pay and daily rations, and clothes furnished to any American soldier.

On enrolling yourselves in companies, the major-general commanding will select officers for your government, from your white fellow citizens. Your non-commissioned officers will be appointed from among yourselves.

Due regard will be paid to the feelings of freemen and soldiers. You will not, by being associated with white men in the same corps, be exposed to improper comparisons or unjust sarcasm. As a distinct, independent battalion or regiment, pursuing the path of glory, you will, undivided, receive the applause and gratitude of your countrymen.

To assure you of the sincerity of my intentions and my anxiety to engage your invaluable services to our country, I have communicated my wishes to the governor of Louisiana, who is fully informed as to the manner of enrolment, and will give you every necessary information on the subject of this address.

Just received, and offered for sale, about THREE TONS of round SHOT, consisting of 6, 9, 12, 18, 24, and 32 lbs. very handsome, being a small proportion which were fired from his Britannic majesty's ships, on the unoffending inhabitants of Stonington, in the recent brilliant attack on that place. New-York, November 19.

SMUGGLING.—A six horse waggon laden with British goods, was seized in the streets of New Haven, on the 14th inst. and other goods to the value of $30,000 were found secreted in a barn near Stonington, a few days ago, by the surveyor of that port. These lots were probably from "his majesty's" smugglers in the sound.

This nefarious business has greatly contributed to the scarcity of specie; for that, also, is smuggled off to pay for the goods smuggled in. This left-handed trade is doing us serious injury, totally changing the relations of trade.

THE NIAGARA.—The Canadian papers grumble as much at the result of the campaign on the Niagara frontier as some of our own. One of them says:—"The arrival of the troops from the continent of Europe had raised so high the expectations of all, that the result of the campaign were expected to have been far different from what they had proved hitherto."

NEW-YORK is defended by five hundred and seventy pieces of battering cannon and mortars, besides the pieces on board the President frigate and gun-boats and a formidable park of field artillery—in all not less than 900 pieces of ordnance. To which will soon be added the steam battery.

AMELIA ISLAND. A very extensive and profitable trade—an honest trade—is carried on between this place and the southern states; and the products of our soil, to a large amount, are there exchanged for the foreign goods required, though the passages are closely watched by the enemy.

FULTON THE FIRST.—From the N. Y. National Advocate, Nov. 22.—Yesterday morning the steam vessel, Fulton the First, was moved from the wharf of Messrs. Brown's, in the East river, to the works of Mr. Fulton on the North river, to receive her machinery, which operation was performed by fastening the steam-boat car of Neptune to her larboard, and the steam boat Fulton to the starboard side. Both engines being put in motion at the same time, they towed her through the water from three and an half to four miles an hour. Considering the power which the two steam boats consume in driving themselves, there could not be more than the power of 25 or 40 horses applied to drive the steam vessel. But as her steam engine will possess a power equal to 100 horses, there cannot now be a doubt that she will run from four to five miles an hour when finished—stem any of our tides, and take any position in a calm. Every thing thus far favors the best hopes which have been entertained of this invention.

VIRGINIA MILITIA.—Message from the governor to the house of delegates, October 18, 1814.—The secretary of war, having given an assurance, that the general government will reimburse this state the expense attending the militia, who have been called into the service of the United States, has, as an earnest of this promise, forwarded 100,000 dollars in treasury notes. They were immediately deposited with the treasurer for safe keeping. I forebore to mention it an earlier day, hoping I could commute them for bank notes. Being, however, disappointed, in that expectation, it has become necessary to present the subject to the legislature. I suggest the propriety of a law or resolution, directing them to be officially received by the treasurer, and to be disposed of, as to the legislature shall seem best.

JAMES BARBOUR.

VIRGINIA LEGISLATURE.—On Thursday last, (says the Richmond Enquirer of November 19,) the resolutions which had been sent to the senate respecting the negotiations at Ghent, were returned to the house of delegates in the following shape:

"The legislature of Virginia, sensibly alive to the blessings of peace, and anxious for its restoration upon just and honorable terms, are nevertheless ready at all times to encounter war, with all its privations and horrors, in preference to a sacrifice of national rights or national honor. Under the influence of these sentiments, they hailed the declaration of the prince regent to his parliament, professing a desire for the restoration of peace with the United States, upon terms honorable to both nations, as the harbinger of the speedy return of that inestimable blessing. It is however with mingled emotions of indignation and regret, they perceive, in the terms proposed by the commissioners at Ghent, as the basis of negotiation with the United States, an anxious solicitude on the part of the enemy for a continuation of the war, by the assertion of arrogant pretensions, extravagant in themselves, insulting to our national character, and subversive even of the rights and sovereignty of the United States. Under such circumstances and at such a crisis, silence on the part of the legislature might be construed into apathy or timidity: Therefore,

"Resolved unanimously, as the opinion of this legislature, that a just and honorable peace is only to be obtained by a vigorous prosecution of the war. And that for that purpose, the proper authorities should call into immediate and active operation all the energies and resources of the United States."

It is proper to state that this preamble and resolution passed the senate unanimously.

Several amendments were moved in the house of delegates which were rejected. Among these, a motion to strike out the word "arrogant" which was negatived, ayes 33, noes 123—Also, a motion to strike out the preamble was rejected, ayes 113, noes 30—principally upon the ground that it placed any reliance upon the word of the prince regent, as "the harbinger" of peace.

The resolution itself was passed unanimously, ayes 144.

The loan-bill has passed both branches, in conformity with the propositions of the Farmers' Bank, as stated in our last.

Yesterday the house of delegates were engaged upon Mr. Stevenson's resolution for a more permanent corps of troops—which was finally adopted in the following shape:—ayes 83, noes 59.

"Resolved, That it is expedient to raise thousand men, to be placed under the orders and control of the general government, as well for the further and more vigorous prosecution of this war as for the defence of this commonwealth, to serve years, or during the war:—Provided, That the government of the United States shall declare that the said troops shall be paid, clothed and subsisted by and at the expence of the United States."

It was avowed by the friends of this proposition, that not a man was to be procured until the acceptance of the general government had been obtained.

and that the troops were to be under the complete jurisdiction of the United States.

NORTH CAROLINA—The legislature of North Carolina convened at Raleigh, on the 21st inst. The following resolution preceded by some patriotic remarks, was introduced by Mr. PORTER, of Rutherford, and passed unanimously.

Resolved, That the most efficient measures be adopted by this general assembly to aid the general government in a vigorous prosecution of the war against Great Britain and her allies

Mr. DALLAS' letter, inserted in the congressional proceedings, will be read with deep anxiety. Much as we lament the state of the treasury and the effect that his exposition of it must have upon the credit that was left it, we thank the gentleman for the frankness and firmness with which he has met the enquiries of the committee.* We trust it may turn the attention of congress from eternal spouting to acting—from dilly dally expedients, and temporary contrivances, to decisive and permanent measures. They have been in session between two and three months, and done nothing; though convoked at an extraordinary period, for the dispatch of extraordinary business. It will not do—the people are disgusted, and the nation will be ruined if such a course is pursued a little longer. These are not words of course. I believe them in their fullest latitude.—But if they meet the crisis boldly, the people will support them in any thing they can constitutionally devise, to meet the emergencies of the times. The failure of the public credit is entirely owing to the want of taxes that would have been cheerfully paid, and which ought to have been levied long ago.

There is a rumor that Mr. Dallas will resign. We hope not. He seems just such a man as the people want.

MILITARY.

Captain Samuel T. Dyson, of the United States artillery, is dismissed from the service of the United States, for "shamefully abandoning and destroying fort Warburton, on the approach of the enemy."

The anniversary of the evacuation of New York by the British in 1793, was celebrated in great style on the 25th ult. The troops under arms were 12,000, collected at one point.

We have a report from New Orleans stating that a new governor had arrived at Pensacola, who had ordered off the British. They have been very quiet on the coast since the drubbing they got at Mobile.

Daniel Parker, late chief clerk of the war department, has been appointed adjutant and inspector-general in the army.

It appears that the greater part of the New-York and Pennsylvania militia called out for the defence of the maritime frontier have been dismissed.

Extract of a letter from Arthur Sinclair, Esq. captain commanding the U. S. naval force on the Upper Lakes, to the secretary of the navy, dated "Off Erie, 30th November, 1814.

"Thinking it probable information will not reach you before this of general McArthur's excursion into Canada, I have the satisfaction to inform you, that by the cartel Lady Prevost, which vessel has just returned from landing prisoners at Long Point, I have learned of his having visited that post, where he was opposed by five or six hundred militia, who had entrenched themselves. He charged their works and captured more than one half of them. He passed down as low as the Grand River on his way to join general Izard, at Fort Erie; but hearing of the destruction of that post, and the evacuation of the province by our army, he returned to Detroit.

"The citizens on the other side speak in high terms of his generous and humane conduct in his whole route through the country."

NAVAL.

The Norfolk transport, a great ship that lately sailed from England, is said to have had on board 10,000 suits of clothing, "supposed for the North American Indians, and an immense quantity of war-like instruments [such as tomahawks and scalping knives] adapted for their use."

As observed in our last, many privateers are fitting out to the eastward—among them is one called the "Sine qua non." We wish her as good luck as her name deserves.

A passenger in the Chauncey informs that the privateer General Armstrong, of N. York, was attacked in the port of Fayal, where she had gone for water, by the boats of a British frigate, and succeeded in beating them off and killed and wounded upwards of 100 of their crews. The frigate then ran into Fayal roads, and was preparing to range up alongside of the Armstrong, when the crew perceiving she must fall into the hands of the enemy, deserted her and blew her up.

The editor of the Times regrets that our new frigate JAVIA at Baltimore, was hauled so far up the head of the harbor, as to prevent sir Thomas Hardy from destroying her. He consoles himself with having, during the attack on Baltimore, seen her mast-heads.

Sir Thomas may have had the consolation of seeing the JAVIA—but she had not been moved on his account. She lay close by the wharf where she was launched, where she had always laid and yet lies.—The mast-heads, however, he did not see—because she had no masts.

A heavy firing of two hours continuance, was heard off Charleston, on the 21st ult. If it be true that the Wasp was on that coast, we fear she has been captured by the Lacedemonian frigate. If Blakely did attempt to fight her, it must have been under the most desperate resolutions, and the havoc terrible.

The following from a Paris paper of the 25th was posted at Lloyd's Coffe House—London, Sept. 30:

"The True Blooded Yankee, American privateer, has been completely refitted for sea, manned with a crew of 200 men, and sailed from Brest the 21st inst, supposed for the purpose of cruising in the British channel. Her orders are to sink, burn and destroy, and not to capture with the intention of carrying into port."

The British transport ship Sovereign, struck on a rock near the island of St. Paul in the gulf of St. Lawrence, on the 18th October, and was totally lost. She was laden with stores, and had on board 9 officers, 186 soldiers, some women and children, and 19 seamen; in all 239 persons; of whom only thirty seven were saved, by getting on the island, from whence they were taken off two days afterwards, in a distressing condition. A number of transports, with about 1500 men and great quantities of stores, arrived at Quebec from the 26th to the 29th Oct.

There is a report that the British sloop of war Florida, (late U. S. sloop Frolic) has foundered off Bermuda, every soul perishing.

The prize goods brought in the Prince of Neufchatel consisted of 530 packages British dry goods, 177 cases, and 26 tierces olive oil, &c. Terms of sale—specie.

bloody flag of the Avon paid its homage to the "striped hunting" of the Wasp. In sinking the Reindeer and the Avon, both of so nearly her force that either must be considered a "fair fight," we had only 6 killed and 26 wounded—the British joint loss was 34 killed and 75 wounded. The Avon was the vessel that had behaved so impudently in the Delaware in 1810, while British vessels were interdicted our waters in consequence of the insolence of their officers. She then carried 18 thirty-two pound carronades, besides bow and stern guns. Some of her shot that came on board the Wasp were of that weight; and, a "British official" to the contrary, there was little if any difference between the force of the two vessels. It would be well if the impertinent fellow who commanded the Avon in 1810 should also have had the command when Blakely put her pride in the "cellar."

Minutes of the action between the United States' ship Wasp, J. Blakely, Esq. commander, and his Britannic majesty's sloop of war —; lat. 47, 30, long. 11, on 1st Sept. 1814.

At 7 o'clock, called all hands to quarters and prepared for action; 7 h. 26 m. hoisted an American jack at the fore, and pendant at the main; 7 h. 30 m. set the mainsail; 7 h. 34 m. perceived the chase making signals with lights, &c.; 7 h. 45 m. set the mizen and hoisted an American ensign at the peak; 7 h. 48 m. hoisted a light at the peak, and brailed up the mizen; 7 h. 54 m. set the mizen to come up with the chase; 8 h. 3 m. the chase hauled down his lights; 8 h. 7 m. burned a blue light on the fore-castle; 8 h. 17 m. set the flying-jib; 8 h. 34 m. hauled down the light at the peak; 8 h. 38 m. the chase fired a gun from his stern port; 8 h. 55 m. hauled up the mainsail; 9 h. 15 m. set the mainsail; 9 h. 18 m. the chase fired a gun to leeward; 9 h. 20 m. being then on the weather quarter of the chase, he hailed and enquired "what ship is that?"—not answered, but asked "what brig is that?"—he replied, "his majesty's brig —;" blowing fresh, the name was not distinctly understood. He again hailed and asked "what ship is that," when he was told to heave to and he would be informed. He repeated his question, and was answered to the same effect. Mr. Carr was then sent forward to order him to heave to, which he declined doing; at 9 h. 25 m. the enemy set his fore-topmast studdingsail; at 26 minutes after 9, fired the 12 pound carronade to make him heave to; when the enemy commenced action by firing his larboard guns. We then kept away, ran under his lee, and 29 minutes after 9 commenced the action. At 10 o'clock ordered the men to cease firing, and hailed the enemy to know if he had surrendered; no answer was returned to this—he resumed his fire and we continued ours; 10 h. 10 m. manned our starboard guns and fired three or four of them, when orders were again given to cease firing; 10 h. 12 m. hailed the enemy, "have you surrendered," when they answered in the affirmative. We were on the eve of taking possession, when a sail was descried close on board of us—orders were then given to clear the ship for action, which was promptly executed. We were then on the point of wearing to engage the second, which we perceived to be a brig of war, when, at 26 minutes after 10, discovered two more sails, one astern, the other one point on our lee quarter, standing for us; orders were then given to stand from the strange sails. The first sail seen approached within pistol shot, fired a broadside, and cut away one of our lower main cross trees, and did other damage, and immediately stood for the other two sails last discovered. Continued on a course.

Sept. 12th, brig Three Brothers, Thos. Clark master, John Clark owner, 7 men, 114 43-94 tons, two 3 pounders, laden with wine and barrilla, belonging to Whidby, from Lanzarote, 16 days out, bound to London, taken in lat. 38 deg. 2 min. N. long. 14 deg. 58 min. W. scuttled her.

Sept. 14th, brig Bacchus, Wm. Stickens master, Richard W. Sleat and Thos. Read owners, 11 men, 169 29-94 tons, two 4 pounders, laden with fish, belonging to Poole, from Newfoundland, 24 days out, bound to Gibraltar, taken in lat. 37 deg. 22 m. N. long. 14 deg. 33 min. W. scuttled her.

Sept. 21, brig Atalanta, Robert Jackson master, George Salkeld, Thomas Barclay, and George Barclay owners, 19 men, 258 tons, 2 long nine-pounders and 6 nine-pound gunnades, laden with wine, brandy and silks, belonging to Liverpool, from Bordeaux, 9 days out, bound to Pensacola, taken in lat. 33 deg. 12 min. N. long. 14 deg. 56 min. W. sent her to the United States.

Newbern, N. C. Nov. 12. Arrived at this place the Fox, of Baltimore, a tender to his B. M. ship Ramilies, with midshipman Crawford and seven British seamen on board, left the Chesapeake on the 15th ult. with a convoy under the command of admiral Malcolm, the Royal Oak—the tender parted company, in a squall on the night of the 16th. Ignorant of the destination of the convoy, the tender made the best of her way for Bermuda; on the evening of the 17th the tender lost her compass by a break of the sea over her.—And being left without the means of directing her course, made for the first land she could reach, met with very severe weather, and suffered much for want of provisions, and water, on the 4th of November saw two brigs under the land, supposed to be British vessels, standing towards them, got aground on Ocracoke bar. In that situation the revenue cutter's boat boarded the tender, and the people surrendered themselves as prisoners.

The following paragraphs were omitted in their proper place, at the conclusion of the proceedings of congress, page 203, until too late to remedy the defect without a great loss of time in over-running the pages:

[The business of the bank lies dead in the house—it is thought it may be revived in the senate.]

The house then took up the tax bills. The amendment made in committee of the whole, so as to impose a tax of 20 cents per gallon on spirits distilled, was confirmed 107 to 41. Yeas and nays hereafter. The bill was therefore passed and sent to the senate, as was the bill for laying a tax on carriages and several miscellaneous articles.

Wednesday, November 30.—The house passed to a third reading the two tax bills, and afterwards resolved itself into a committee of the whole on the bill from the senate authorising a draft of 80,000 militia for the defence of the frontier, and on the bill for filling the regular army by a classification of the free male population.

The bills were no more than read through, when the house being thin, the committee rose, reported and adjourned.

The despatches from Ghent were laid before congress on Thursday—their great length prevents the possibility of their insertion in this number. The editor of the National Intelligencer observes that he is "compelled to believe the prospect of pacification is very faint." The sine qua non was, however, apparently abandoned.

Naval Report.

Navy Department, Nov. 15, 1814.

SIR—In obedience to the resolution of the senate, passed on the 18th of March last, directing the secretary of the navy to devise and digest a system for the better organization of the navy of the United States, I have now the honor to report the following system, with such prefatory observations as appear to me pertinent to the occasion.

It has been affirmed and cannot be denied, that imperfections exist in the civil administration of the naval establishment; hence it has been inferred, that a radical change of system can alone remedy the evils.

Legislative wisdom will readily discriminate between the constituent principles upon which the present establishment is predicated, and has thus far prospered, and the defects which result from the absence of an intelligent, practical auxiliary agency, qualified to digest, arrange, and enforce a proper system of detailed regulations, calculated to ensure the judicious and faithful application of public monies; a strict accountability in the expenditure of supplies; and a rigid execution of the duties enjoined on all the officers and agents connected with the establishment.

Profusion, waste and abuse, are the inherent offspring of all extensive public institutions; and if we occasionally perceive these evils in some degree, in the naval establishment of the U. States, we are not thence to infer their absence from similar establishments in other countries, where naval science and experience may be presumed to have provided greater safe-guards, and more numerous, skilful, and vigilant agencies.

But regulations, however correct and adequate to the end, become nugatory, or worse, unless the authority and the means are co-extensive, and competent to enforce the execution, or punish the violation thereof. This may account for the non-existence of many wholesome regulations in the civil administration of the navy of the United States; and for the imperfect execution of those which exist. Breaches of the latter too frequently escape with impunity, from the impossibility of the head of the department taking cognizance of all the multifarious concerns of the establishment. It is problematical, however, whether the excess may not be more injurious than the deficiency of regulation; in the former case, responsibility may be lost in the maze and mass of detail and multiplied agency, whilst in the latter, general instruction, and sound discretion, not unfrequently ensure greater success and responsibility.

That the duties enjoined, or which necessarily devolve upon the secretary of the navy, particularly during a period of active and diversified hostility, are beyond the powers of any individual to discharge to the best advantage, cannot be doubted, although by great labor and assiduity, with adequate professional qualifications, he may possibly, execute the general and most essential branches of duty with tolerable success.

In the progress of reform, whilst we pay due respect to that system, the establishment of which has attained the greatest celebrity, more, it is believed, from its magnitude and power, than from the excellence of its civil administration, we ought not to lose sight of its palpable and acknowledged defects; nor of those features in our own system, to which, in no trivial degree, the exalted reputation of our infant navy may be attributed.

That our navy is not excelled in any thing which constitutes efficiency, perfect equipments, and general good qualities, it is believed, will be admitted. That our seamen are better paid, fed, and accommodated, is no less true. That all the imported, and many of the domestic articles of equipment, and of consumption in the service, are exceedingly enhanced; that the wages of mechanical labor is more than double that which is paid by Great Britain; that our expenditure is greatly increased by the interruption to navigable transportation, and the great extent of the local service, is equally obvious. Yet, under all these circumstances, it is demonstrable, that upon a comparison of an equal quantity of tonnage and number of guns and men, or in proportion to the number of men alone, our naval expenditure is considerably less than that for the navy of G. Britain, in which "one hundred and forty five thousand men are employed, at an expense of more than 20 millions of pounds sterling annually."

The local service is, from its scattered, irregular, and irresponsible nature, much more expensive and wasteful than that of the regular navy; the more perfect organization of which, and responsibility of command, ensure a more faithful superintendence and accountability. Hence the current expenditure of the service would be an extravagant criterion by which to estimate that of a regular establishment under a judicious system. The force employed in local service, is extended throughout a line of stations from Louisiana to Maine, and from Champlain to Huron, consequently it is weak, is readily to be penetrated, at almost any point on our maritime frontier, by the concentration of a small hostile force; and it is extensive in proportion to its diffusion. Independently of the deleterious nature of this service upon the health and habits of those employed in it, we are, from the present necessity of this system deprived of the service of a body of officers and seamen, sufficient to man thirteen ships of the line, such as the Independence, Washington and Franklin 74's.

When we contemplate the effect which such a force would have, when acting in conjunction upon our own coast and waters, or in squadron, pursuing the commercial fleets of the enemy on the ocean, or in the harbors of his colonies, it is impossible to avoid the conclusion, that our waters would be freed from invasion; our coast from blockade, his military and naval resources intercepted to such a degree as to paralyze his efforts on this continent, supersede the necessity of a vast military establishment, co-extensive with our maritime, Canadian, and Indian frontiers; and our citizens from those harassing, irregular, and inconvenient calls of militia, which the predatory enterprizes of the enemy so frequently produce. In short, according to my conceptions, this cheap and efficient national defence should be adopted as soon as circumstances will admit, and cherished by a well digested, energetic and liberal system, steadily progressing with the population, commerce, and resources of the nation.

The nature, construction and equipment of the ships, which constitute a navy, form the basis of its efficiency, durability and economy, and the most important branch in the civil administration of its affairs. With a view to the reform and extension of the naval establishment of the U. States, their objects ought to command the first place in our attention, combined with such an organization of the civil department, as shall promise the best results.

The defects in this part of the British system have been the theme of criticism and reprehension for many years past. The most minute, laborious and able investigation has from time to time taken place, under the direction and scrutiny of the parliament, yet nothing approximating to radical amendment has been adopted; and the advocates of reform, either from the subtle ramifications of the evil, or the agency of some sinister influence appear to despair of success.

According to the most intelligent writers, supported by well established facts, the deterioration of the British navy, owing to the injudicious selection and combination of incongruous materials in the construction, and the abortive method of preserving, is very alarming; and the diversity in the form, dimensions and proportions, not only of the several rates, but of the numerous distinct classes of the same rate, as well in their hulls as in their masts, sails and equipments, and in a still greater degree in their qualities for combined action, demonstrates the prevalence of caprice and prejudice, instead of science and system. When lord Nelson was off Cadiz, with seventeen or eighteen sail of the line, he had no less than seven different classes of seventy-four gun ships, each requiring different masts, sails, yards, &c. so that if one ship was disabled, the others could not supply her with appropriate stores.

The consequence resulting from this defective organization and want of system are strongly illustrated in the fact, related by a recent professional writer of rank and talents that "out of five hundred and thirty eight ships, &c. in the British navy, now at sea, there are only sixty nine which are, in reality, superior in the discharge of metal or force of blows, but inferior in sailing, to some of the American frigates and that there are but eighteen, which unless in smooth water, are equal to contend with the U. States, leaving four hundred and fifty one, out of five hundred and thirty eight, which are admitted to be incompetent to engage, single handed, with an American frigate."

These facts are encouraging, and serve to show, that although the numerical force of the enemy in ships and men appears to be overwhelming, yet if the aggregate number of officers, seamen and marines which the United States may, even now engage for the public service, was concentrated in eighteen or twenty ships of the line, such as have been recently built, it would place all the ships alluded to, in the quotation just recited, except the eighteen, hors de combat; nor could our enemy protect his commerce and colonies, and combine such a force as would counteract the power and offensive enterprize of an American squadron so truly formidable. With such a force it will be perceived that his host of frigates and smaller vessels would be struck out of the account, or added to the list of our navy, if they came in contact.

These views, it is true, are prospective, but with a stable, judicious and liberal system, the result would be realized at no remote period.

Having noticed these exceptions to the civil administration of the British navy, it is but just to observe, that the organization of the military part of their system is much more perfect.

The regulations and instructions for the service at sea, adopted by order in council, and published in one quarto volume in 1808, are those which now prevail. They are excellent, and afford much matter worthy of incorporation into our system, with such modification as the peculiar circumstances of the service may require.

Of the French naval system the department of construction is universally admitted to be the most perfect in existence, and is well worthy of imitation. The military part of the system, however, is less perfect in practice and not so well adapted to the habits and usages of American seamen as that of the British.

The character of the navy of any nation will be determined by its commercial and navigating enterprise. That of America had surpassed every other, until the unexampled prosperity and rapid extension of its commerce excited the envy, jealousy and hostility of those who could not meet it in fair, equal and friendly competition. The same energy, skill, vigilance and intrepidity which distinguished the commercial navigators of the U. States, characterise the officers and seamen of the navy. The same superiority of construction which gave to its commercial marine the celerity and security for which it is distinguished, may be seen in the American navy, which is truly indigenous and distinct from every other. The independent character of the nation is manifestly visible in the genius of its navy. The classes of our ships, their form, construction, armament and equipment have been tested by experience, and found to have been happily adapted to our circumstances, compelling the enemy either to employ ships of the line against frigates, or to construct a new class of ships. Their efficiency and perfection have extorted the praise of the enemy. The author before quoted says "the carronades I saw on board the U. States' brig Argus were better mounted, and the vessel more complete than those in the British navy, and she was uncommonly well manœuvred."

Our ships are excellent, and all in good condition. The classes are few, and so uniform that without inconvenience the masts, spars and equipments of any one of a class will serve indifferently for any other of the same class. All the new ships of each rate are of the same class, and are absolutely similar in all their equipments, and in the dimensions and proportions of their hulls, masts, spars &c. This strict similarity should be carefully preserved upon every principle of convenience, economy and efficiency.

Timber, which forms an object of much solicitude in Great Britain, deserves the particular attention of the department, the organization of which will doubtless be made to combine the necessary talents and means to provide for every branch of the service, by a reasonable, diligent, and judicious collection in secure and convenient depots, of all the materials which enter into the construction and equipments of ships of war.

When it is considered that one seventy-four gun ship requires two thousand large oak trees, equal to the estimated produce of fifty seven acres, the importance of securing for public use all that valuable species of oak, which is found only on the southern sea-board is sufficiently obvious.

Dock yards, foundries, smitheries and armouries, in safe and eligible situations, are indispensable appendages of so important and growing an establishment. These always collect the best workmen, and a private interest cannot interfere with the execution; the materials and workmanship are better, and the work is performed with more certainty and regularity than by contract with private individuals, whose works in some cases, may be so remote from the seat of demand that the transportation may cost more than the article.

There is another branch of the service, which appears to me to merit the serious deliberation of the legislature, with regard to the establishment of some regular system, by which the voluntary enlistments for the navy may derive occasional reinforcement from the services of those seamen who, pursuing their own private occupations, are exempt, by their itinerant habits, from public service of any kind. In my view there would be nothing incompatible with the free spirit of our free institutions, or the rights of individuals, if registers, with a particular descriptive record, were kept in the several districts, of all the seamen belonging to the U. States, and provision made by law for classing and calling into the public service, in succession, for reasonable stated periods, such portions or classes as the public service might require; and if any individual so called should be absent at the time, the next in succession should perform the tour of duty of the absentee, who should, on his return, be liable to serve his original tour, and his substitute be exempt from his succeeding regular tour of duty.

In the military service, should the ranks not be filled by recruits, the deficiency of regular force may be filled up by drafts of militia, to assemble at a given time and place; not so in the naval service, it depends exclusively upon voluntary enlistments, upon which there is no reliance for any given object, at any time or place. Hence the most important expeditions may utterly fail, though every possible exertion shall have been made to carry them into effect.

If we examine with due attention, the nature, extent and importance of the objects involved in the administration of the naval affairs, and contemplate, in the history of ages past, the unsuccessful, though indefatigable labors of legislation, science and genius to perfect the system, we may learn to appreciate with more accuracy, and cherish with more liberality, the life of study, observation and experience, required to arrive even at mod-rate attainments in a science, which, though familiar in the estimation of all, is the most complicated, critical and interesting; that has ever engaged the attention or influenced the destinies of nations. My sole object is to invite the attention and liberality of the national councils, to the requisite talents and qualifications, for cherishing and rearing to maturity, the vigorous plant around which are entwined the affections and confidence of the country.

All these objects appear to me to be intimately connected with the revision of the civil administration of our naval affairs, the executive branch of which should be conducted by persons of large views, collectively combining all the practical knowledge and professional intelligence, which those important, diversified and comprehensive subjects, obviously require.

We have a good foundation upon which to raise a durable superstructure; and concluding that that system cannot be radically wrong, which has produced such favorable results, I should be unwilling to hazard, by an entire innovation the benefits we have derived, and may still derive, by retaining the present organization of the navy department, and providing by law for an intelligent practical and efficient auxiliary agency, such as experience has suggested.

With this view, I have the honor to submit with great deference, the following system for the organization of the department of the navy of the U. States, distinguishing, for the sake of perspicuity, in the form of a bill, those objects which appear to require legislative provision, from those for which executive regulation may prescribe with more convenience and advantage; the outline of which only is given, as the ground work may be filled up to greater benefit, when the collected experience and talents which it contemplates shall have deliberated upon the subject.

AN ACT

FOR THE ORGANIZATION OF THE NAVY DEPARTMENT.

Be it enacted, Sec. That the office, duties, and powers of the secretary of the navy, and of the accountant, agents and other officers, of the department of the navy, be and remain as now by law established; except as hereinafter modified, altered, or transferred to any other office or offices, created by this act.

Sec. 21. That the president of the United States be and he is hereby authorized to designate three officers of the navy, and, with the advice and consent of the senate, to appoint two other judicious persons, skilled in naval affairs to be inspectors of the navy, who together shall constitute a board of inspectors of the navy, three members whereof, shall be necessary to form a quorum; and the business of the said board shall be transacted in such central and convenient place, for the superintendence of the navy, as the president of the U. States shall direct—who shall also have power to designate the presiding member, and to appoint the secretary of the said board, whose duty it shall be to keep regular and correct records of all the transactions of the board, and to transmit attested copies of all such proceedings to the secretary of the navy, for the inspection and revision of the president of the United States, as soon as may be after the adjournment of the meeting, at which any such proceedings may have taken place; and the said board shall have power to establish such rules and regulations for its own proceedings, and to employ such numbers of clerks and assistants, as well for the transacting of the business of the board, as for that of the several inspectors, and to procure such books, maps, charts, plans, drawings, models, and stationary, as the public interest may require, and the president of the United States may approve.

Sec. 3. That it shall be the duty of the secretary of the navy, to arrange and class, under distinct and appropriate heads, as equally as may be, all such duties and details, as may be found impracticable for the officers of the department of the navy, as now organized, to execute with advantage to the public, and, with the approbation of the president of the United States, to assign to each inspector of the navy, the special charge and execution of one of the classes, so arranged; for the faithful performance of which trust, the said inspectors shall, severally, be held responsible under the instruction, and subject to the revision of the board of inspectors, to which a statement of all the transactions of each inspector, shall be submitted, for revision, at each stated meeting, and an abstract thereof transmitted monthly to the secretary of the navy, with such remarks thereon as the nature of the case may require; and it shall also be the duty of the secretary of the navy, to prepare a system of general regulations, defining and prescribing the respective powers and duties of the board of inspectors of the navy, and of the several inspectors, which rules, when approved by the president of the United States, shall be respected and obeyed, until altered or revoked by the same authority; and the said general regulations thus prepared and approved, shall be laid before congress at their next session.

Sec. 4. That the president of the United States be, and he is hereby authorized alone to appoint a person, skilled in the science and practice of naval architecture, to the office of naval constructor, and also to appoint two assistant naval constructors; and it shall be the duty of the secretary of the navy, to prepare such rules and regulations for conducting the business of the constructor's department, as shall appear necessary and proper, which, when approved by the president of the United States, shall be respected and obeyed, until revoked by the same authority; and the naval constructors shall be allowed one clerk, to assist in transacting the business of his department.

Sec. 5. That the president of the United States be, and he is hereby authorized, with the consent and advice of the senate, to appoint a paymaster of the navy, who shall perform the duties of his office agreeably to the directions of the president of the United States for the time being, and before he enters upon the duties of the same, shall give bonds, with good and sufficient sureties, in such sums as the president of the United States shall direct, for the faithful discharge of his said office, and shall take an oath to execute the duties thereof with fidelity.

Sec. 6. That all letters and packets to and from the inspectors and paymaster of the navy, which relates to their official duties, shall be free from postage.

Sec. 7. That each inspector of the navy shall be entitled to the pay and rations of a captain commanding a squadron on a separate service, and also to the sum of twelve hundred dollars per annum, in lieu of house rent, fuel, forage, &c. and the salary of the naval constructor shall be three thousand dollars per annum; each of the assistant constructors, fifteen hundred dollars per annum; the paymaster of the navy, two thousand dollars per annum; the secretary of the board of inspectors, two thousand dollars per annum; and the clerks and assistant, authorized by this act, shall receive such reasonable compensation for their services, as the president of the United States shall direct.

I would also respectfully suggest the expediency of providing by law for the establishment of a naval academy, with suitable professors, for the instruction of the officers of the navy, in those branches of the mathematics and experimental philosophy, in the science and practice of gunnery, theory of naval architecture and art of mechanical drawing, which are necessary to the accomplishment of the naval officer.

In order to illustrate the principles and operation of the proposed organization of the navy department, the following outline of the powers and duties which is contemplated to assign to the board of inspectors, and to the several inspectors is respectfully suggested.

Powers and duties of the Board.

The board should have the general superintendence and direction of the affairs of the navy, under the instructions from, and powers delegated by the president of the United States, and authority over all the officers, agents, and persons employed under the navy department, report to the secretary of the navy from time to time, all such matters and things as may in the opinion of the board, tend to promote the efficiency and economy of the establishment; and, upon the requisition of the secretary of the navy, furnish all the estimates of expenditure, which the several branches of the service may require, and such other information and statements as he may deem necessary.

The board shall have the power of making contracts and purchases, either directly or through the navy agents, whose power, in this respect, should be limited to small sums, and to objects, the procuring of which may not admit of delay; in all other cases, the previous sanction either of the secretary of the navy, of the board of inspectors, or of some officer authorized by the board should be indispensable.

The naval stations, within the United States should be designated by convenient boundaries; and an officer of rank, trust, and confidence, should reside in each, who should, under the instructions of the board, superintend and control the affairs of the navy within his district, and report to the board from time to time. All requisitions of commanding officers, pursers, and other persons, upon the agents, should be checked, and receive the sanction of the board, or of the resident officer, authorized by the board, before they are complied with.

Payments and advances shall be made, as heretofore, through the navy agents (except those for the pay of the navy;) and the sanction of the secretary of the navy, of the board, or of the officer authorized by the board; should precede all payments and advances, except for limited and urgent demands.

The board should establish general regulations for the conduct of its members, in the discharge of the special and important trusts severally assigned to them by the secretary of the navy; and should digest and report to the department, distinct regulations for the following objects.

- 1 Uniform regulations, establishing the several classes of ships and vessels in the navy of the United States; with tables of the dimensions, proportions, number, quantity, quality, nature and description, of masts, spars, rigging, anchors, cables, armaments, and equipments, of all kinds; and of the quantity, quality, and description of the provisions and stores of every species, for a given period for each class.
- 2 Regulations for receiving, preserving, issuing, and strictly accounting for the expenditure of materials and stores of all kinds, and in every department of the service, within the United States.
- 3 Regulations for surveying and authenticating the actual state and condition of all the ships and vessels of the navy, and of all the materials and stores of every species, reported to be decayed, damaged, or defective; and for directing the repair, conversion, sale, or other disposition of the same, as the nature of the case may require.
- 4 A more perfect system of general regulations for the naval service, at sea and on the lakes.
- 5 General regulations for the flotilla, or force employed in harbor defence, adapted to the peculiar nature of that service.
- 6 Uniform regulations for the navy yards, or arsenals, and depots of stores and materials.
- 7 Regulations for the cruising ships and vessels of the navy, while in port; for the recruiting service; and for the officers of the navy, while on shore, on duty, or on furlough; in order to ascertain the actual state and local situation of all the officers.
- 8 A system of detailed regulations for the naval hospitals, and medical department of the navy, within the United States.
- 9 An entire and new system of regulations for the conduct of pursers in the navy, accurately defining their duties, securing a more strict accountability; limiting their emoluments by a fixed and reasonable standard; and protecting the seamen of the navy from the undue advantages which may be practised with impunity, under the present system.
- 10 Regulations for ascertaining by examination, the moral character and professional qualifications of all the officers of the navy, below the grade of a master commandant, classing them in the scale of their several merits; and of the pretensions of those who may be selected for promotion, as well as of the candidates for warrant appointments in the navy.

All which regulations, when approved by the president of the United States, shall be established and obeyed, until revoked by the same authority.

The duties and details of service, proposed to be assigned to the several inspectors of the navy, may be classed as follows:

- 1st Class. Comprehending the general correspondence of the board, and preparation of all the reports, estimates, and statements, required by the department; and the communications of such propositions and informations to the secretary of the navy, as the board may deem interesting; and also the general charge and direction of the flotilla service on the New Orleans station.
- 2d Class. Comprehending the general military correspondence with all the officers of the navy; the roll of the officers of the navy, and record of their services, merits and qualifications, to be kept on the files of the board; orders for courts of enquiry and courts martial, and the preparation of all the documents and statements connected with these objects, also the general charge and direction of the flotilla service on the southern stations.

viz. Georgia, South Carolina, North Carolina and Norfolk.

3d Class. Comprehending the direction of ordnance and transportation; the general superintendence of the boundaries, laboratories, armories, and other works connected with the naval ordnance department, and the inspection and proof of arms, ammunition, &c. The direction of the transportation of all persons, stores, and provisions of the navy, by land and water; and the general charge and direction of the flotilla service in the Patapsco and Delaware, and New York.

4th Class. Comprehending the victualling, sustenance, including pursers, medical, and hospital stores; also the general charge and direction of the flotilla service, on all the naval stations from New York eastward, and on Lake Champlain.

5th Class. Comprehending the supply of hemp, yarns, cordage, sail duck, iron and other metals, anchors, and all other equipments and materials required for the service, except those which are included in the foregoing classes, and in the constructors department; and also, the general charge and direction of the service on Lake Ontario, and the upper lakes.

The superintendence and direction these five classes of objects would be distributed among the five inspectors.

The department of construction, under the direction of the secretary of the navy, and of the board of inspectors, would prepare all the drafts, plans, and instructions, for the building of all the vessels of the navy; construct the models, and, when approved, direct and superintend under the control of the board of inspectors, the building and repairing of the ships, vessels, boats, the formation of masts, spars, &c. and the contracting for procuring all the materials of wood, and of copper, in pigs, bolts and sheets, necessary for the supply of the navy; construct from the lines, in the mould left, all the moulds requisite for moulding and bevelling the timber in the forest, under the direction of skilful persons to be employed by the constructor for that purpose, and superintend the construction of wharves, ships, workshops, and engines, required in building and repairing ships of war.

It is a copious subject, in which it is difficult to combine brevity with perspicuity.

My aim has been to provide a practical, efficient, and economical system, with as much individual and collective responsibility as may be attainable; and I feel a persuasion that the result would not greatly disappoint the estimate I have formed; the wisdom of the senate will better appreciate its merits.

I have the honor to be, with the highest respect, sir, your obedient servant.

W. JONES.

The honorable president of the senate.

Late Omissions.—Miscellaneous.

BRUTALITY OF THE ENEMY.

Extract of a letter dated St. Inigoes, St. Mary's county Md. Nov. 1.

"Yesterday an enemy's brig came from the mouth of the Patuxent round Point Look Out, and towards evening hove in sight of this place. Shortly after a barge was seen coming round Fort Point. In about 15 minutes they were at the bank of the garden of St. Inigoes manor house, the residence of the Roman Catholic Missionary, who attends the adjoining congregations. They were met by a gentleman of the neighborhood, who saluted them, but was treated with the greatest contempt. One of them rushed on to the house with his sabre in his hand; a few moments after the captain came on shore, with the avowed purpose, as he said, of burning down the dwelling house, &c. He sternly asked who was the proprietor, where he was, &c. to all which questions appropriate answers were given. He was also informed that the property belonged to the incorporated Catholic clergy of Maryland, and was solely appropriated to the use of the church and support of the missions, and was requested to spare it on that account. He replied, as that was the case, he should not burn the house, but however ordered his men to proceed.—They advanced to the house; immediately 4 or 5 of them ran into the private chapel, when, painful to relate! the sacred vestments were thrown here and there, the vessels consecrated to the service of God profaned, the holy altar stripped naked, the tabernacle carried off, and the blessed sacrament of the altar borne away in the hands of those sacrilegious wretches.

"The captain was entreated over and over again to protect the church and have all things returned; he promised he would; he ran to the barge and ordered the men to restore the sacred vessels and vestments; they handed one chalice out of the barge, when the captain said he could not command them, they were a set of ruffians. The reverend gentleman who resides there, also joined in entreating them to return the sacred vessels, vestments and other articles for the use of the altar. The captain answered he would, seated himself in the barge and ordered his men to move off without taking any more notice of the entreaties. An old lady who lived on the place prevailed on them in the meantime to return the tabernacle, which they did, also a part of the vestments.

"On returning to the house, it was pitiful to view the different rooms they had ransacked, particularly the chapel; they left the crucifix on the altar; broke the cruets and scattered the pieces over the floor; they carried off six feather beds, sheets, blankets and pillows—bed curtains, an alarm clock, silver spoons, knives and forks, glass, the reverend gentleman's watch, the candlesticks belonging to the altar, kitchen furniture, and almost all the cloathing belonging to the persons who reside in the house, two trunks with cloathing, books and medicine, several pair of new shoes made for the people, and a quantity of leather; even the linens which were at the wash, and many other articles not yet known. The loss of that house on this and a former occasion, cannot be much less than $1200.

"The above brig is the Jason, capt. Watts, she is now under way down the Potomac, with a schr. in co. which it is supposed she captured last evening. Any comment on the above is thought unnecessary; the facts are such as to inspire sentiments of the deepest regret and horror of such sacrilegious transactions."

THE ENEMY AT WAREHAM.

The best evidence we have of the truth of the following official is—that the cotton factory "completely destroyed" is still standing. It is probable also, that the number of tons destroyed was not the half of what is stated.

From the London Gazette of Aug. 27.

Admiralty Office, Aug. 27.

Copy of a letter from admiral Cochrane, to J. W. Croker, esq. dated at Bermuda, July 18.

I am happy in again having an opportunity of calling their lordships attention to the zeal and activity of the officers of H. B. Majesty's squadron stationed off N. London (under the orders of capt. Paget.

The enclosed copy of a letter from him, will acquaint their lordships of a very gallant and judicious service performed by a division of boats of the Superb and Nimrod, under the command of lieutenant Garland of the Superb, whose ability is most conspicuously displayed in the masterly stratagem he resorted to, for bringing off the whole of his force unhurt, in the face of his numerous militia, after having destroyed nearly 2500 tons of shipping, and a valuable cotton mill belonging to the enemy situated at some distance up the country.

Superb, Martha's Vineyard Sound, May 14.

Having received intelligence that a fine ship and brig just built, the former for a letter of marque, the other for a privateer, were with several other vessels lying at a place called Wareham, I proceeded hence and detached the Nimrod through Quick's Hole, with the boats of this ship, and two from the N. to destroy them, under the direction of lieutenant J. Garland of the Superb; and I am happy to add, that the service was perfectly performed without any loss on our part, though it was achieved under critical circumstances. The extreme intricacy of the navigation, rendered it too hazardous to attempt the enterprise without the assistance of day light, which however, necessarily exposed the boats upon their return down the narrow stream, to a fire of musketry from a numerous militia, which had collected from the vicinity on the first alarm being given. But the foresight and prompt resolution of lieutenant G. completely succeeded in obviating the danger that was thus to be apprehended; for having first destroyed all the vessels and the cotton manufactory, he then ascertained the principal people of the place, and secured them as hostages for a truce, till the boats were conducted back out of the reach of difficulty; the influence that these persons had over the militia that had collected and threatened a cross fire upon the boats from both banks of the river, has been proved by their abstaining to molest them, and of course the hostages were afterwards released at the most convenient spot. The cotton manufactory had been lately built at great expense, was full of stores, and belonged to a company of sixty merchants at Boston.

I herewith send a list of the vessels, &c. destroyed; and I cannot in justice omit to report the steady and exemplary conduct of the seamen and marines, who though exposed to incessant temptation of liquor, &c. did not in any single instance fail to spurn the offer made to them, and strictly to hold private property sacred.

Army Pay-Office, City of Washington,

September 24, 1814.

SIR—Agreeably to your request I have the honor to state, that the sum of $1,944,828 and ninety-eight cents has been disbursed from this office, on account of bounties and premiums for recruits since the 27th of January 1814, the date of the passage of the law increasing the bounty. The distribution of this sum, as nearly as can be well ascertained, has been as follows, viz.

To Massachusetts, including Maine	$257,400
New-Hampshire	37,800
Vermont	109,390
Connecticut	78,932
Rhode-Island	1,000
New-York	475,320
New-Jersey	15,000
Pennsylvania	188,900
Delaware	10,000
Maryland, including district of
Columbia	80,392
Virginia	159,962 98
North Carolina	60,000
South Carolina	62,800
Georgia	54,000
Tennessee	98,000
Kentucky	108,000
Ohio	96,500
Louisiana	63,530
Michigan Territory	20,000
Mississippi Territory	4,000
Indiana Territory	2,000
Missouri Territory	1,492

$1,944,828 98

To this sum it would perhaps be no more than just to add twenty or thirty thousand dollars, of which I am not yet fully advised, and which of course does not now regularly appear on the books of this office.

With sentiments of respect, &c.

MILITIA GENERAL ORDERS.

Head-quarters, New-Orleans, Sept. 28, 1814.

The governor and commander in chief esteems it a duty again to call the attention of the militia to the dangers which menace the state, and to order each and every corps to hold itself in readiness for service. The late and successful enterprise of the enemy against the city and neighborhood of Washington teaches us, how necessary it is to improve our means of defence, and to take every measure of precaution. The most perfect union is of primary importance, and a prompt obedience to orders indispensable. Our strength is sufficient to ensure safety; provided it be applied speedily and judiciously. Our country presents many advantages. Intricate and enclosed it is difficult of access. The avenues of approach must be vigilantly watched, and firmly defended. In this duty the militia are to participate, and must not shrink from toil or danger. Our great object should be, to guard against surprise; but a knowledge of the enemy's advance will be of little avail, unless we are prepared to meet him.—Let every man then hold it a sacred duty to keep his arms and accoutrements in a condition for immediate service, and be himself prepared to rally on a moment's warning, at the call of his chief. The enemy no longer respects "the principles of humanity or the rules of civilized warfare!" He avows a design "to destroy and lay waste such towns and districts upon the sea coast as may be found assailable." Devastation marks his progress, and the terms on which Alexandria was exempt from conflagration, shew that he spares only to plunder. Opposed to such an enemy, we can alone look for safety with arms in our hands, and a determination to yield but in death. The commander in chief persuades himself that the most patriotic zeal will animate every breast, and that a love of country will acquire the ascendancy of every other passion. Such was the spirit which made America free, and can alone preserve her independence. To those aged citizens, who have enrolled their names among the defenders of the state, the most grateful thanks are due. An example so glorious, cannot fail to excite in younger men those feelings which will secure for their much injured country the warmest support. To the requisition now in service, and other detachments ordered on duty, the commander in chief is desirous to add, for the better defence of Louisiana, a partisan corps to be composed of 150 riflemen, 150 light infantry, to which shall be annexed a detachment of cavalry to continue in service for six months, unless sooner discharged. To complete this corps the commander in chief invites the service of volunteers from every part of the state. Such citizens of New Orleans as may be desirous to enrol, will hasten to associate, either as infantry or riflemen—those of the interior countries, who may wish to join, will repair without delay to New Orleans, where the companies will be organized, and the officers which shall be recommended, duly commissioned. Volunteers will provide themselves with knapsacks, and such as have rifles are requested to bring them. The commander in chief addresses himself to every citizen who has health, strength and inclination to enter on this service—he calls more particularly on the young men of Louisiana—he reminds them of the spirit of their fathers and trusts they will emulate their virtues. The crisis is important, and pregnant with events of the greatest interest. That independence, which our fathers acquired, is now to be maintained by the valor of their sons. That tranquility which the peaceful inhabitant of Louisiana has hitherto enjoyed; the fruits of his industry—the safety of his family—his property, his rights, are all menaced by a merciless foe. At such a moment, every true American, each faithful Louisianian must “have his bosom in his country’s cause.” We will never abandon our parents, and leave our sisters to the clemency of the victor.

WM. C. C. CLAIBORNE,
Governor and commander in chief.
ADJUTANT GENERAL’S OFFICE,
Philadelphia, Nov. 19, 1814.

GENERAL ORDERS. The practice of officers and men in the service, writing or otherwise communicating any thing in relation to the strength, the movements, or destination, of their corps, or any part of the army, except to their commanding officers, is unilitary, and often times vitally injurious to the service—it is positively forbidden. Such communications find their way into the newspapers, and many of our newspapers find their way to the enemy, who is well known to be more adroit in profiting by our blunders, than by his own prowess. Contractors, agents, sutlers, and all followers of the army, are cautioned against violating this order.

(Signed)

EDMOND P. GAINES,

Major-general commanding.
Third Brigade, Maryland Militia,
Baltimore, November 18, 1814.

BRIGADE ORDERS. In obedience with general orders of this date, the 1st cavalry regiment, lieutenant colonel Bays, the 5th, 6th, 27th, 39th and 51st regiments infantry, and the rifle battalion, major Pinkney, are honorably discharged with the thanks of the major-general commanding, for their good conduct, their behaviour and attention to discipline during their service.

The lieutenant colonel commanding, begs the officers of the brigade, to accept his warmest and most unfeigned thanks for their uniform good conduct and attention to orders and discipline, for the short space of time, as senior officer, the command of the brigade has devolved upon him, and he begs them to convey to the non-commissioned officers and privates, under their respective commands, his thanks for their soldier-like conduct and orderly behaviour, which is a sure pledge of their future devotedness in their country’s cause, and of this city in particular, should it again be assailed or threatened by the enemy.

He regrets most sincerely the cause which gave rise to his assuming the command, especially at a crisis like the present, when experience and military talents were so eminently combined in our late excellent commander, and which is so necessary to unite all hearts and hands in our own defence, as well as in defence of our country’s rights and violated honor.

To major Frailey, brigade major and inspector, major Small, brigade quarter-master, he tenders his thanks for their continuance to the close of the service, and for the assiduity and perseverance in their several stations, which has tended, in so eminent a degree, to promote that good order and regularity in every department throughout the brigade.

WM. McDONALD,
Lieut. col. com’d brig. M. M.

[The account of the battle between the two “Kilkenny cats,” in which they fought until they eat up every thing but the tips of each other’s tail, may be regarded a pretty moderate story when such a one as the following is gravely inserted. Between fighting and lying, the British somehow, on paper, always get the victory, though we get the ships or destroy them.—“Both ships sunk”—600 tons, 24 guns and 300 men for the Wasp—200 tons, 18 guns, and 100 men for the Avon! This is “shoot-ing flying lions,” as they say in the West Indies.

The force of the vessels was, perhaps, as nearly equal as any that have met—if any advantage was in our favor it was trifling, either in the number of men, guns or tons.

WASP AND AVON—FROM A LONDON PAPER.

Extract of a letter from Plymouth, dated, Sept. 12. “As the public mind must be agitated about the fate of the Avon, for your information I beg to say, this moment her 2nd lieutenant and one midshipman, (friends of mine) are arrived at this place, with the captain only slightly wounded in both legs, themselves merely scratched.—The 1st. lieutenant killed—both ships sunk?

“It was about 9 o’clock, P. M. when the Avon discovered the enemy, and immediately an uninter-rupted and sanguinary contest took place for two hours. When the engagement had nearly ceased, H. M. ship Castilian, attracted by the firing, bore down and instantly ran her bowsprit across the bows of the enemy, potting in at the same time a broadside, which she followed by a 2nd, some say a third. At that critical moment the Avon threw out a signal of distress, which determined the commanding officer of the Castilian, lieutenant Lloyd, to relinquish any further attack on the Wasp, and hasten to the succor of the Avon, which he was no more able than to effect as she went down shortly after the last man was removed. H. M. S. Tartar, is just then came up, and having 40 of the Avon’s men from the Castilian to strengthen her crew proceeded in quest of the Wasp.—The gallantry of captain Arbuthnot and his ship’s company cannot be too highly applauded when the disparity of force be established. The Wasp was over 600 tons burthen and mounted 24

32 pounds, with a complement of 500 men, whilst our vessel was only 200 tons, and 1824 persons with 100 men. We regret to state our loss at 9 killed and 33 wounded. Amongst the former the gallant lieutenant Pendergast, who fell by a grape shot whilst nobly cheering the crew. The captain's wound in the leg is likely to do well, nor have we heard that any of the other wounded are in danger of their lives.—

Advertiser.

EXCHANGE OF PRISONERS! By the following from an Easton (Md.) paper, it appears that the British are determined to consider all persons as prisoners of war that are liable to militia duty. A practice on this new principle will demand retaliation.

Easton, (Md.) Nov. 19.—In consequence of the capture of the packet sloop Messenger, (capt. Vickers,) on the 11th inst. a flag of truce was obtained from brigadier-general Benson, for the purpose of obtaining the ransom of the sloop and release of the passengers.

We are sorry to say that the object of the truce was only in part effected. They would not listen to the ransom of the sloop on any terms, and the following will show how far they will consent to the release of prisoners.

List of prisoners released, who were captured in the sloop Messenger, on the 11th inst. and sent to Easton, in the flag schooner Superior, capt. Auld, where they arrived on the 17th, viz.

Mrs. Edith Dawson and her two children; Miss Harriet W. Day; Miss Susan McGlaughlin; Miss Isabella Prince; James Cockayne, non-combatant; Joseph Spencer, ditto, being a teacher in a public Seminary; negroes Ned and Kitty.

Prisoners released who were captured in other vessels and put on board the prize sloop Messenger.

Miss Elizabeth Frazier, of Dorchester; Doctor Travers, of ditto over 45; Mrs. Brown, of New York, put on board the flag schooner, from the Dragon 74.

Prisoners detained as militia men, captured in the sloop;

Robert Spencer, of Easton; Samuel Holmes, of do.; Henry L. Clark, of Baltimore; William Broomwell, of Easton.

NOTE—Mrs. Broomwell and Mrs. Johns her mother, continued on board the commodore's ship with Mr. Broomwell, through choice, with an expectation of obtaining his release.

Prisoners detained, who were captured in other vessels and put on board the sloop:

Charles Egeleston and James Frazier, of Dorchester militia men.

Easton, 12th Nov. 1814.

Sir—The sloop Messenger, a packet-boat has been captured by one of the barges, belonging to your squadron, with several respectable inhabitants of Talbot county, and I am sorry to learn that these passengers have not been set on shore, many of them being ladies it is hoped there will be no difficulty in releasing them immediately. Mr. Clement Vickers, a highly respectable citizen of this county, industriously laboring for the support and advancement of his family, must sustain in the capture of his vessel, a loss that will reduce him to the greatest difficulty and inconvenience, unless he can ransom her at some moderate sum, the usages of war justify and recommend such a procedure, in as much as the spirit of the practice of civilized nations, in a state of war enjoins them to conduct it in such a manner as to make it unavoidable course produce as little private individual calamity as possible. I have granted a flag under the conduct of major Meredith, for the purpose of obtaining an immediate restoration of the captives to their friends, and to give to the owners of the property taken an opportunity of ransoming it according to the usages of war. I have the honor to be, your humble servant,

P. BENSON, B. G. of Md. Militia.

To the commander of his Britannic majesty's

Squadron, now lying in the Chesapeake bay.

His majesty's ship Dragon, off Tangiers, 12th Nov. 1814.

Sir—In reply to your letter of the 12th inst. just received from major Meredith, I am to acquaint you that such of the American prisoners as were captured on the 11th inst. in the Messenger, whose age, exclude them from militia service are herewith set at liberty together with the ladies, children, &c.

I am to acquaint you that it is contrary to my instructions to ransom any vessel or property captured from the enemy.

I am sorry it is not in my power to parole the prisoners named in the margin* but my orders forbid my entering into any arrangement for the release or exchange of prisoners except on the principle of receiving man for man, on such terms it will afford me great pleasure to be enabled to restore these gentlemen to their friends for any British subjects you may send me.

I have the honor to be, sir, your obedient humble servant,

ROBT. BARRIE, captain and senior officer.

To Brigadier-general Benson.

GEN. MACOMB.—The inhabitants of Belleville, N. J. on the return of major-general Macomb to his family, received him in a manner the most gratifying and complimentary; as a testimony of their spirit and patriotism, they fired a rational salute and illuminated the village, and particularly the fence in front of the general's house. The general came forward and courteously acknowledged the compliment, in a style highly interesting and impressive, taking the villagers cordially by the hand, and passing those civilities for which all men who are not above their situations are remarkable, and which so eminently distinguish the gentlemen and the patriot. In return, the general ordered his excellent band of music to play Hail Columbia, and other national airs. Never on the return of any hero to the peaceful bosom of his family, was evinced so universal a scene of sincere joy and heartfelt satisfaction.—[E. Post.]

Major-general Porter.—The following articles, which we copy from a Batavia paper, will be interesting to all those who have, with us, admired the gallantry displayed by the New-York volunteers attached to Brown's army, and have duly appreciated the merit of the intrepid and worthy commander who led them to the field, and so often faced the enemy at their head.

Camp Batavia, Nov. 2d, 1814.

GENERAL.—The campaign having closed and our country no longer at this moment requiring our services, we are about to return to our homes and enjoy in the peaceful circle of our friends that happiness, which a consciousness of having performed our duty, ever imparts.

But permit us, ere our departure, to express to you, with the warmth of soldiers, that high sense we have of your skill and gallantry, and our grateful acknowledgments for your indefatigable exertions and arduous labors in disciplining and training us for the field of glory. Your labors have not been without success.

The militia, since our glorious revolution have been considered, (until within these two years) the bulwark of our country; within that period, they

U. S. ship Saratoga, Lake Champlain, Sept. 13th, 1814.

Sir—I have the honor of enclosing to you a list of killed and wounded troops of the line (acting marines on board the squadron, Lake Champlain,) in the action of the 11th inst.

In attempting to do justice to the brave officers and men I have had the honor to command, my feeble abilities fall far short of my wishes. First lieutenant Morrison, 33d infantry, stationed on board the U. States brig Eagle, was wounded, but remained on deck during the action animating his men by his honorable conduct. Second lieutenant James Young, 6th infantry, on board the United States schooner Ticonderoga, merits my warmest thanks. I would particularly recommend him to your notice. Second lieutenant William B. Howell, 15th infantry, in the U. States ship Saratoga, rendered me every assistance, notwithstanding his having been confined for ten days of a fever, yet, at the commencement of the action, was found on deck and continued until the enemy had struck, when he was borne to his bed; I would also recommend him to your notice.

The conduct of the non-commissioned officers and privates was so highly honorable to their country and themselves, it would be superfluous to particularize them.

I have the honor to be, sir, your obedient servant,
WHITE YOUNG.

NEW BOUNDARIES.—A pamphlet has lately appeared in London, entitled "Compendious view of the points to be discussed in treating with the United States of America," ascribed to a Mr. Acheson, who has been for some time employed as an agent to the British merchants connected with the North American colonies. The Quebec Gazette is decidedly opposed to these boundaries, inasmuch as the population to be acquired thereby would overwhelm that of the Canadas,—estimating the new subjects at about one million!

The following is the summary of the project contained in this pamphlet:

"The summary of what we have attempted to shew the necessity of, and have warmly recommended to those whom Great Britain charges with the adjustment of our differences with America, is

"First. A new boundary line throughout the whole extent of North America, where our possessions and those of the United States come in contact; keeping in view, that

"Nova Scotia and New Brunswick be restored to their ancient limits, security against aggression, and a free communication with Canada be obtained, without passing through the United States, and the islands in the Passamaquoddy bay be resumed by us;

"That the Americans be excluded from the navigation of the St. Lawrence, and all its tributary lakes and waters; and "That a navigable part of the Mississippi be brought within the Canadian territories.

"Secondly. A new boundary line for the Indian territory.

"Thirdly. No forts, or military posts, to be erected by the Americans in the Indian territory, or on the boundaries, or on any territorial or other jurisdiction or public property possessed by them within these limits.

"Fourthly. The independence of the Indians, and the integrity of their boundaries, to be guaranteed by Great Britain.

"Fifthly. The Americans to be excluded from the fisheries on the coast of British North America, incidentally on this head, taking care that it be recommended in negotiating with France, by no means to restore the islands of St. Pierre and Miquelon, or to permit the French to participate in the fisheries of Newfoundland.

"Sixthly. The Americans to be excluded from all intercourse with the British West India islands.

"Seventhly. The Americans to be excluded from trading with our East India possessions, and their pretended right to the north-west coast of America to be extinguished forever.

"Eighthly. The Americans not to be allowed to incorporate the Floridas with their republic; and the cession of New-Orleans to be required, in order to ensure to us the enjoyment of our privileges to navigate the Mississippi; and here it may also be a question, in how far the arrangements made between Spain, France, and America, respecting Louisiana, can come into discussion.

"Lastly. No commercial treaty to be entered into with the United States, but the basis upon which trade is in future to be carried on between the two nations to be defined and acknowledged in the treaty of peace and amity, and to be regulated by the municipal laws of each country.

"Having thus reviewed and explained these objects, and produced it to be hoped, a conviction of the essential nature of them to the prosperity and existence of our colonial possessions in North America, we trust they will not be absorbed in the magnitude, or be suffered to merge in the weight of those grand questions, whence the war originated—the respective assertion and denial of our maritime and inherent rights. In fact whilst they are scarcely to be deemed of minor importance, in one point of view they form the bulk of what ought to come under discussion; for, as to our maritime rights we re-assert, that so far from the concessions being admitted, even all disquisition relative to them should pre-emptorily be abstained from."

The pamphlet (says the Quebec Gazette, of October 16) is accompanied with a map, shewing the proposed boundary line. It may be traced on any map of North America; beginning at Penobscot, up that river to the heights of land, along those heights to the sources of the Connecticut, down the Green Mountains, &c. to fort Anne, following the heights of land between the Hudson and Lake George, thence along the highlands between the sources of the rivers flowing into the United States, the St. Lawrence and the lakes, to the head of the Alleghany river near Lake Erie, and down the Alleghany river or Ohio to its confluence with the Mississippi, up the Mississippi to the Missouri, and following the Missouri to the Rocky Mountains; including almost all the population of Vermont, that of New-York, and the whole of Ohio.

BRITISH GOODS, in great quantities, are received, as well by smuggling, as by regular entries, to the eastward. The manner is—they are brought from the new British port of Castine, to Bucksdown, by land, and there put on board "neutral" vessels and conveyed to Hampden, where they are entered. This trade being however, only one sided, cannot last; and would drain the United States of all our specie in a very little time.

BRITISH LIBERALITY.—The farce of making payment for articles plundered by the British, as sometimes they pretend to do, is handsomely exposed in the following statement:

A list of stock, &c. taken from Choptank Island, by the British, from the 20th to the 25th October, 1814 —viz.

43 grown cattle,	50 sheep
15 calves,	25 bbls. corn,
58	2 or 3 tons hay.

For the above articles they left bills of exchange to the amount of 150L sterling. The following stock they left the specie for, at the prices opposite each, viz.

7 grown cattle, at $5	$35
5 calves, at 2,	10
6 large hogs,	8

Head-Quarters, 7th military district,

Mobile, October 16th, 1814.

Sir—I have just learned that general Coffee, with the volunteers will reach me in a few days. Their patriotism, at this all important crisis has justly entitled them to be hailed as the first of patriots in the union; and will immortalize the state. They have set a fit and proper example to the sister states of the union; and if followed by them will soon make us respectable abroad, the tyrant of England shudder, and obtain for us an honorable peace in a short time.

As soon as general Coffee reaches me I will be in motion, and I trust with the smiles of Heaven to be able to give security to this section of the country in a short time.

SUMMARY OF POLITICS.

ABERDEEN, Sept. 3.—The affairs of Norway are said to be finally settled, and Prince Christian has formally stipulated for the subjugation of the Nor-have been stigmatised as a mob worse than useless.—Our own state, more particularly has felt the imputation—her hardy yeomanry have withdrawn under the odium heaped on them, apparently deservedly.—The disgraceful scenes at Queenston and in the vicinity of Black-Rock and Buffalo have been obliterated by their conduct since. Her sons, we trust, have shewn to the world, at Chippawa, Bridgewater, and Erie, that with an able commander, one who possesses the undivided confidence of her citizen soldiers, the militia may still claim the proud distinction of the bulwark of the nation. It remained for you, sir, after all the disasters and disgrace attached to the militia, to work this revolution, to renovate our spirits and lead us to victory.

We now take our leave, anticipating with pleasure, that should our country call us forth, you will again lead us to the path of fame.

Accept, sir, this tender of our thanks, and may you long enjoy your well earned laurels and the confidence of the nation.

Major-general Peter B. Porter,

Camp at Batavia, Nov. 2, 1814:

GENTLEMEN—There is not a circumstance in life that could have afforded me more heartfelt pleasure than to have met with the approbation of the officers of the volunteers and militia, in the conduct of a command which you are aware has been surrounded by difficulty and chequered with danger.

For the handsome manner in which the volunteers and militia have acquitted themselves on the Niagara frontier, during the late campaign, the credit is due to the gallant officers and brave men with whom it has been my singular good fortune to be associated.

In return for your kind wish, accept, gentlemen, my hearty prayers for your happy return to your friends and your everlasting prosperity.

Circular.—Harrisburg, 19th Nov. 1814.—SIR—You will, immediately upon the receipt of this, communicate to the drafted militia and volunteers of your brigade, now under marching orders, the revocation by the secretary at war of the requisition for four thousand Pennsylvania militia, a copy of which is hereunto subjoined; and that their services are consequently for the present dispensed with. Adding my high sense of the honorable feeling and patriotic spirit manifested by those, who are ready to march and willing to subject themselves, at this inclement season, to the privations and hardships always inseparable from military service, in defence of their beloved country and to avert the dangers with which it was threatened.

SIMON SNYDER,

Governor of the commonwealth.

To } Inspector of the brigade } division of Pennsylvania.

Department of War, Nov. 14, 1814.

SIR—Understanding by a communication, that a compliance with the requisition for the four thousand militia lately called from Pennsylvania, will be attached with much inconvenience and embarrassment; and it being probable, by the long delay of the projected expedition of lord Hill, that the state of affairs in Europe may prevent its prosecution against this district of our country, I have to inform your excellency that your orders for carrying it into effect may be revoked. I take this step in confidence that the patriotic spirit, which has been displayed by the citizens of Pennsylvania, in the late pressing emergency, may be relied on, should a reverse occur, for the supply of any force which may be requisite. I have the honor to be, very respectfully, sir, your most obedient servant,

JAMES MONROE.

His Excellency Simon Snyder,

Governor of Pennsylvania, Harrisburg.

Charleston, Nov. 16. On the 14th inst. were taken, seven British prisoners by the militia at Long Bay (Waccamaw) from a boat that came on shore, for the alleged purpose of purchasing provisions. The vessel from which the prisoners came, is a schooner between two and three hundred tons, called the St. LAURENCE, formerly the private armed schooner ATLAS, which admiral Cockburn had captured at Ocracoke. Among the prisoners, is a lieutenant of the navy, commander of the schooner and the surgeon.

BRITISH (government) BILLS; at Boston or London, 30 days, 14 1-2 to 15 per cent. discount.

GENERAL ORDER.

Adjutant and Inspector general's office.

Washington, Nov. 23.

The secretaries of the war and navy, having agreed to establish the following relative rank between officers of the army and navy, the same being also approved by the president of the United States, it will be observed and respected accordingly.

Rank between Navy and Army officers.

Commodores of squadrons, being captains,	Brig. generals.
Captains,	Colonels.
Master Commandants,	Majors.
Lieutenants,	Captains.

The rank and precedence of sea officers as above stated, will take place according to the seniority of their respective commissions. Captains not having an actual command as commodore, will rank only as colonels—and if commanding a vessel of inferior class than that to which they are by law entitled, will rank only as majors, unless the combined force under the command of any such captain shall equal that to which a captain in the navy is entitled, in which case he shall rank as a colonel.

This arrangement is not to give any pretence to land officers, to command any part of the naval force of the United States, or to sea officers to command any part of the army of the United States—nor shall either have a right to demand the compliments due to their respective ranks, unless on actual service.

Commodores of the flotilla service will have the rank of colonel only.

By order,

JOHN R. BELL,
Inspector general.

Copy of a letter from commodore Macdonough to brig. gen. Macomb, dated

U. S. ship Saratoga, off Plattsburgh, Sept. 13th, 1814.

DEAR SIR—Enclosed is a copy of a letter from captain White Youngs, and a list of killed and wounded attached to his command.

I beg leave to recommend captain Youngs to your particular notice; during the action his conduct was such as to meet with my warmest approbation. I feel much indebted to him for his personal valor and example of coolness and intrepidity to his own men, as well as to the sailors. He volunteered in a sinking boat, to carry my order to the galleys, for close action, in the hottest part of it; and supplied the guns with his men as fast as the sailors were disabled.

I am, with much respect and esteem, your most obedient servant,

T. MACDONOUGH.

Brig. gen. Macomb, U. S. army.

Captain Youngs of the 15th, is an officer of distinguished merit, and has conducted himself with the greatest propriety on board the fleet. By his example and attention we have been able to keep the fleet manned from the line, which has been the means of contributing to the result of the naval engagement, I therefore recommend him to the particular notice of the war department.

ALEX. MACOMB.

September, 18, 1814.

wegians after having as it would appear, placed their army in a situation where it was surrounded by that of Sweden. The letters and public documents of this prince have for some time been of a very undecided description. He affected to be the determined warlike leader of a people resolved to sacrifice all for independence, and at the same time he informed his enemy, that he would faithfully represent to the people the dangers to which they were about to expose themselves in the war. In the present era of duplicity and underhand intrigue, it will not be very wonderful, if it appear that prince Christian had merely gone over to manage the Norwegians; to take the lead among them with many patriotic declarations, in order to prevent some more determined man from assuming the character of their chief, and finally to bring about their subjection to the crown of Sweden. The spirit of the people was certainly good, their good discipline and valour unquestioned, and the passes of the country such, that a comparatively small army could effectually stop invaders. But with all these advantages, we find the fortresses on the frontiers given up without resistance, and after some unmeaning movements in the field, on the part of the Norwegian army, an armistice agreed on which virtually resigns the independence of Norway.

With regard to Poland, no person can be sanguine enough to expect, that it will be restored to independence during the present order of things. The partitioning of Poland will form an important part of the discussions to take place at the approaching congress. A report has been circulated, that the emperor Alexander had some intentions of erecting it into an independent kingdom, under a Russian prince; and were this accomplished, Poland would be but a vassal state of Russia; but the court of Vienna, it is said, will oppose this arrangement, and insist upon the dismemberment of the territory. It is thus the allies give liberty to Europe; and when we reflect, that in Spain despotism in church and state is restored in all its horrors, while continued shroods upon liberty are made in France, and the most ridiculous attempts are made to restore priest craft, and the exploded notion of the divine right of kings, we cannot help saying that, within our recollection, the liberties of Europe never appeared in a less thriving way.

And whatever we may think of the blessings we have conferred upon Europe by the late revolution, it is yet certain, that a majority of the continental states do not at all thank us for our good offices. The French express no gratitude or good will for breaking their bonds—the Spaniards under every thing we had done while endeavoring their deliverance—the Dutch, with much apathy, decline our commerce, and threaten to discontinue the Orange Boven since their prince imposed a tax of three halfpence a pound on butchers' meat—the Austrians are apprehensive of renewed attacks from France, which are loudly threatened—and, of all the nations of Europe, perhaps Russia and Prussia only, would thank Britain for her exertions, and Sweden while the crown prince retains his influence; all the three having to expect the treatment of treacherous allies, had France proved successful in the war.

For what reasons we so pertinaciously urged the war against France, will ever be a very pertinent question, while the fatal effects arising from that war are felt. Indemnity for the past, and security for the future we have not obtained. We have added about six hundred millions to our national debt, and of course, thirty millions to our permanent taxes—and have just as little security, as at any period of the reign of Bonaparte.

Boston, Nov 3. A sloop of and for Providence from New York, with flour, &c. was captured on Monday last, outside of Block Island, by a British privateer sloop, all the crew, except one taken out, a prize master and three men put on board and ordered for Halifax.

Soon after, the American sailor left on board, persuaded the men that it was necessary to caulk in the dead lights and companion, as having no pumps, should it come on to blow, she must sink. While two of them were employed caulking inside the companion, and he outside, and one at the deadlight, he suddenly closed the companion slide on the three, and secured them below—while doing this, the 4th man, at the helm, observing him, seized an oar and struck him to the deck, and severely wounded him, he however immediately recovered himself, seized a hammer and with it in return, struck him his antagonist to the deck, there kept him, and threatened to knock his brains out, if he attempted to resist—in that situation he tied his hands together and confined him under the cable box, on deck.

Afterwards coming on to blow, and he being unable to work the vessel alone, he offered the fellow (under the box) his life, provided he would assist him working the sloop into port, which he gladly accepted of, and she arrived at Newport on Tuesday, when the heroic tar (by the name of Perkins) delivered over his prisoners to the gun boats.

Naval Report.

IN SENATE, November 28.

Mr. TAIT, from the committee of the senate on naval affairs, to whom were referred two resolutions of the 7th inst instructing them "to inquire what provision should be made for the appointment of officers above the grade of captain, in the navy of the United States; and, also, "to inquire what provision should be made for conferring naval rank by brevet; in consideration of meritorious service," have had the same under consideration, and reported:

That your committee assume it as a policy now settled, that the United States are to have a permanent naval establishment, which is to be gradually increased according to circumstances, and as the ability of the government may permit. Your committee deem it unnecessary to go into a course of reasoning to support the soundness of this policy, and to establish. (what is now generally conceded,) that a navy is the most appropriate, the most efficient, and the least expensive defence of this country.

The commercial and maritime habits of a large portion of the people of the U. States, press them to the ocean: hence have arisen competition and rivalry with other nations, pursuing the same course of industry. The history of all nations teaches us, that the persons and the property of our citizens on the high seas, unprotected, must be (as indeed they have been) the subjects of frequent violence and injustice. The true remedy against these maritime wrongs is maritime force. A navy, growing up with the growth of the nation, cannot fail, before the lapse of many years, to procure respect from abroad, and safety at home.

Congress, apparently influenced by these considerations, at an early period after the establishment of the general government, created a naval department, and have authorized, from time to time, the building of ships of war, until the navy has become respectable both from the number and rates of its vessels, and still more so, from the gallantry and splendor of its achievements. By the laws now in force, the navy will consist of four seventy-fours, nine forty-fours, three thirty sixes, eight sloops of war, besides a great number of brigs and schooners, carrying, in the whole, not less than thirteen hundred guns; of these there remain to be put on the stocks, one of the seventy-fours, and four of the forty-fours. This force is exclusive of the gun-boats, the flotillas, and lake squadrons; the latter of which consist of between thirty and forty ships, some of which are large. The national vessels on the lakes do not carry less than five hundred guns. Your committee are not aware, nor do they believe, that any nation possessing a naval force, such as the above, is without a grade of officers above that of captain. The nation with whom the United States are now at war, is said to have about a thousand public ships; to command which she has not less than two hundred admirals of ten different grades, ascending from rear admiral of the blue to the admiral of the fleet. At present the navy of the United States is commanded by commissioned officers of three grades only: lieutenants, master commandants, and post captains.

The committee would feel that they had not done justice to the subject committed to them, if they failed to contrast the situation of the army with that of the navy, as it respects the scope of promotion in each.—The army presents for the encouragement of an honorable ambition, the high station of major general through ten different grades. It has also advantages in the variety of its corps unknown to the navy. The youth of our country, ambitious of military fame, may, according to their taste, enter the army as officers of cavalry, of artillery, of infantry, or of the rifle corps. Not so with the naval officer. All that he can expect is to be transferred from a smaller to a larger vessel:—from a subordinate station to the command of a ship of war. The rapid promotions, of late, in the army, cannot but strongly impress the naval officer with a deep sense of his own confined situation, and of the cheerless prospect before him. Does not justice then dictate that the range for promotion should be enlarged in our naval establishment?

Your committee are of opinion that a direct policy and a prudent foresight, not less than a just regard to the strong claims of the navy, call for an enlargement of the sphere of promotion. It cannot be long before the navy will be called on to sail in squadron. The highest attainments in naval tactics should be encouraged. If you expect men to labor for the highest qualifications in their professions, it is necessary to open to them the way to the stations requiring them. The surest mean by which you will probably induce the officers to qualify themselves for an admiral's command, is to create that grade in the navy. Thereby requiring in the same act great professional attainments, and offering a reward for them.

Your committee are therefore of opinion, that whether they view this subject in reference to the practice of older and more experienced nations, or in regard to the just claims and the long and meritorious services of the naval officers, or with a view to a just, prudent, and liberal policy on the part of the government, a grade or grades superior to that of captain should now be created in the naval establishment.

As to the second resolution relative to conferring naval rank by brevet, it does not occur to your committee as necessary; it having been the practice of the government to confer actual rank without regard to seniority, in reward of brilliant achievements, or meritorious service.

The committee respectfully submit the following resolutions:

Resolved, That it is expedient to authorize by law the appointment of officers above the grade of captain in the navy of the United States.

Resolved, That it is inexpedient, at this time, to make any provision for conferring naval rank by brevet.

Navy department, November 15th 1814.

SIR,—In answer to the enquiry contained in your letter of the 8th instant, founded upon two resolutions of the senate, passed on the 7th instant, instructing the committee on naval affairs to enquire "what provision should be made for the appointment of officers above the grade of captain in the navy of the United States," and "what provisions should be made for conferring naval rank, by brevet, in consideration of meritorious service," I have the honor to represent, that the high character which the American navy has justly acquired; the general sentiment which indicates its rapid increase and permanency; and the long, faithful, and honorable service, which its senior officers have rendered their country, appear to me to justify and call for the appointment of officers of a higher grade than that of captain.

Love of country, and the laudable desire of honorable fame, are strong excitements to noble actions, but the prospect of progressive promotion to the highest distinction which talents, zeal, and valor, may justly aspire, is not perhaps less active and stimulating.

Captains of long and honorable standing in the navy, cannot but contrast the cheerless prospect of promotion in the naval service, with the rapid and high distinction which their military brethren, with equal but not higher pretensions, have attained.

The naval force, in officers, seamen, and marines, is probably two-fifth parts of the whole military force of the United States actually employed, in which there are, I think, eight major-generals and sixteen brigadiers, exclusive of those of the staff, who enjoy the rank, pay, and emoluments, of brigadiers.

The effect of a limited grade, without the hope of promotion, is to contract the range of study and professional attainment within the sphere of the command thus limited, hold out but the prospect of elevated rank and command, and every officer of talents and worth will aspire to the highest qualifications.

Foreign experience is to be received with caution, yet the practice of nations of great maritime experience, may throw some light upon the subject. A comparison of the force of the British navy, with the number of admirals in that service, will exhibit the following result, viz. of ships of seventy four guns there are

Building, about	-	-	-	24
In ordinary, about	-	-	-	54
Guard, hospital, prison, store ships, &c.	-	-	-	33
In commission, about	-	-	-	99

Ships of seventy four guns and upwards 210

The list of admirals contains two hundred and nine, exclusive of twenty-seven superannuated rear admirals upon half pay, thus exhibiting more than two admirals for every ship of seventy four guns and upwards, in commission.

We daily see on our own coast, admirals with commands inferior to those which the American navy may even now afford.

The new grade to be established, and number of promotions, should be consistent with the scale and character of the naval establishment, which may not, for some years, require the distinction of flags, as in the British navy, viz. red, white, and blue, at the main, fore, or mizen, of each; making nine grades of admirals, rising in the order of the flags from blue to red.

I am, therefore, of opinion, that it is now expedient to establish the grade of rear admiral, without any distinction of flags, leaving the promotions to vice admiral and admiral for future services, and an enlarged establishment.

I am also of opinion, that the same principle which induced the establishment of brevet rank in the army, for gallant actions, meritorious conduct, or long service, is equally applicable to the navy, and cannot fail to excite to those actions it is intended to reward: but no officer, so brevetted, should be entitled to any additional pay or emoluments, except when commanding on separate service.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully,
sir, your obedient servant,

W. JONES.

The honorable Charles Tait,
Chairman of the naval committee of the senate.

Our Ministers at Ghent.

The following message was received from the president of the United States by Mr. Coles, his secretary.

MESSAGE.

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States.

I transmit for the information of congress, the communications last received from the ministers extraordinary, and plenipotentiary of the United States at Ghent, explaining the course and actual state of their negotiations with the plenipotentiaries of Great Britain.

JAMES MADISON.

December 1, 1814.

No. I.

Copy of a letter from Messrs. Adams, Bayard, Clay, Russell and Gallatin, to the secretary of state, dated

Ghent, 25th Oct. 1814.

SIR—We have the honor of transmitting herewith copies of all our correspondence with the British plenipotentiaries, since the departure of Mr. Dallas. Although the negotiation has not terminated so abruptly as we expected at that period that it would, we have no reason to retract the opinion which we then expressed, that no hopes of peace as likely to result from it, could be entertained. It is true, that the terms which the British government had so peremptorily prescribed at that time, have been apparently abandoned, and that the sine qua non then required as a preliminary to all discussion upon other topics, has been reduced to an article securing merely an Indian pacification, which we have agreed to accept, subject to the ratification or rejection of our government. But you will perceive, that our request for the exchange of a project of a treaty, has been eluded, and that in their last note, the British plenipotentiaries have advanced a demand not only new and inadmissible, but totally incompatible with their uniform previous declarations, that Great Britain had no view in this negotiation to any acquisition of territory. It will be perceived, that this new pretension was brought forward immediately after the accounts had been received that a British force had taken possession of all that part of the state of Massachusetts situate east of Penobscot river. The British plenipotentiaries have invariably referred to their government every note received from us, and waited the return of their messenger before they have transmitted to us their answer, and the whole tenor of the correspondence, as well as the manner in which it has been conducted on the part of the British government, have concurred to convince us, that their object has been delay: their motives for this policy we presume to have been to keep the alternative of peace, or of a protracted war, in their own hands, until the general arrangement of European affairs should be accomplished at the congress of Vienna, and until they could avail themselves of the advantages which they have anticipated from the success of their arms during the present campaign in America.

Although the sovereigns who had determined to be present at the congress of Vienna have been already several weeks assembled there, it does not appear by the last advices from that place, that the congress has been formally opened. On the contrary, by a declaration from the plenipotentiaries of the powers, who were parties to the peace of Paris of 30th May last, the opening of the congress appears to have been postponed to the first of November. A memorial is said to have been presented by the French ambassador, Talleyrand, in which it is declared, that France having returned to her boundaries in 1792, can recognize none of the aggrandizements of the other great powers of Europe since that period, although not intending to oppose them by war.

These circumstances indicate that the new basis for the political system of Europe, will not be so speedily settled as had been expected. The principle thus assumed by France is very extensive in its effects, and opens a field for negotiation much wider than had been anticipated. We think it does not promise an aspect of immediate tranquility to this continent, and that it will disconcert particularly the measures which Great Britain has been taking with regard to the future destination of this country, among others, and to which she has attached apparently much importance.

We have the honor to be, with great respect sir, your very humble servants,

AMERICAN NOTE.

The ministers plenipotentiary and extraordinary of the United States to the plenipotentiaries of his Britannic majesty.

GHENT, August 24, 1814.

The undersigned, ministers plenipotentiary and extraordinary from the United States of America, have given to the official note which they have had the honor of receiving from his Britannic majesty's plenipotentiaries the deliberate attention which the importance of its contents required, and have now that of transmitting to them their answer on the several points to which it refers.

They would present to the consideration of the British plenipotentiaries, that lord Castlereagh, in his letter of the 4th of November 1813, to the American secretary of state, pledges the faith of the British government that "they were willing to enter into discussion with the government of America for the conciliatory adjustment of the differences subsisting between the two states, with an earnest desire on their part to bring them to a favorable issue, upon principles of perfect reciprocity, not inconsistent with the established maxims of public law, and the maritime rights of the British empire." This fact alone might suffice to shew, that it ought not to have been expected that the American government, in acceding to this proposition, should have exceeded its terms, and furnished the undersigned with instructions authorising them to treat with the British plenipotentiaries respecting Indians situated within the boundaries of the United States. That such expectation was not entertained by the British government might also have been inferred from the explicit assurances which the British plenipotentiaries gave, on the part of their government, at the first conference which the undersigned had the honor of holding with them, that no events, subsequent to the first proposal for this negotiation, had, in any manner, varied either the disposition of the British government, that it might terminate in a peace honorable to both parties, or the terms upon which they would be willing to conclude it.

It is well known that the differences which unhappily subsist between G. Britain and the U. States, and which ultimately led to the present war, were wholly of a maritime nature, arising principally from the British orders in council, in relation to blockades; and from the impressment of mariners from on board of American vessels.—The boundary of the Indian territory had never been a subject of difference between the two countries. Neither the principles of reciprocity, the maxims of public law, nor the maritime rights of the British empire could require the permanent establishment of such boundary. The novel pretensions now advanced could no more have been anticipated by the government of the U. States, in forming instructions for this negotiation, than they seem to have been contemplated by that of G. Britain in November last in proposing it. Lord Castlereagh's note makes the termination of the war to depend on a conciliatory adjustment of the differ-ees then subsisting between the two states, and in no other condition whatever.

Nor could the American government have foreseen that Great Britain in order to obtain peace for the Indians, residing within the dominions of the United States, whom she had induced to take part with her in the war, would demand that they should be made parties to the treaty between the two nations, or that the boundaries of their lands should be permanently and irrevocably fixed by that treaty. Such a proposition is contrary to the acknowledged principles of public law, and the practice of all civilized nations, particularly of Great Britain and of the United States. It is not founded on reciprocity. It is unnecessary for the attainment of the object which it professes to have in view.

No maxim of public law has hitherto been more universally established among the powers of Europe possessing territories in America, and there is none to which Great Britain has more uniformly and inflexibly adhered, than that of suffering no interposition of a foreign power in the relations between the acknowledged sovereign of the territory, and the Indians situated upon it. Without the admission of this principle, there would be no intelligible meaning attached to stipulations establishing boundaries between the dominions in America of civilized nations possessing territories inhabited by Indian tribes.—Whatever may be the relations of Indians to the nation in whose territory they are thus acknowledged to reside, they cannot be considered as an independent power by the nation which has made such acknowledgment.

The territory of which G. Britain wishes now to dispose, is within the dominions of the United States, was solemnly acknowledged by herself in the treaty of peace of 1783, which established their boundaries, and by which she relinquished all claim to the government, propriety, and territorial rights within these boundaries. No condition respecting the Indians residing therein, was inserted in that treaty. No stipulation similar to that now proposed is to be found in any treaty made by G. Britain, or within the knowledge of the undersigned, by any other nation.

The Indian tribes for which Great Britain proposes now to stipulate have, themselves, acknowledged this principle. By the Greenville treaty of 1795, to which the British plenipotentiaries have here alluded, it is expressly stipulated, and the condition has been confirmed by every subsequent treaty, so late as the year 1810, "That the Indian tribes shall quietly enjoy their lands, hunting, planting, and dwelling thereon, so long as they please, without any molestation from the U. States; but that when those tribes, or any of them, shall be disposed to sell their lands, they shall be sold only to the U. States: that until such sale, the United States will protect all the said Indian tribes in the quiet enjoyment of their lands against all citizens of the United States, and against all other white persons who intrude on the same, and that the said Indian tribes again acknowledge themselves to be under the protection of the said United States, and of no other power whatever."

That there is no reciprocity in the proposed stipulation is evident. In prohibiting G. Britain and the United States from purchasing lands within a part of the dominion of the latter power, while it professes to take from G. Britain a privilege which she had not, it actually deprives the U. States of a right exclusively belonging to them.

The proposition is utterly unnecessary for the purpose of obtaining a pacification for the Indians residing within the territories of the United States. The undersigned have already had the honor of informing the British plenipotentiaries, that, under the system of liberal policy adopted by the United States in their relations with the Indians within their territories, an uninterrupted peace had subsisted from the year 1775, not only between the United States and all those tribes, but also amongst those tribes themselves for a longer period of time than ever had been known since the first settlement of North America. Against those Indians the United States have neither interest nor inclination to continue the war. They have nothing to ask of them but peace. Commissioners on their part have been appointed to conclude it, and an armistice was actually made last autumn with most of those tribes. The British government may again have induced some of them to take their side in the war, but peace with them will necessarily follow immediately a peace with G. Britain. To a provisional article similar to what has been stipulated in some former treaties, engaging that each party will treat for the Indians within its territories, include them in the peace, and use its best endeavors to prevent them from committing hostilities against the citizens or subjects of the other party, the undersigned might assent, and rely on the approbation and ratification of their government. They would also for the purpose of securing the duration of peace, and to prevent collisions which might interrupt it, propose a stipulation which should preclude the subjects or citizens of each nation, respectively from trading with the Indians residing in the territory of the other. But to surrender both the rights of sovereignty and of soil over nearly one third of the territorial dominions of the United States to a number of Indians not probably exceeding twenty thousand, the undersigned are so far from being instructed or authorized, that any arrangement for that purpose would be instantaneously rejected by their government.

Not only has this extraordinary demand been made a sine qua non, to be admitted without a discussion, and as a preliminary basis; but it is accompanied by others equally inadmissible, which the British plenipotentiaries state to be so connected with it, that they may reasonably influence the decision of the undersigned upon it, yet leaving them uninformed how far these other demands may also be insisted on as indispensable conditions of a peace.

As little are the undersigned instructed or empowered to accede to the propositions of the British government, in relation to the military occupation of the western lakes. If they have found the proposed interference of Great Britain in the concerns of Indians residing within the United States utterly incompatible with any established maxim of public law, they are no less at a loss to discover by what rule of perfect reciprocity the U. States can be required to renounce their equal right of maintaining a naval force upon those lakes, and of fortifying their own shores, while G. Britain reserves exclusively the corresponding rights to herself. That in point of military preparation, Great Britain in her possessions in North America, ever has been in a condition to be termed, with propriety, the weaker power, in comparison with the U. States, the undersigned believe to be incorrect in point of fact. In regard to the fortification of the shores, and to the forces actually kept on foot upon those frontiers, they believe the superiority to have always been on the side of G. Britain. If the proposal to dismantle the forts upon her shores, strike forever her military flag upon her lakes, and lay her whole frontier defenceless in the presence of her armed and fortified neighbor, had proceeded, not from Great Britain to the United States, but from the U. States to G. Britain, the undersigned may safely appeal to the bosoms of his Britannic majesty's plenipotentiaries for the feelings with which, not only in regard to the interests, but the honor of their nation, they would have received such a proposal. What would G. Britain herself say, if in relation to another frontier, where she has the acknowledged superiority of strength, it were proposed that she should be reduced to a condition even of equality with the United States?

The undersigned further perceive, that under the alledged purpose of opening a direct communication between two of the British provinces in America, the British government require a cession of territory forming a part of one of the states of the American union, and that they propose, without purpose specifically alledged, to draw the boundary line westward, not from the lake of the Woods, as it now is, but from lake Superior. It must be perfectly immaterial to the United States, whether the object of the British government, in demanding the dismemberment of the U. S. is to acquire territory, as such, or for purposes less liable, in the eyes of the world, to be ascribed to the desire of aggrandizement. Whatever the motive may be, and with whatever consistency views of conquest may be disclaimed, while demanding for herself, or for the Indians, a cession of territory more extensive than the whole island of Great Britain, the duty marked out for the undersigned is the same. They have no authority to cede any part of the territory of the U. States, and to no stipulation to that effect will they subscribe.

The conditions proposed by Great Britain have no relation to the subsisting differences between the two countries: they are inconsistent with acknowledged principles of public law: they are founded neither on reciprocity nor on any of the usual bases of negotiation, neither on that of the uti possidetis, or of status ante bellum: they would inflict the most vital injury on the United States, by dismembering their territory, by arresting their natural growth and increase of population, and by leaving their northern and western frontier equally exposed to British invasion and to Indian aggression: they are, above all, dishonorable to the United States, in demanding from them to abandon territory and a portion of their citizens, to admit a foreign interference in their domestic concerns, and to cease to exercise their natural rights on their own shores and in their own waters. A treaty concluded on such terms would be but an armistice. It cannot be supposed that America would long submit to conditions so injurious and degrading. It is impossible, in the natural course of events, that she should not, at the first favorable opportunity, recur to arms, for the recovery of her territory, of her rights, of her honor. Instead of settling existing differences, such a peace would only create new causes of war, sow the seeds of a permanent hatred, and lay the foundation of hostilities for an indefinite period.

Essentially pacific from her political institutions, from the habits of her citizens, from her physical situation, America reluctantly engaged in the war. She wishes for peace; but she wishes for it upon those terms of reciprocity, honorable to both countries, which can alone render it permanent. The causes of the war between the United States and Great Britain having disappeared by the maritime pacification of Europe, the government of the United States does not desire to continue it, in defence of abstract principles, which have, for the present, ceased to have any practical effect. The undersigned have been accordingly instructed to agree to its termination, both parties restoring whatever territory they may have taken, and both reserving all their rights, in relation to their respective seamen. To make the peace between the two nations solid and permanent, the undersigned were also instructed, and have been prepared to enter into the most amicable discussion of all those points on which differences or uncertainty had existed, and which might hereafter tend in any degree whatever to interrupt the harmony of the two countries, without, however, making the conclusion of the peace at all depend upon a successful result of the discussion.

It is, therefore, with deep regret, that the undersigned have seen that other views are entertained by the British government, and that new and unexpected pretensions are raised, which, if persisted in, must oppose an insuperable obstacle to a pacification. It is not necessary to refer such demands to the American government for its instruction. They will only be a fit subject of deliberation, when it becomes necessary to decide upon the expediency of an absolute surrender of national independence.

The undersigned request the British plenipotentiaries to accept the assurance of their high consideration.

BRITISH NOTE.

The British to the American commissioners.

GREENT, Sept. 4, 1814.

The undersigned have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of the note of the American plenipotentiaries, dated the 24th ultimo.

It is with unfeigned regret that the undersigned observe, both in the tone and substance of the whole note, so little proof of any disposition on the part of the government of the United States to enter into an amicable discussion of the several points submitted by the undersigned in their former communication. The undersigned are perfectly aware, that in bringing forward those points for consideration, and stating with so much frankness, as they did, the views with which they were proposed, they departed from the usual course of negotiating, by disclosing all the objects of their government, while those which the American government had in view were withheld; but in so doing they were principally actuated by a desire of bringing the negotiation as soon as possible to a favorable termination, and in some measure by their willingness to comply with the wishes expressed by the American plenipotentiaries themselves.

It is perfectly true that the war between his majesty and the United States, was declared by the latter power upon the pretence of maritime rights alleged to be asserted by Great Britain, and disputed by the United States.

If the war thus declared by the United States had been carried on by them for objects purely of a maritime nature, or if the attack which has been made on Canada had been for the purpose of diversion, or the way of defence against the British forces in that quarter, any question as to the boundaries of Canada might have been considered as unnecessary; but it is notorious to the whole world that the conquest of Canada, and its permanent annexation to the United States, was the declared object of the American government. If, in consequence of a different course of events on the continent of Europe, his majesty's government had been unable to reinforce the British armies in Canada, and the United States had obtained a decided superiority in that quarter, is there any person who doubts that they would have availed themselves of their situation to obtain on the side of Canada important cessions of territory, if not the entire abandonment of that country by Great Britain? Is the American government to be allowed to pursue, so far as its means will enable it, a system of acquisition and aggrandizement to the extent of annexing entire provinces to their dominions, and is his majesty to be precluded from availing himself of his means, so far as they will enable him, to retain those points which the valor of British arms may have placed in his power, because they happen to be situated within the territories allotted under former treaties to the government of the United States?

Such a principle of negotiation was never avowed antecedent to that of the revolutionary government of France.

If the policy of the United States had been essentially pacific, as the American plenipotentiaries assert it ought to be, from their political institutions, from the habits of their citizens, and from their physical situation, it might not have been necessary to propose the precautionary provisions now under discussion. That, of late years at least, the American government have been influenced by a very different policy; by a spirit of aggrandizement not necessary to their own security, but increasing with the extent of their empire, has been too clearly manifested by their progressive occupation of the Indian territories; by the acquisition of Louisiana; by the more recent attempt to wrest by force of arms from a nation in amity, the two Floridas; and, lastly, by the avowed intention of permanently annexing the Canadas to the United States.

If, then, the security of the British North American dominions requires any sacrifices on the part of the United States, they must be ascribed to the declared policy of that government in making the war not one of self-defence, nor for the redress of grievances, real or pretended, but a part of a system of conquest and aggrandizement.

The British government in its present situation, is bound in duty to endeavor to secure its North American dominions against those attempts at conquest, which the American government have avowed to be a principle of their policy, and which a which will undoubtedly be renewed, whenever any succeeding war between the two countries shall afford a prospect of renewing them with success.

The British plenipotentiaries proposed that the military possession of the lakes, from lake Ontario to lake Superior, should be secured to Great Britain, because the command of those lakes would afford to the American government the means of commencing a war in the heart of Canada, and because the command of them, on the part of Great Britain, has been shown by experience to be attended with no insecurity to the United States.

When the relative strength of the two powers in North America is considered, it should be recollected that the British dominions in that quarter do not contain a population of five hundred thousand souls, whereas the territory of the United States contains a population of more than seven millions; that the naval resources of the United States are at hand for attack, and that the naval resources of Great Britain are on the other side of the Atlantic.

The military possession of those lakes is not, therefore, necessary for the protection of the United States.

The proposal for allowing the territories on the southern banks of the lakes above mentioned to remain in the possession of the government of the United States, provided no fortifications should be erected on the shores, and no armament permitted on the waters, has been made, for the purpose of manifesting, that security and not acquisition of territory is the object of the British government, and that they have no desire to throw obstacles in the way of any commerce which the people of the United States may be desirous of carrying on upon the lakes in time of peace.

The undersigned, with the anxious wish to rectify all misunderstanding, have thus more fully explained the grounds upon which they brought forward the propositions contained in their former note respecting the boundaries of the British dominions in North America.

They do not wish to insist upon them beyond what the circumstances may fairly require. They are ready, amicably, to discuss the details of them with a view to the adoption of any modifications which the American plenipotentiaries, or their government, may have to suggest, if they are not incompatible with the object itself.

With respect to the boundary of the district of Maine, and that of the north-western frontier of the United States, the undersigned were not prepared to anticipate the objections contained in the note of the American plenipotentiaries, "that they were instructed to treat for the revision of their boundary lines," with the statement which they have subsequently made, that they had no authority to cede any part, however insignificant, of the territories of the United States, although the proposal left it open to them to demand an equivalent for such cession either in frontier or otherwise.

The American plenipotentiaries must be aware that the boundary of the district of Maine has never been correctly ascertained; that the one asserted at present by the American government, by which the direct communication between Halifax and Quebec becomes interrupted, was not in contemplation of the British plenipotentiaries who concluded the treaty of 1783, and that the greater part of the territory in question is actually unoccupied.

The undersigned are persuaded that an arrangement on this point might be easily made, if entered into with the spirit of conciliation, without any prejudice to the interests of the district in question.

As the necessity of fixing some boundary for the north-western frontier has been mutually acknowledged, a proposal for a discussion on that subject cannot be considered as a demand for a cession of territory, unless the United States are prepared to assert that there is no limit to their territories in that direction, and that availing themselves of the geographical error upon which that part of the treaty of 1783 was founded, they will acknowledge no boundary whatever, then unquestionably any proposition to fix one, be it what it may, must be considered as demanding a large cession of territory from the United States.

Is the American government prepared to assert such an unlimited right, so contrary to the evident intention of the treaty itself? Or, is his majesty's government to understand that the American plenipotentiaries are willing to acknowledge the boundary from the Lake of the Woods to the Mississippi (the arrangement made by a convention in 1803, but not ratified) as that by which their government is ready to abide?

The British plenipotentiaries are instructed to accept favorably such a proposition, or to discuss any other line of boundary which may be submitted for consideration.

It is with equal astonishment and regret the undersigned find that the American plenipotentiaries have not only declined signing any provisional article, by which the Indian nations who have taken part with Great Britain in the present contest may be included in the peace, and may have a boundary assigned to them, but have also thought proper to express surprise at any proposition on the subject having been advanced.

The American plenipotentiaries state, that their government could not have expected such a discussion, and appear resolved, at once, to reject any proposition on this head; representing it as a demand contrary to the acknowledged principles of public law, tantamount to a cession of one third of the territorial dominions of the United States, and required to be admitted without discussion.

The proposition which is thus represented is, that the Indian nations, which have been during the war in alliance with Great Britain, should at its termination be included in the pacification; and, with a view to their permanent tranquility and security, that the British government is willing to take as a basis of an article on the subject of a boundary for those nations, the stipulations which the American government contracted in 1793, subject, however, to modifications.

After the declaration, publicly made to those Indian nations by the governor general of Canada, that Great Britain would not desert them, could the American government really persuade itself that no proposition relating to those nations would be advanced, and did lord Castlereagh's note of the 4th November, 1813, imply so great a sacrifice of honor, or exclude from discussion every subject, except what immediately related to the maritime questions referred to in it?

When the undersigned assured the American plenipotentiaries of the anxious wish of the British government that the negotiation might terminate in a peace honorable to both parties, it could not have been imagined that the American plenipotentiaries would thence conclude, that his majesty's government was prepared to abandon the Indian nations to their fate, nor could it have been supposed that the American government would have considered it derogatory to its honor to admit a proposition by which the tranquility of those nations might be secured.

The treaty of Greenville established the boundary ries between the United States and the indian nations. The American plenipotentiaries must be aware, that the war which has since broken out, has abrogated that treaty. Is it contrary to the established principles of public law for the British government to propose, on behalf of its allies, that this treaty, shall, on the pacification, be considered subject to such modifications as the case may render necessary? Or is it unreasonable to propose, that this stipulation should be amended, and that on that foundation some arrangements should be made which would provide for the existence of a neutral power between Great Britain and the United States, calculated to secure to both a longer continuance of the blessings of peace?

So far was that specific proposition respecting the indian boundaries from being insisted upon in the note, or in the conference which preceded it, as one to be admitted without discussion, that it would have been difficult to use terms of greater latitude, or which appeared more adapted, not only not to preclude but to invite discussion.

If the basis proposed could convey away one third of the territory of the United States, the American government itself must have conveyed it away by the Greenville treaty of 1795.

It is impossible to read that treaty without remarking how inconsistent the present pretensions of the American government are, with its preamble and provisions. The boundary line between the lands of the United States and those of the indian nations, is therein expressly defined. The general character of the treaty, is that of a treaty with independent nations; and the very stipulation which the American plenipotentiaries refer to, that the indian nations should sell their lands only to the United States, tends to prove that, but for that stipulation, the indians had a general right to dispose of them.

The American government has now for the first time, in effect, declared that all indian nations within its line of demarkation are its subjects, living there upon sufferance, on lands which it also claims the exclusive right of acquiring, thereby menacing the final extinction of those nations.

Against such a system the undersigned must formally protest. The undersigned repeat, that the terms on which the proposition has been made for assigning to the indian nations some boundary, manifest no unwillingness to discuss any other proposition directed to the same object, or even a modification of that which is offered. Great Britain is ready to enter into the same engagements with respect to the indians living within her line of demarkation, as that which is proposed to the United States. It can, therefore, only be from a complete misapprehension of the proposition, that it can be represented as being not reciprocal. Neither can it, with any truth, be represented as contrary to the acknowledged principles of public law, as derogatory to the honor, or inconsistent with the rights of the American government, nor as a demand required to be admitted without discussion.

After this full exposition of the sentiments of his majesty's government on the points above stated, it will be for the American plenipotentiaries to determine whether they are ready now to continue the negotiations; whether they are disposed to refer to their government for further instructions; or, lastly, whether they will take upon themselves the responsibility of breaking off the negotiation altogether.

The undersigned request the American plenipotentiaries to accept the assurances of their high consideration.

NO. IV

The American to the British commissioner, &c.

Green, Sept. 9th 1814.

The undersigned have had the honor to receive the note of his Britannic majesty's plenipotentiaries, dated the 4th inst. If in the tone, or substance of the former note of the undersigned, the British commissioners have perceived in it proof of any disposition on the part of the American government, for a discussion of some of the propositions advanced in the first note, which the undersigned had the honor of receiving from them, they will ascribe it to the nature of the propositions themselves, to their apparent incompatibility with the assurances in Lord Castlereagh's letter to the American secretary of state, proposing this negotiation, and with the solemn assurances of the British plenipotentiaries themselves, to the undersigned, at their first conferences with them.

The undersigned, in reference to an observation of the British plenipotentiaries, must be allowed to say, that the objects which the government of the United States had in view, have not been withheld.

The subjects considered as suitable for discussion were fairly brought forward, in the conference of the 9th ult. and the terms on which the U. States were willing to conclude the peace, were frankly and expressly declared in the note of the undersigned, dated the 24th ultimo. It had been confidently hoped that the nature of those terms, so evidently framed in a spirit of conciliation, would have induced Great Britain to adopt them as the basis of a treaty; and it is with deep regret that the undersigned, if they have rightly understood the meaning of the last note of the British plenipotentiaries, perceive that they still insist on the exclusive military possession of the lakes, and on a permanent boundary and independent territory for the Indians residing within the dominions of the United States.

The first demand is grounded on the supposition, that the American government has manifested, by its proceedings towards Spain, by the acquisition of Louisiana, by the purchases of Indian lands, and by an avowed intention of permanently annexing the Canadas to the United States, a spirit of aggrandizement and conquest, which justifies the demand of extraordinary sacrifices from them, to provide for the security of the British possessions in America.

In the observations which the undersigned felt it their duty to make on the new demands of the British government, they confined their animadversions to the nature of the demands themselves; they did not seek for illustrations of the policy of Great Britain in her conduct, in various quarters of the globe, towards other nations, for she was not accountable to the United States. Yet the undersigned will say, that their government has ever been ready to arrange, in the most amicable manner, with Spain, the questions respecting the boundaries of Louisiana and Florida, and that of the indemnities acknowledged by Spain due to American citizens. How the peaceable acquisition of Louisiana, or the purchase of lands within the acknowledged territories of the United States, both made by fair and voluntary treaties for satisfactory equivalents, can be ascribed to a spirit of conquest dangerous to their neighbors, the undersigned are altogether at a loss to understand.

Nor has the conquest of Canada, and its permanent annexation to the United States, been the declared object of their government. From the commencement of the war to the present time, the American government has been always willing to make peace, without obtaining any cession of territory, and on the sole condition that the maritime questione might be satisfactorily arranged. Such was their disposition in the month of July, 1812, when they instructed Mr. Russell to make the proposal of an armistice in the month of October of the same year when Mr. Monroe answered admiral Warren's proposals to the same effect; in April, 1813, when instructions were given to three of the undersigned then appointed to treat of peace, under the mediation of Russia; and in January, 1814, when the instructions under which the undersigned are now acting, were prepared.

The proposition of the British plenipotentiaries is, that, in order to secure the frontier of Canada against attack, the United States should leave their own without defence; and it seems to be forgotten, that if their superior population, and the proximity of their resources give them any advantage in that quarter, it is balanced by the great difference between the military establishments of the two nations. No sudden invasion of Canada by the United States could be made, without leaving on their Atlantic shores, and on the ocean, exposed to the great superiority of the British force, a mass of American property far more valuable than Canada. In her relative superior force to that of the U. States in every other quarter, Great Britain may find a pledge much more efficacious for the safety of a single vulnerable point, than in stipulations ruinous to the interests and degrading to the honor of America. The best security for the possessions of both countries will, however, be found in an equal and solid peace; in a mutual respect for the rights of each other, and in the cultivation of a friendly understanding between them. If there be any source of jealousy in relation to Canada itself, it will be found to exist solely in the undue interference of traders and agents, which may be easily removed by proper restrictions.

The only American forts on the Lakes known to have been, at the commencement of the negotiation, held by British force, are Michilimackinac and Niagara. As the U. S. were, at the same time, in possession of Amherstburg and the adjacent country, it is not perceived that the mere occupation of those two forts could give any claim to his Britannic majesty to large cessions of territory, founded upon the right of conquest; and the undersigned may be permitted to add, that even if the chances of war should yield to the British arms a momentary possession of other parts of the territories of the U. States such events would not alter their views with regard to the terms of peace to which they would give their consent. Without recurring to examples drawn from the revolutionary governments of France, or to a more recent and illustrious triumph of fortitude in adversity, they have been taught by their own history that the occupation of their principal cities would produce no dependency, nor induce their submission to the dismemberment of their empire, or to the abandonment of any one of the rights which constitute a part of their national independence.

The general position, that it was consistent with the principle of public law, and with the practice of civilized nations, to include allies in a treaty of peace, and to provide for their security, never was called in question by the undersigned. But they have denied the right of Great Britain, according to those principles and her own practice, to interfere in any manner with Indian tribes residing within the territories of the United States, as acknowledged by herself, to consider such tribes as her allies, or to treat for them with the United States. They will not repeat the facts and arguments already brought forward by them in support of this position, and which remain unanswered. The observations made by the British plenipotentiaries on the treaty of Greenville, and their assertion that the United States now, for the first time, deny the absolute independence of the Indian tribes, and claim the exclusive right of purchasing their lands, require, however, some notice.

If the United States had now asserted, that the Indians within their boundaries, who have acknowledged the United States as their only protectors were their subjects, living only at subsistence in their lands, far from being the first in making that assertion, they would only have followed the example on the principles, uniformly and invariably asserted in substance, and frequently avowed in express terms by the British government itself. What was the meaning of all the colonial charters granted by the British monarchy, from that of Virginia, by Elizabeth, to that of Georgia, by the immediate predecessor of the present king, if the Indians were the sovereigns and proprietors of the lands bestowed by those charters? What was the meaning of that article in the treaty of Utrecht, by which the five nations were described, in terms, as subject to the dominion of Great Britain? or that of the treaty with the Onerokees, by which it was declared that the king of Great Britain granted them the privilege to live where they pleased, if those subjects were independent sovereigns, and if these tenants, at the license of the British king, were the rightful lords of the lands where he granted them permission to live? What was the meaning of that proclamation of his present Britannic majesty issued in 1763, declaring all purchases of lands from the Indians null and void, unless made by treaties held under the sanction of his majesty's government, if the Indians had the right to sell their lands to whom they pleased? What was the meaning of boundary lines of American territories, in all the treaties of Great Britain with other European powers having American possessions, particularly in the treaty of 1763, by which she acquired from France the sovereignty and possession of the Canadas; in her treaty of peace with the United States in 1783; nay, what is the meaning of the north western boundary line now proposed by the British commissioners themselves, if it is the rightful possession and sovereignty of independent Indians, of which these boundaries dispose? Is it, indeed, necessary to ask, whether Great Britain ever has permitted, or would permit, any foreign nation, or without her consent, any of her subjects, to acquire lands from the Indians, in the territories of the Hudson bay company, or in Canada? In formally protesting against this system, it is not against a novel pretension of the American government, it is against the most solemn acts of their own sovereigns, against the royal proclamations, charters, and treaties of Great Britain, for more than two centuries, from the first settlement of North America to the present day, that the British plenipotentiaries protest.

From the rigor of this system, however, as practised by G. Britain, and all other European powers in America, the humane and liberal policy of the United States has voluntarily relaxed. A celebrated writer on the laws of nations, to whose authority British jurists have taken particular satisfaction in appealing, after stating, in the most explicit manner, the legitimacy of colonial settlements in America, the exclusion of all rights of uncivilized Indian tribes, has taken occasion to praise the first settlers of New England, and the founder of Pennsylvania, in having purchased of the Indians the lands they resolved to cultivate notwithstanding their being furnished with a charter from their sovereign. It is this example, which the United States, since they became, by their independence, the sovereigns of the territory, have adopted and organized into a political system. Under that system, the Indians residing within the United States are so far independent, that they live under their own customs, and not under the laws of the United States; that their rights upon the lands where they inhabit, or hunt, are secured to them by boundaries defined in amicable treaties between the United States and themselves; and that whenever those boundaries were varied, it is also by amicable and voluntary treaties, by which they receive from the United States ample compensation for every right they have to the lands ceded by them. They are so far dependent as not to have the right to dispose of their lands to private persons, nor to any power other than the United States, and to be under their protection alone, and not under that of any other power. Whether called subjects or by whatever name designated, such is the relation between them and the United States.—That relation is neither asserted now for the first time, nor did it originate with the treaty of Greenville. These principles have been uniformly recognized by the Indians themselves, not only by that treaty, but in all the other previous as well as subsequent treaties, between them and the United States.

The treaty of Greenville neither took from the Indians the right, which they had not, of selling lands within the jurisdiction of the United States to foreign governments or subjects, nor ceded to them the right of exercising exclusive jurisdiction within the boundary line assigned. It was merely declaratory of the public law in relation to the parties, founded on principles previously and universally recognized. It left to the United States the rights of exercising sovereignty and of acquiring soil, and bears no analogy to the proposition of Great Britain which requires the abandonment of both.

The British plenipotentiaries state in their last note, that Great Britain is ready to enter into the same engagement with respect to the Indians living within her line of demarkation, as that which is proposed to the United States.—The undersigned will not dwell on the immense inequality of value between the two territories, which under such an arrangement, would be assigned, by each nation respectively to the Indians, and which alone would make the reciprocity merely nominal. The condition which would be thus imposed on G. Britain not to acquire lands in Canada from the Indians, would be productive of no advantage to the United States, and is, therefore, no equivalent for the sacrifice required of them. They do not consider that it belongs to the United States in any respect to interfere with the concerns of Great Britain in her American possessions, or with her policy towards the Indians residing there: and they cannot consent to any interference, on the part of Great Britain, with their own concerns, and particularly with the Indians living within their territories. It may be the interest of G. Britain to limit her settlements in Canada to their present extent, and to leave the country to the West a perpetual wilderness, to be forever inhabited by scattered tribes of hunters: but it would inflict a vital injury on the U. States to have a line run through her territory, beyond which her settlements should forever be precluded from extending, thereby arresting the natural growth of her population and strength; placing the Indians substantially, by virtue of the proposed guarantee, under the protection of Great Britain; dooming them to perpetual barbarism, and leaving an extensive frontier forever exposed to their savage incursions.

With respect to the mere question of peace with the Indians, the undersigned have already explicitly assured the British plenipotentiaries that so far as it depended on the United States, it would immediately and necessarily follow a peace with Great Britain. If this be her sole object, no provision in the treaty to that effect is necessary. Provided the Indians will now consent to it, peace will immediately be made with them, and they will be reinstated in the same situation in which they stood before the commencement of hostilities. Should a continuance of the war compel the United States to alter their policy towards the Indians, who may still take the part of Great Britain, they alone must be responsible for the consequences of her own act in having induced them to withdraw themselves from the protection of the United States. The employment of savages, whose known rule of warfare is the indiscriminate torture and butchery of women, children, and prisoners, is itself a departure from the principles of humanity observed between all civilized and christian nations, even in war.

The United States have constantly protested, and still protest against it as an unjustifiable aggravation of the calamities and horrors of war.—Of the peculiar atrocities of Indian warfare, the allies of Great Britain in whose behalf she now demands sacrifices of the United States, have during the present war, shewn many deplorable examples. Among them, the massacre in cold blood, of wounded prisoners, and the refusal of the rights of burial to the dead, under the eyes of British officers who could only plead their inability to control these savage auxiliaries, have been repeated, and are notorious to the world. The United States might at all times have employed the same kind of force against Great Britain, to a greater extent than it was in her power to employ it against them; but from their reluctance to resort to means so abhorrent to the natural feelings of humanity, they abstained from the use of them until compelled to the alternative of employing themselves Indians, who otherwise would have been drawn into the ranks of their enemies.—The undersigned suggesting to the British plenipotentiaries the propriety of an article by which G. Britain and the United States should reciprocally stipulate never hereafter, if they should be again at war, to employ savages in it, believe that it would be infinitely more honorable to the humanity and christian temper of both parties, more advantageous to the Indians themselves, and better adapted to secure their permanent peace, tranquillity, and progressive civilization, than the boundary proposed by the British plenipotentiaries.

With regard to the cession of a part of the District of Maine, as to which the British plenipotentiaries are unable to reconcile the objections made by the undersigned with their previous declaration, they have the honor to observe, that at the conference of the 8th ult. the British plenipotentiaries stated as one of the subjects suitable for discussion, a revision of the boundary line between the British and American territories, with a view to prevent uncertainty and dispute: and that it was on the point thus stated, that the undersigned declared that they were provided with instructions from their government; a declaration which did not imply that they were instructed to make any cession of territory in any quarter, or agree to a revision of the line, or to any exchange of territory, where no uncertainty or dispute existed.

The undersigned perceive no uncertainty or matter of doubt in the treaty of 1783, with respect to the part of the boundary of the District of Maine which would be affected by the proposal of Great Britain on that subject. They never have understood that the British plenipotentiaries who signed that treaty, had contemplated a boundary different from that fixed by the treaty; and which requires nothing more, in order to be definitely ascertained, than to be surveyed in conformity with its provisions. This subject not having been a matter of uncertainty or dispute, the undersigned are not instructed upon it; and they can have no authority to cede any part of the state of Massachusetts, even for what the British government might consider a fair equivalent.

In regard to the boundary of the northwestern frontier, so soon as the proposition of Indian boundary is disposed of, the undersigned have no objection, with the explanation given by the British plenipotentiaries, in their last note, to discuss the subject.

The undersigned, in their former note, stated with frankness, and will now repeat, that the two propositions, 1st, of assigning in the proposed treaty of peace a definite boundary to the Indians living within the limits of the United States, beyond which boundary they should stipulate not to acquire, by purchase or otherwise, any territory; 2dly, of securing the exclusive military possession of the lakes to Great Britain, are both inadmissible; and that they cannot subscribe to, and would deem it useless to refer to their government, any arrangement, even provisional, containing either of these propositions. With this understanding, the undersigned are now ready to continue the negotiation; and as they have already expressed, to discuss all the points of difference, or which might hereafter tend in any degree to interrupt the harmony of the two countries.

The undersigned request the British plenipotentiaries to accept the assurance of their high consideration.

No. V.

The British to the American commissioners.

Ghent, Sept. 19th, 1814.

The undersigned have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of the note addressed to them by the American plenipotentiaries on the 9th inst.

On the greater part of that note, the undersigned have no intention to make comments, having proposed to themselves throughout the negotiation to avoid all unnecessary discussions, more especially when tending to create irritation.

On the question of the north-western frontiers, they are happy to find that no material difficulty is likely to arise.

With respect to the boundary of the district of Maine, the undersigned observe with regret, that although the American plenipotentiaries have acknowledged themselves to be instructed to discuss a revision of the boundary line, with a view to prevent uncertainty and dispute, yet, by assuming an exclusive right at once to decide what is or is not a subject of uncertainty and dispute, they have rendered their powers nugatory or inadmissibly partial in their operation.

After the declaration made by the American plenipotentiaries, that the United States will admit of no line of boundary between their territory and that of the Indian nations, because the natural growth and population of the United States would be thereby arrested, it becomes unnecessary further to insist on the proof of a spirit of aggrandizement afforded by the purchase of Louisiana from France, against the known conditions on which it had been ceded by Spain to that country, or the hostile seizure of a great part of the Floridas, under a pretence of a dispute respecting the boundary.

The reason given by the American plenipotentiaries for this declaration, equally applies to the assignment of a boundary to the United States on any side, with whatever view proposed; and the unintended nature of the pretension would alone have justified Great Britain in seeking more effectual securities against its application to Canada than any which the undersigned have had the honor to propose.

Had the American plenipotentiaries been instructed on the subject of Canada, they would not have asserted that its permanent annexation had not been the declared object of their government. It has been distinctly avowed to be such at different times, particularly by two American generals on their respective invasions of Canada. If the declaration first made had been disapproved, it would not have been repeated. The declarations here referred to are to be found in the proclamation of general Hull, in July 1812, and of general Smyth, in November, 1812, copies of which are herewith annexed.

It must be also from the want of instructions that the American plenipotentiaries have been led to assert that Great Britain has induced the Indians to withdraw from the protection of the United States. The government of the United States cannot have forgotten that Great Britain, so far from inducing the Indians to withdraw themselves from the protection of the United States, gave the earliest information of the intention of those nations to invade the United States, and exerted herself, though without success, to prevent and appease their hostility. The Indian nations, however, having experienced, as they thought, oppression, instead of protection from the United States, declared war against them previously to the declaration of war by that country against Great Britain. The treaty by which the Indians placed themselves under the protection of the United States, is now abrogated, and the American government cannot be entitled to claim, as a right, the renewal of an article in a treaty, which has no longer any existence. The Indian nations are therefore no longer to be considered as under the protection of the United States, (whatever may be the import of that term) and it can only be on the ground that they are regarded as subjects, that the American plenipotentiaries can be authorized to deny the right of Great Britain to interfere on their behalf in the negotiations for peace. To any such claim, it is repeated, that the treaties concluded with them, and particularly that of Greenville, are in direct opposition.

It is not necessary to recur to the manner in which the territory of the United States was at first settled, in order to decide, whether the Indian nations, the original inhabitants of America, shall have some spot assigned to them, where they may be permitted to live in tranquility; nor whether their tranquility can be secured without preventing an uninterrupted system of encroachment upon them under the pretence of purchase.

If the American plenipotentiaries are authorized peremptorily to deny the right of the British government to interfere with the pacification of the Indian nations, and for that reason refuse all negotiations on the subject, the undersigned are at a loss to understand, upon what principle it was, that at the conference of the 9th ultimo, the American plenipotentiaries invited discussion on the subject, and added, that it was not possible for them to decide without discussion, whether an article could be framed which should be mutually satisfactory, and to which they should think themselves, under their discretionary powers, warranted in acceding.

The undersigned must further observe, that if the American government has not furnished their plenipotentiaries with any instructions since January last, when the general pacification of Europe could not have been immediately in contemplation, this subsequent silence, after an event so calculated (even in the view which the American plenipotentiaries have taken of it, in their note of the 24th ult.) to influence the negotiation, is, to say the least, no proof of a sincere desire to bring it to a favorable conclusion. The British government has entered into the negotiation with an anxious wish to effect an amicable arrangement. After convulsions unexampled in their nature, extent, and duration, the civilized world has need of repose. To obtain this in Europe, Great Britain has made considerable sacrifices. To complete the work of general pacification, it is her earnest wish to establish a peace with the United States, and in her endeavors to accomplish this object, to manifest the same principles of moderation and forbearance; but it is utterly inconsistent with her practice and her principles ever to abandon in her negotiations for peace those who have co-operated with her in war.

The undersigned, therefore, repeat that the British government is willing to sign a treaty of peace with the United States on terms honorable to both parties. It has not offered any terms which the U. States can justly represent as derogatory to their honor, nor can it be induced to accede to any which are injurious to its own. It is on this ground that the undersigned are authorized distinctly to declare, that they are instructed not to sign a treaty of peace with the plenipotentiaries of the U. States, unless the Indian nations are included in it, and restored to all the rights, privileges and territories which they enjoyed in the year 1811, previous to the commencement of the war, by virtue of the treaty of Grenville, and the treaties subsequently concluded between them and the United States. From this point the British plenipotentiaries cannot depart.

They are further instructed to offer for discussion an article by which the contracting parties shall reciprocally bind themselves, according to boundaries to be agreed upon, not to purchase the lands occupied by the Indians within their respective lines of demarcation. By making this engagement subject to revision at the expiration of a given period, it is hoped that the objection to the establishment of a boundary beyond which the settlement of the U. States should be forever excluded, may be effectually obviated.

The undersigned have never stated that the exclusive military possession on the lakes, however conducive they are satisfied it would be to a good understanding between the two countries, without endangering the security of the United States, was to be considered as a sine qua non in the negotiation. Whenever the question relative to the pacification of the Indian nations (which, subject to the explanations already given, is a sine qua non) shall be adjusted, the undersigned will be authorized to make a final proposition on the subject of Canadian boundaries, so entirely founded on principles of moderation and justice, that they feel confident it cannot be rejected. This proposition will be distinctly stated by the undersigned, upon receiving an assurance from the American plenipotentiaries that they consider themselves authorized to conclude a provisional article on the subject, and upon their previously consenting to include the Indian nations in the treaty, in the manner above described.

The undersigned avail themselves of this opportunity of renewing to the American plenipotentiaries, the assurance of their high consideration.

No. VI.*

THE AMERICAN TO THE BRITISH COMMISSIONERS.

Ghent, Sept 26, 1814.

In replying to the note which the undersigned have had the honor of receiving from his Britannic majesty's plenipotentiaries, dated on the 19th inst. they are happy to concur with them in the sentiment of avoiding unnecessary discussions, especially such as may have a tendency to create irritation. They had hoped that, in the same spirit, the British plenipotentiaries would not have thought allusions again necessary to transactions foreign to this negotiation, relating to the United States, and other independent nations, and not suitable for discussion between the United States and Great Britain. The observation made with respect to Louisiana is the more extraordinary, as the cession of that province to the United States was, at the time communicated to the British government, who expressed their entire satisfaction with it, and has subsequently received the solemn sanction of Spain herself. The undersigned will further say, that whenever the transactions of the United States, in relation to the boundaries of Louisiana and Florida, shall be a proper subject of discussion, they will be found not only susceptible of complete justification, but will demonstrate the moderation and forbearance of the American government, and their undeviating respect for the rights of their neighbors.

The undersigned are far from assuming the exclusive right to decide, what is, or is not, a subject of uncertainty and dispute, with regard to the boundary of the district of Maine. But until the British plenipotentiaries shall have shown in what respect the part of that boundary which would be affected by their proposal, is such a subject, the undersigned may be permitted to assert that it is not.

The treaty of 1783 described the boundary as "a line to be drawn along the middle of the river St. Croix, from its mouth in the bay of Fundy, to its source, and from its source directly north to the highlands which divide the rivers that fall into the Atlantic ocean from those which fall into the river St. Lawrence, and thence along the said highlands to the northwesternmost head of Connecticut river."

Doubts having arisen as to the St. Croix designated in the treaty of 1783, a provision was made by that of 1794 for ascertaining it and it may be fairly inferred, from the limitation of the article to that sole object, that even in the judgment of Great Britain, no other subject of controversy existed in relation to the extension of the boundary line from the source of that river. That river and its source having been accordingly ascertained, the undersigned are prepared to propose the appointment of commissioners by the two governments, to extend the line to the highlands, conformably to the treaty of 1783. The proposal, however, of the British plenipotentiaries was not to ascertain, but to vary those lines in such manner as to secure a direct communication between Quebec and Halifax; an alteration which could not be effected without a cession by the United States to Great Britain of all that portion of the state of Massachusetts intervening between the province of New Brunswick and Quebec, although unquestionably included within the boundary lines fixed by that treaty. Whether it was contemplated on the part of Great Britain to obtain the cession, with or without an equivalent in frontier or other wise, the undersigned, in stating that they were not instructed or authorised to treat on the subject of cession, have not declined to discuss any matter of uncertainty of dispute which the British plenipotentiaries may point out to exist, respecting the boundaries in that or in any other quarter, and are, therefore, not liable to the imputation of having rendered their powers on the subject nugatory or inadmissibly partial in their operation.

The British plenipotentiaries consider the undersigned as having declared, "that the United States will admit of no line of boundary between their territory and that of the Indian nations because the natural growth and population of the United States would be thereby arrested." The undersigned, on the contrary, expressly stated in their last note "that the lands inhabited by the Indians were secured to them by boundaries, defined in amicable treaties between them and the United States;" but they did refuse to assign, in a treaty of peace with Great Britain, a definitive and permanent boundary to the Indians, living within the limits of the United States. On this subject, the undersigned have no hesitation in avowing, that the United States, while intending never to acquire lands from the Indians otherwise than peaceably, and with their free consent, are fully determined in that manner, progressively, and in proportion as their growing population may require, to reclaim from the state of nature and to bring into cultivation every portion of the territory contained within their acknowledged boundaries. In thus providing for the support of millions of civilized beings, they will not violate any dictate of justice or humanity, for they will not only give to the few thousand savages, scattered over that territory, an ample equivalent for any right they may surrender, but will always leave them the possession of lands more than they can cultivate, and more than adequate to their subsistence, comfort and enjoyment by cultivation.

If this be a spirit of aggrandizement, the undersigned are prepared to admit, in that sense, its existence; but they must deny that it affords the slightest proof of an intention not to respect the boundaries between them and European nations, or of a desire to encroach upon the territories of G. Britain. If, in the progress of their increasing population, the American people must grow in strength proportioned to their numbers, the undersigned will hope that Great Britain, far from repining at the prospect, will contemplate it with satisfaction. They will not suppose that that government will avow, as the basis of their policy towards the United States, the system of arresting their natural growth within their own territories, for the sake of preserving a perpetual desert for savages. If G. Britain has made sacrifices to give repose to the civilized world in Europe, no sacrifice is required from her by the United States to complete the work of general pacification. This negotiation at least evinces, on their part, no disposition to claim any other right, than that of preserving their independence entire, and of governing their own territories without foreign interference.

Of the two proclamations, purported copies of which the British plenipotentiaries have thought proper to enclose with their last note, the undersigned might content themselves with remarking, that neither of them is the act of the American government. They are enabled however to add, with perfect confidence, that neither of them was authorized or approved by the government. The undersigned are not disposed to consider as the act of the British government, the proclamation of admiral Cochrane, herewith enclosed, exciting a portion of the population of the U. States, under the promise of military employment or of free settlement in the West Indies, to treachery and rebellion. The undersigned very sincerely regret to be obliged to say, that an irresistible mass of evidence consisting principally of the correspondence of British officers and agents, part only of which has already been published in America, establishes beyond all rational doubt, the fact, that a constant system of excitement to those hostilities was pursued by the British traders and agents, who had access to the Indians, not only without being discountenanced, but with frequent encouragement by the British authorities; and that if they ever dissuaded the Indians from commencing hostilities, it was only by urging them, as in prudence, to suspend their attacks until G. Britain could recognize them as her allies in the war.

When, in the conference of the 9th ult. the undersigned invited discussion upon the proposal of Indian pacification and boundary, as well as upon all the subjects presented by the British plenipotentiaries for discussion, they expressly stated their motives to be, 1st. to ascertain by discussion whether an article on the subject could be formed to which they could subscribe, and which would be satisfactory to the British plenipotentiaries; and 2dly, that if no such article could be formed, the American government might be informed of the views of Great Britain upon that point, and the British government of the objections on the part of the United States, to any such arrangement.—The undersigned have, in fact, already proposed no less than three articles on the subject, all of which they view as better calculated to secure peace and tranquility to the Indians, than any one of the proposals for that purpose, made by the British plenipotentiaries.

The undersigned had repeated their assurances to the British plenipotentiaries, that peace, so far as it depended on the United States, would immediately follow a peace with Great Britain, and added, that the Indians would thereby be reinstated in the same situation in which they stood before the commencement of hostilities. The British plenipotentiaries insist, in their last note, that the Indian nations shall be included in the treaty of peace between Great Britain and the United States, and be restored to all the rights, privileges, and territories which they enjoyed in the year 1811, previous to their commencement of the war, by virtue of the treaty of Greenville, and the treaties subsequently concluded between them and the United States. Setting aside the subject of boundary, which is presented as for discussion only, there is no apparent difference with respect to the object in view; the pacification and tranquility of the Indians, and placing them in the same situation in which they stood before the war, all which will be equally obtained in the manner proposed by the undersigned, and the only point of real difference is, the British plenipotentiaries insist that it should be done by including the Indians, as allies of Great Britain, in the treaty of peace between her and the U. States.

The U. States cannot consent that Indians residing within their boundaries, as acknowledged by G. Britain, shall be included in the treaty of peace, in any manner which will recognize them as independent nations, whom Great Britain, having obtained this recognition, would hereafter, have the right to consider in every respect, as such. Thus to recognize these Indians as independent and sovereign nations, would take from the United States, and transfer to those Indians, all the rights of soil and sovereignty over the territory which they inhabit; and this being accomplished through the agency of G.

Britain, would place them effectually and exclusively under her protection, instead of being, as heretofore, under that of the United States. It is not perceived in what respect such a provision would differ from an absolute cession by the U. States of the extensive territory in question.

The British plenipotentiaries have repeated the assertion, that the treaty by which the Indians placed themselves under the protection of the U. States, was abrogated by the war; and thence infer, that they are no longer to be considered as under the protection of the United States, whatever may be the import of the term; and that the right of G. Britain to interfere in their behalf in the negotiation of peace, can only be denied on the ground that they are regarded as subjects. In point of fact, several of the tribes, parties to the treaty of Greenville, have constantly been, and still are, at peace with the U. States. Whether that treaty be or be not abrogated, is a question not necessary to be now discussed. The right of the United States to the protection of the Indians within their boundaries, was not acquired by that treaty; it was a necessary consequence of the sovereignty and independence of the United States. Previous to that time the Indians living within the same territory, were under the protection of his Britannic majesty, as its sovereign. The undersigned may refer the British plenipotentiaries to all the acts of their own government, relative to the subject, for proof, that it has always considered this right of protection as one of the rights of sovereignty, which it needed no Indian treaty to confer, and which the abrogation of no Indian treaty could divest. They will particularly bring to their recollection, that when a similar proposition of considering Indian tribes as independent nations, to serve as a barrier between the French and English territories, was made by France to England, it was immediately rejected, by a minister to whom the British nation is accustomed to look back with veneration, and rejected on the express ground, that the king would not renounce his right to protection over the Indians within his dominions. But whatever the relation of the Indians to the United States may be, and whether under their protection or not, Great Britain having by the treaty of 1783, recognized the sovereignty of the U. States, and agreed to certain limits as their boundaries, has no right to consider any persons or communities, whether Indians or others, residing within those boundaries, as nations independent of the U. States.

The U. States claim, of right, with respect to all European nations, and particularly with respect to G. Britain, the entire sovereignty over the whole territory, and all the persons embraced within the boundaries of their dominions. G. Britain has no right to take cognizance of the relations subsisting between the several communities or persons living therein. They form as to her, only parts of the dominions of the United States, and it is altogether immaterial, whether, or how far, under their political institutions and policy, these communities or persons are independent states, allies, or subjects. With respect to her and all other foreign nations, they are parts of a whole, of which the U. States are the sole and absolute sovereigns.

The allegation of the British plenipotentiaries, that it is inconsistent with the practice or principles of G. Britain to abandon in her negotiations for peace, those who have co-operated with her in war, is not applicable to the Indians, but on the erroneous assumption of their independence, which, so far as she is concerned, has been fully disproved. And although no power from these tribes to the British government to treat in their behalf, would, for the same reason be admitted by the undersigned, they may nevertheless observe, that the British plenipotentiaries having produced no such powers, having no authority to bind the Indians, to engage for their assent to the pacification, or to secure the continuance of peace on their part whilst speaking of them as allies, do really propose to treat for them not as if they were independent nations, but as if they were the subjects of G. Britain.

The undersigned so far from asking that, in relation to the Indians, Great Britain should pursue a course inconsistent with her former practice and principles, only desire that she would follow her own example respecting them, in her former treaties with other European nations, and with the United States. No provision for the Indians is found in the treaty of 1763, by which France ceded Canada to Great Britain, although almost all the Indians living within the territory ceded, or acknowledged to belong to Great Britain, had taken part with France in the war. No such provision was inserted in the treaty of peace of 1783, between G. Britain and the U. States, although almost all the Indian tribes living within the territory recognized by the treaty to belong to the United States, had during the war, co-operated with Great Britain, and might have been considered as her allies more justly than on the present occasion. So far as concerns the relations between G. Britain and the United States, these Indians can be treated for only on the principles by which amnesties are stipulated in favor of disaffected persons, who, in times of war and invasion, co-operate with the enemy of the nation to which they belong. To go as far as possible in securing the benefit of the peace to the Indians, now the only object professed by the British government in their present sine quid non, the undersigned offer a stipulation in general terms, that no person or persons, whether subjects, citizens, or Indians, residing within the dominions of either party, shall be molested or annoyed, either in persons or their property, for any part they may have taken in the war between the United States and Great Britain; but shall retain all the rights, privileges and possessions, which they respectively had at the commencement of the war; they, on their part, demeaning themselves peaceably, and conformably to their duties to the respective governments.—This the undersigned have no doubt will effectually secure to the Indians peace, if they themselves will observe it, and they will not suppose that G. Britain would wish them included in the peace but upon that condition.

The undersigned have never intimated that their government had not furnished them with any instructions since January last. On the contrary, they distinctly told the British plenipotentiaries in conference, though it appears to have escaped their recollection, that instructions had been received by the undersigned, dated at the close of the month of June. The undersigned will now add, that those instructions were drawn with a full knowledge of the general pacification in Europe, and with so liberal a consideration of its necessary bearing upon all the differences that had been until then subsisting between Great Britain and the United States, that the undersigned cannot doubt that peace would long since have been concluded, had not an insuperable bar against it been raised by the new and unprecedented demands of the British government.

With respect to the proposition which the British plenipotentiaries inform them they will be prepared to make, in relation to the Canadian boundaries, which appears to them so entirely founded on principles of moderation and justice, but the nature of which, they think proper at present to withhold, the undersigned can only pledge themselves to meet any proposition from the British plenipotentiaries, characterized by moderation and justice, not only with a perfect reciprocity of those sentiments, but with a sincere and earnest desire to contribute to the restoration of peace, by every compliance with the wishes of G. Britain, compatible with their duty to their country.

The undersigned have the honor of tendering to the British plenipotentiaries, the renewed assurance of their high consideration.

No. VII.

THE BRITISH TO THE AMERICAN COMMISSIONERS.

Ghent, October, 8, 1814.

The undersigned have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of the note of the plenipotentiaries of the United States, dated on the 29th ult.

As the continuance of the negotiation exclusively depends upon the question relating to the pacification and rights of the Indian nations the undersigned are unwilling to extend their observations to the other subjects brought forward in the note of the American plenipotentiaries, further than may be required for necessary explanation.

In adverting for this purpose to the acquisition of Louisiana, the undersigned must observe, that the instrument by which the consent of his Catholic majesty is alleged to have been given to the cession of it, has never been made public. His Catholic majesty was no party to the treaty by which the cessation was made, and if any sanction has been subsequently obtained from him, it must have been, like other cotemporaneous acts of that monarch, involuntary, and as such cannot alter the character of the transaction. The marquis of Yrujo, the minister of his Catholic majesty at Washington, in a letter addressed to the president of the United States, formally protested against the cession, and the right of France to make it. Yet, in the face of this protestation, so strongly evincing the decided opinion of Spain as to the illegality of the proceeding, the president of the United States ratified the treaty. Can it be contended that the annexation of Louisiana, under such circumstances, did not mark a spirit of territorial aggrandizement?

His Britannic majesty did certainly express satisfaction when the American government communicated the event, that Louisiana, a valuable colony in the possession of France, with whom the war had just been renewed, instead of remaining in the hands of his enemy, had been ceded to the United States, at that time professing the most friendly disposition towards Great Britain and an intention of providing for her interest in the acquisition. But the conditions under which France had acquired Louisiana from Spain, were not communicated; the refusal of Spain to consent to its alienation was not known; the protest of her ambassador had not been made, and many other circumstances attending the transaction, on which it is now unnecessary to dilate, were, as there is good reason to believe, industriously concealed.

The proof of a spirit of aggrandizement, which the undersigned had deduced from the hostile seizure of a great part of the Floridas, under the most frivolous pretences, remains unrefuted; and the undersigned are convinced that the occasion and circumstances under which that unwarrantable act of aggression took place, have given rise throughout Europe to but one sentiment as to the character of the transaction.

After the previous communication which the undersigned have had the honor of receiving from the American plenipotentiaries, they could not but feel much surprized at the information contained in their last note of their having received instructions dated subsequently to January, 1814. The undersigned have no recollection whatever of the American plenipotentiaries having communicated to them, either collectively, or individually at a conference or otherwise, the receipt of instructions from the government of the United States dated at the close of the month of June, and they must remind the American plenipotentiaries that their note of the 9th ult. distinctly stated that the instructions of January, 1814, were those under which they were acting. If therefore, the American plenipotentiaries received instructions drawn up at the close of the month of June, with a liberal consideration of the late events in Europe, the undersigned have a right to complain that while the American government justly considered those events as having a necessary bearing on the existing differences between the two countries, the American plenipotentiaries should nevertheless have preferred acting under instructions which, from their date, must have been without the contemplation of such events.

The British government never required that all that portion of the state of Massachusetts intervening between the province of New Brunswick and Quebec, should be ceded to Great Britain, but only that small portion of unsettled country which interrupts the communication between Halifax and Quebec, there being much doubt whether it does not already belong to Great Britain.

The undersigned are at a loss to understand how vice admiral Cochrane's proclamation illustrates any topic connected with the present negotiation, or bears upon the conclusion which they contended was to be drawn from the two proclamations of the American generals. These proclamations distinctly avowing the intention of the American government permanently to annex the Canadas to the United States, were adduced not as a matter of complaint, but simply for the purpose of proving what had been denied as a fact, viz. that such had been the declared intention of the American government.

The undersigned observe that although the American plenipotentiaries have taken upon themselves generally to deny that the proclamations were authorized or approved by their government, without stating in what mode that disapprobation was expressed, yet they avoid stating that the part of those proclamations containing the declaration in question, had not been so authorized or approved. It is indeed impossible to imagine, that if the American government had intimated any disapprobation of that part of general Hull's proclamation, the same declaration would have been as confidently repeated four months after by general Smyth.

His majesty's government have other and ample means of knowing that the conquest of the Canadas and their annexation to the United States was the object and policy of the American government.—For the present the undersigned will content themselves with referring to the remonstrance of the legislature of Massachusetts in June, 1813, in which this intention is announced as matter of notoriety.

The undersigned deny that the American government had proved, or can prove, that previous to the declaration of war by the United States, persons authorized by the British government endeavored to excite the Indian nations against the United States, or that endeavors of that kind, if made by private persons, (which the undersigned have no reason to believe) ever received the countenance of his majesty's government.

The American plenipotentiaries have not denied that the Indian nations had been engaged in war with the United States, before the war with Great Britain had commenced, and they have reluctantly confessed that so far from his majesty having induced the Indian nations to begin the war, as charged against Great Britain in the notes of the 24th Aug. and 9th ult. the British government actually exerted their endeavors to dissuade the Indian nations from commencing it.

As to the unworthy motive assigned by the American plenipotentiaries to this interference so amicably made on the part of Great Britain, its utter improbability is sufficiently apparent from considering by which party the war was declared. The undersigned, therefore, can only consider it as an additional indication of that hostile disposition which has led to the present unhappy war between the two countries. So long as that disposition continues, it cannot but render any effort on the part of Great Britain to terminate this contest utterly unavailing.

The American plenipotentiaries appear unprepared to state the precise ground upon which they resist the right of his majesty to negotiate with the United States on behalf of the Indian nations, whose co-operation in the war his majesty has found it expedient to accept.

The treaty of Greenville, to the words, stipulations, and spirit of which the undersigned have so frequently appealed, and all the treaties previously and subsequently made, between the United States and the Indian nations, show, beyond the possibility of doubt, that the United States have been in the habit of treating with these tribes as independent nations, capable of maintaining the relations of peace and war, and exercising territorial rights.

If this be so, it will be difficult to point out the peculiar circumstances in the condition of those nations, which should either exclude them from a treaty of general pacification, or prevent Great Britain, with whom they have co-operated as allies in the war, from proposing stipulations in their behalf at the peace. Unless the American plenipotentiaries are prepared to maintain what they have in effect advanced, that although the Indian nations may be independent in their relations with the United States, yet the circumstance of living within the boundary of the United States disables them from forming such conditions of alliance with a foreign power, as shall entitle that power to negotiate for them in a treaty of peace.

The principle upon which this proposition is founded, was advanced, but successfully resisted so far back as the treaty of Munster. An attempt was then made to preclude France from negotiating in behalf of certain states and cities in Germany, who had co-operated with her in the war, because although those states and cities might be considered as independent for certain purposes, yet being within the boundary of the German empire, they ought not to be allowed to become parties in the general pacification with the emperor of Germany, nor ought France to be permitted in that negotiation to mix their rights and interests with her own.

The American plenipotentiaries, probably aware that the notion of such a qualified independence, for certain purposes, and not for others, could not be maintained, either by argument or precedent, have been compelled to advance the novel and alarming pretension, that all the Indian nations living within the boundary of the United States, must in effect, be considered as their subjects, and, consequently, if engaged in war against the United States, become liable to be treated as rebels, or dissatisfied persons. They have further stated, that all the territory which these Indian nations occupy, is at the disposal of the United States; that the United States have a right to dispossess them of it: to exercise that right, whenever their policy or interest may seem to them to require it; and to confine them to such spots as may be selected, not by Indian nations, but by the American government. Pretensions such as these Great Britain can never recognize: however reluctant his royal highness the prince regent may be to continue the war, that evil must be preferred, if peace can only be obtained on such conditions.

To support those pretensions, and at the same time to show, that the present conduct of Great Britain is inconsistent with her former practice and principles, the American plenipotentiaries have referred to the treaty of peace 1763, to that of 1763, and to the negotiations of 1761, during the administration of a minister, whom the American plenipotentiaries have state, and truly stated, to be high in the estimation of his country.

The omissions to provide in the treaty of 1763, for the pacification of the Indian nations, which were to be included within the proposed boundary of the United States, cannot preclude Great Britain from now negotiating in behalf of such tribes or nations, unless it be assumed, that the occasional non exercise of a right is an abandonment of it. Nor can the right of protection, which the American plenipotentiaries have filed in showing to have been ever claimed by Great Britain as incident to sovereignty, have been transferred by Great Britain to the United States, by a treaty, to which the Indian nations were not parties.

In the peace of 1763, it was not necessary for Great Britain to treat for the pacification of the Indian nations, and the maintenance of their rights and privileges, because there had been no Indian nations living without the British boundaries, who had co-operated with Great Britain, in the war against France.

With respect to the negotiations of 1761, between Great Britain and France, on which the American plenipotentiaries more particularly rely, they appear, in the judgment of the undersigned, to have much misunderstood the whole course of that negotiation.

It is very true that the French government brought forward, at one period of the negotiation, a proposition, by which a certain territory, lying between the dominions of the two contracting parties, was to have been allotted to the Indian nations. But it does not appear that this formed a part of their ultimatum, and it is clear, that Mr. Pitt in his answer, did not object to the proposition. He objected, indeed, to the proposed line of demarcation between the countries belonging to the two contracting parties, upon the two grounds: 1st, that the proposed northern line would have given to France, what the French had themselves acknowledged to be part of Canada, the whole of which, as enjoyed by his most Christian majesty, it had been stipulated, was to be ceded entirely to Great Britain: 2dly, that the southern part of the proposed line of demarcation would have included within the boundary of Louisiana, the Cherokees, the Creeks, the Chickasaws, the Choctaws, and another nation, who occupied territories which had never been included within the boundaries of that settlement. So far was Mr. Pitt from rejecting, as alleged by the American plenipotentiaries, the proposition of considering Indian nations a barrier, that at one period of the negotiation he complained that there was no provision for such a barrier; and he thus energetically urges his objections. In his letter to Mr. Stanley, the British plenipotentiary at Paris, dated on the 26th June, 1761, "As to the fixation of new limits to Canada towards the Ohio, it is capitions and insidious, thrown out in hope, if agreed to, to shorten thereby the extent of Canada, and to lengthen the boundaries of Louisiana, and in the view to establish, what must not be admitted, namely, that all which is not Canada is Louisiana; whereby all the intermediate nations and countries, the true barrier to each province, would be given up to France."

The undersigned confidently expect, that the American plenipotentiaries will not again reproach the British government with acting inconsistently with its former practice and principles, or repeat the assertion made in a former note, that a definition of Indian boundary, with a view to a neutral barrier, was a new and unprecedented demand by any European power, and most of all by Great Britain; the very instance selected by the American plenipotentiaries, undeniably proves that such a proposition had been entertained both by G. Britain and France, and that Mr. Pitt on the part of Great Britain had more particularly enforced it.

It remains only to notice two objections which the American plenipotentiaries have urged against the proposal of Indian pacification, advanced by the undersigned; first, that it is not reciprocal: secondly, that as the United States could have no security that the Indian nations would conclude a peace on the terms proposed, the proposition would be in effect unilateral.

The article now proposed by the undersigned, and herewith enclosed, is free from both objections, and appears to them so characterized by a spirit of moderation and peace, that they earnestly anticipate the concurrence of the American plenipotentiaries.

In making a last effort in this stage of the war, the undersigned are not apprehensive that the motives which have influenced his royal highness the prince regent to direct a renewal of the proposition, with its present modifications, can be misunderstood or misrepresented.

Whatever may be the result of the proposition thus offered, the undersigned deliver it as their ultimatum, and now await with anxiety the answer of the American plenipotentiaries, on which their continuance in this place will depend.

The undersigned avail themselves of this opportunity of renewing to the American plenipotentiaries, the assurance of their high consideration.

"The United States of America engage to put an end, immediately after the ratification of the present treaty, to hostilities with all the tribes or nations of Indians with whom they may be at war, at the time of such ratification, and forthwith to restore to such tribes or nations, respectively, all the possessions, rights and privileges, which they may have enjoyed or been entitled to in 1811, previous to such hostilities: provided always, that such tribes or nations shall agree to desist from all hostilities against the United States of America, their citizens and subjects, upon the ratification of the present treaty being notified to such tribes or nations, and shall so desist accordingly.

"And his Britannic majesty engages, on his part, to put an end immediately after the ratification of

No. VIII.

From the American to the British commissioners.

GHENT, October 13, 1814.

The undersigned have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of the note of the plenipotentiaries of his Britannic majesty, dated on the 8th instant.

Satisfied of the impossibility of persuading the world that the government of the United States was liable to any well founded imputation of a spirit of conquest or of injustice towards other nations, the undersigned, in affording explanations on several of the topics adverted to by the British plenipotentiaries during this negotiation, were actuated by the sole motive of removing erroneous impressions.

Still influenced by the same motive, they will now add, that at the time when the Spanish minister was remonstrating at Washington against the transfer of Louisiana, orders were given by his government for its delivery to France; that it was, in fact, delivered a short time after that remonstrance; and that if the treaty by which the U. States acquired it had not been ratified, would have become, of course, a French colony. The undersigned believe that the evidence of the assent of Spain to that transfer has been promulgated. They neither admit the alleged disability of the Spanish monarch, nor the inference which the British plenipotentiaries would seem to deduce from it; on the contrary, the assent was voluntarily given in the year 1804, by the same king who, about the same time, ceded Trinidad to Great Britain, and prior to the time when he was again engaged in war with her. The cession by France was immediately communicated to Great Britain, no circumstance affecting it, and then within the knowledge of the United States, being intentionally concealed from her. She expressed her satisfaction with it; and if in any possible state of the case she would have had a right to question the transaction, it does not appear to the undersigned that she is now authorised to do so.

After stating, generally, that the proclamations of generals Hull and Smyth were neither authorized nor approved by their government, the undersigned could not have expected that the British plenipotentiaries would suppose that their statement did not embrace the only part of the proclamations which was a subject of consideration.

The undersigned had, indeed, hoped, that, by stating in their note of the 9th ultimo, that the government of the United States, from the commencement of the war, had been disposed to make peace without obtaining any cession of territory, and by referring to their knowledge of that disposition, and to instructions accordingly given from July, 1812, to January, 1814, they would effectually remove the impression that the annexation of Canada to the United States was the declared object of their government. Not only have the undersigned been disappointed in this expectation, but the only inference which the British plenipotentiaries have thought proper to draw from this explicit statement, has been, that either the American government, by not giving instructions subsequent to the pacification of Europe, or the undersigned, by not acting under such instructions, gave no proof of a sincere desire to bring the present negotiations to a favorable conclusion. The undersigned did not allude, in reference to the alleged intention to annex Canada to the United States, to any instructions given by their government subsequently to January last, because, asking at this time for no accession of territory, it was only of its previous disposition that it appeared necessary to produce any proof. So erroneous was the inference drawn by the British plenipotentiaries, in both respects, that it was in virtue of the instructions of June last, that the undersigned were enabled, in their note of the 24th August, to state, that the causes of the war between the United States and Great Britain, having disappeared, by the maritime pacification of Europe, they had been authorised to agree to its termination upon a mutual restoration of territory, and without making the conclusion of peace to depend on a successful arrangement of those points on which differences had existed.

Considering the present state of the negotiation, the undersigned will abstain, at this time from adducing any evidence or remarks upon the influence which has been exerted over the Indian tribes inhabiting the territories of the United States, and the nature of those excitements which had been employed by British traders and agents.

The arguments and facts already brought forward by the undersigned, respecting the political condition of those tribes, render it unnecessary for them to make many observations on those of the British plenipotentiaries on that subject. The treaties of 1763 and 1783, were those principally alluded to by the undersigned, to illustrate the practice of Great Britain. She did not admit in the first, nor require in the last, any stipulations respecting the Indians who, in one case, had been her enemies, and, in the other, her allies, and who, in both instances, fell by the peace within the dominions of that power against whom they had been engaged in the preceding war.

The negotiation of 1761 was quoted for the purpose of proving, what appears to be fully established by the answer of England to the ultimatum of France delivered on the first of Sept. of that year, that his Britannic majesty would not renounce his right of protection over the Indian nations reputed to be within his dominions, that is to say, between the British settlements and the Mississippi. Mr. Pitt's letter, cited by the British plenipotentiaries, far from contradicting that position, goes still further. It states that "the fixation of the new limits to Canada, as proposed by France, is intended to shorten the extent of Canada, which was to be ceded to England, and to lengthen the boundaries of Louisiana, which France was to keep, and in the view to establish what must not be admitted, namely, that all which is not Canada is Louisiana, whereby all the intermediate nations and countries, the true barrier to each province, would be given up to France." This is precisely the principle uniformly supported by the undersigned, to wit: that the recognition of a boundary gives up to the nation, in whose behalf it is made, all the Indian tribes and countries within that boundary. It was on this principle that the undersigned have confidently relied on the treaty of 1783, what fixes and recognizes the boundary of the U. States, without making any reservation respecting Indian tribes.

But the British plenipotentiaries, unable to produce a solitary precedent of one European power treating for the savages inhabiting within the dominions of another, have been compelled, in support of their principle, to refer to the German empire, a body consisting of several independent states, recognized as such by the whole world, and separately maintaining with foreign powers the relations belonging to such a condition. Can it be necessary to prove that there is no sort of analogy between the political situation of these civilized communities, and that of the wandering tribes of North American savages?

In referring to what the British plenipotentiaries represent as alarming and novel pretensions, what G. Britain can never recognize, the undersigned might complain that these alleged pretensions have not been stated, either in terms or in substance, as expressed by themselves. This, however, is the less material, as any further recognition of them by Great Britain is not necessary nor required. On the other hand, they can never admit nor recognize the principles or pretensions asserted in the course of this correspondence by the British plenipotentiaries, and which, to them, appear novel and alarming.

The article proposed by the British plenipotentiaries, in their last note, not including the Indian tribes as parties in the peace, and leaving the United States free to effect its object in the mode consonant with the relations which they have constantly maintained with those tribes, partaking also of the nature of an amnesty, and being at the same time reciprocal, is not liable to that objection; and accords with the views uniformly professed by the undersigned, of placing these tribes precisely, and in every respect, in the same situation as that in which they stood before the commencement of hostilities. This article, thus proposing only what the undersigned have so often assured the British plenipotentiaries would necessarily follow, if indeed it has not already, as is highly probable, preceded a peace between Great Britain and the United States. The undersigned agree to admit it, in substance, as a provisional article, subject, in the manner originally proposed by the British government, to the approbation or rejection of the government of the United States, which, having given no instructions to the undersigned on this point, cannot be bound by any article they may admit on the subject.

It will, of course, be understood, that if, unhappily, peace should not be the result of the present negotiation, the article thus conditionally agreed to shall be of no effect, and shall not, in any future negotiation, be brought forward by either party, by way of argument or precedent.

This article having been presented as an indispensable preliminary, and being now accepted, the undersigned request the British plenipotentiaries to communicate to them the project of a treaty embracing all the points deemed material by Great Britain; the undersigned engaging on their part to deliver immediately after a counter project with respect to all the articles to which they may not agree, and on the subjects deemed material by the United States, and, which may be omitted in the British project.

No. IX.

FROM THE BRITISH TO THE AMERICAN MINISTERS,
Ghent, October 31, 1814.

The undersigned have had the honor of receiving the note of the American plenipotentiaries of the 13th inst. communicating their acceptance of the article which the undersigned had proposed on the subject of the pacification and rights of the Indian nations.

The undersigned are happy in being thus relieved from the necessity of recurring to several topics, which though they arose in the course of their discussions, have only an incidental connection with the difference remaining to be adjusted between the two

With a view to this adjustment the undersigned preferring in the present state of the negotiation a general statement of the formal arrangement of articles, are willing so far to comply with the request of the American plenipotentiaries contained in their last note, as to waive the advantages to which they think they were fairly entitled, of requiring from them the first project of a treaty.

The undersigned having stated at the first conference the points upon which his majesty's government considered the discussions between the two countries as likely to turn, cannot better satisfy the request of the American plenipotentiaries than by referring them to that conference for a statement of the points which, in the opinion of his majesty's government yet remains to be adjusted.

With respect to the forcible seizure of mariners from on board merchant vessels on the high seas, and the right of the king of Great Britain to the allegiance of all his subjects, and with respect to the maritime rights of the British empire, the undersigned conceive that after the pretensions asserted by the government of the United States, a more satisfactory proof of the conciliatory spirit of his majesty's government cannot be given than not requiring any stipulation on those subjects, which tho' most important in the selves no longer in consequence of the maritime pacification of Europe produce the same practical results.

On the subject of the fisheries the undersigned expressed with so much frankness at the conference already referred to, the views of their government, that they consider any further observations on that topic as unnecessary at the present time.

On the question of the boundary between the dominions of his majesty and those of the United States, the undersigned are led to expect from the discussion which this subject has already undergone, that the N. W. boundary from the lake of the Woods to the Mississippi, the intended arrangement of 1803, will be admitted without objection.

In regard to other boundaries the American plenipotentiaries in their note of August 24th, appeared in some measure to object to the propositions then made by the undersigned as the basis of uti possidetis. The undersigned are willing to treat on that basis, subject to such modifications as mutual convenience may be found to require, and they trust that the American plenipotentiaries will shew by their ready acceptance of this basis, that they duly appreciate the moderation of his majesty's government in so far consulting the honor and fair pretensions of the United States as in the relative situation of the two countries, to authorize such a proposition.

The undersigned avail themselves of this opportunity to renew to the American plenipotentiaries, the assurance of their high consideration.

FROM THE AMERICAN TO THE BRITISH MINISTERS.

Ghent, October 24, 1814.

The undersigned have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of the note of the British plenipotentiaries of the 1st inst.

Amongst the general observations which the undersigned, in their note of the 24th August, made on the propositions then brought forward on the part of the British government, they remarked that those propositions were founded neither on the basis of uti possidetis, nor on that of status ante bellum. But so far were they from suggesting the uti possidetis as the basis on which they were disposed to treat, that in the same note they expressly stated that they had been instructed to conclude a peace on the principles of both parties restoring whatever territory they might have taken. The undersigned also declared in that note, that they had no authority to cede any part of the territory of the United States, and that to no stipulation to that effect would they subscribe and in the note of the 9th Sept. after having shewn that the basis of uti possidetis, such as was known to exist at the commencement of the negotiation, gave no claim to his Britannic majesty to cession of territory founded upon the right of conquest, they added that even if the claims of war should give to the British a momentary possession of other parts of the territory of the United States such events would not alter their views, with regard to the terms of peace to which they would give their consent.

The undersigned can now only repeat those declarations and decline treating upon the basis of uti possidetis, or upon any other principle involving a cession of any part of the territory of the U. States. As they have uniformly stated, they can treat only upon the principle of mutual restoration of whatever territory may have been taken by either party. From this principle they cannot recede, and the undersigned after the repeated declarations of the British plenipotentiaries, that Great Britain had no view to acquisition of territory, in this negotiation, deem it necessary to add, that the utility of its continuance depends on their adherence to this principle.

The undersigned having declared in their note of 21st of Aug. that altho' instructed and prepared to enter into an amicable discussion of all the points, on which differences or uncertainty had existed, and which might hereafter tend to interrupt the harmony of the two countries, they would not make the conclusion of the peace at all depend upon a successful result of the discussion, and having since agreed to the preliminary article proposed by the British government, had believed that the negotiation already so long protracted, could not be brought to an early conclusion, otherwise than by the communication of a project embracing all the other specific propositions which Great Britain intended to offer. They repeat their request in that respect, and will have no objection to a simultaneous exchange of the projects of both parties. This course will bring fairly into discussion the other topics en-braced in the last note of the British plenipotentiaries, to which the undersigned have thought it necessary to advert at the present time.

The undersigned renew to the British plenipotentiaries the assurance of their high consideration.

NO. XII.

FROM THE BRITISH TO THE AMERICAN MINISTERS.

Ghent, 31st October, 1814.

The undersigned have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of the note addressed to them by the American plenipotentiaries on the 21st inst. in which they object to the basis of uti possidetis proposed by the undersigned as that on which they are willing to treat in regard to part of the boundaries between the dominions of his majesty and those of the United States.

The American plenipotentiaries in their note of the 13th inst. requested the undersigned to communicate to them the project of a treaty embracing all the points insisted on by Great Britain, engaging on their part to deliver immediately after a counter project as to all the articles to which they might not agree, and as to all the subjects deemed material by the United States, and omitted in the project of the undersigned.

The undersigned were accordingly instructed to waive the question of etiquette and the advantage which might result from receiving the first communication, and, confiding in the engagement of the American plenipotentiaries, communicated in their notes of the 21st inst. all the points upon which they are instructed to insist.

The American plenipotentiaries have objected to one essential part of the project thus communicated; but before the undersigned can enter into the discussion on this objection, they must require from the American plenipotentiaries that, pursuant to their engagement, they will deliver a counter project containing all their objections to the points submitted by the undersigned, together with a statement of such further points as the government of the United States consider to be material.

The undersigned are authorized to state distinctly, that the articles as to the pacification and rights of the Indian nations having been accepted, they have brought forward in their note of the 21st inst. all the propositions they have to offer. They have no further demands to make, no other stipulations on which they are instructed to insist, and they are empowered to sign a treaty of peace forthwith in conformity with those stated in their former note.

The undersigned trust therefore that the American plenipotentiaries will no longer hesitate to bring forward in the form of articles or otherwise, as they may prefer, those specific propositions upon which they are empowered to sign a treaty of peace between the two countries.

The undersigned avail themselves of the present opportunity to renew to the plenipotentiaries of the United States the assurance of their high consideration.

Events of the War.

Head Quarters, 8th Military District,
Detroit, November 13, 1814.

GENERAL ORDERS.

The commanding general congratulates the gallant volunteers under his command, upon their safe return and the fortunate issue of the expedition. He acknowledges with equal pride and pleasure the meritorious conduct of the troops, so conspicuously displayed in their patriotism in the first instance, in their patience under every difficulty, and in the enthusiasm which pervaded all ranks when they expected to meet the enemy.

Circumstances beyond military controul, and in their nature calculated to reflect on the fidelity of the citizens, on both sides of this river, rendered a movement around lake St. Clair absolutely necessary to the success of the expedition. This necessity exposed the troops to many difficulties and hardships, in wading frequently along the shores of the lake; in the passage of several deep and rapid rivers, sometimes without boats, and on all occasions encountering swamps.—They have the consolation, however, to know that they have performed a route of more than four hundred miles, one hundred and eighty of which is a wilderness and a considerable part of that distance too without any road. The detachment consisting of not more than seven hundred and twenty effectives, penetrated two hundred miles into the enemy's territory; destroyed upwards of two hundred stand of arms, defeated and dispersed four or five hundred of their militia, encamped in a strong position, with a loss on their part in the skirmishes of the 6th inst. at Grand river, and Malcolm's mills, of one captain and seventeen privates killed, and nine privates wounded, and three captains, five subalterns and one hundred and three privates made prisoners during the action and on the retreat, whilst our loss was only one killed and six wounded. 165 militia were paroled.

As the best evidence of the secrecy and rapidity of the expedition, the detachment was enabled, in despite of treason and stratagem, to enter the town of Oxford, 140 miles in the enemy's country, before the inhabitants were apprized that a force was approaching. The resources of the enemy have been essentially affected by the fact, that the detachment subsisted entirely upon them; this circumstance, together with the destruction of the five valuable mills in the vicinity of Grand river, which were employed in the support of the army in the peninsula, will present objections to any attempts during the winter against this place.—These important objects have been effected, and the detachment has returned in complete safety, with the exception of one killed.

The health of the troops was also unexampled; and the unexpected rise on Grand river alone prevented a visit to Burlington Heights, the head quarters of the province, distance only 25 miles.

The ardor and firmness manifested by the troops whenever they expected to meet the enemy, was not more conspicuous than the cheerfulness with which they obeyed orders, whilst the difficulties they encountered can only be known to those who participated in them. In representing the merits of the gallant corps, and the assistance afforded by each in their respective stations, particular credit is due to that zealous and intelligent officer major Dudley, and his staff, especially to the activity of adjutant Berry: to the good conduct of Capts. Simpson, Moore, McLenny and Lancaster; lieutenants Cardwell and M'Clain; ensigns Clarke and Whitaker, sergeants Fry and Sopes, all of the Kentucky battalion. Particular notice is also due to the activity of adjutant Wood and Dr. Chapez, of the Ohio battalion; and to captain Murray of the Ohio cavalry, captain Campbell and lieutenant Ellis of the Ohio battalion. The general regrets that captain Dewitt of that corps, in the skirmish at Malcolm's mill, did not animate his command by his example; and that quarter master Crouch of the Kentucky battalion possessed no other qualification than zeal.

The exertions of quarter-master Conner were duly appreciated by the detachment previously to its passage of the river St. Clair, and upon his return to this place, that department was afterwards well conducted by quarter master Reed. Dr. Turner, of the 17th infantry, rendered many important services, and much is due to the activity, zeal and intelligence displayed by captain Bradford, of the 19th infantry, brigade major, already distinguished for his gallantry in the north, as well as the south. Lieutenant Ryaburn and sergeant Martin, of the U. S. rangers, supported the character which that corps has established for bravery and enterprise. The honorable department of the indian chiefs, Lewis, Wolfe, and John, and interpreter Anthony Shane, was truly animating to all the troops.

The mounted troops will be mustered with all practicable dispatch, discharged and return to the interior by companies.

The commanding general returns his most unfeigned thanks to the volunteers under his command, and in taking leave of troops, so much deserving his confidence, begs them to be assured that he will never cease to cherish a lively recollection of their services, with a hope that they may return in safety to their respective homes, to enjoy the society of their families, and the just gratitude of their country. By command, C. S. TODD, act. adj. gen.

FROM GHENT.—The despatches from our ministers at Ghent, (which we have the pleasure to lay before our readers in regular order,) have delighted and disgusted all that we have heard speak of them. There is a dignified firmness and manly moderation, with a power of argument and force of reasoning, in the notes of our ministers that excites an honest pride in the mind of every American, as tending to elevate the character of the republic in the eyes of an impartial world, while he is disgusted with the tergiversation and pettifoggish manner of their feeble opponents, the whole British cabinet.* It was well observed in one of our papers, a few days ago, that our ministers had as well supported the honor of their country at Ghent, as our tars had done it on the sea and lakes, or (it might have been added) our soldiery by the bayonet, contending with "Wellington's invincibles."

What is the probable result of this negotiation is hard to suppose. The question of a speedy peace, we rather apprehend depends on the prospect of things in Europe, and the turn of events in the congress at Vienna. In case peace should not be made, this fact will be apparent to every one, that the war on our part, if offensive in its outset, will be purely defensive in its future progress and termination.—With the general pacification of Europe the chief causes for which we went to war with Great Britain have, from the nature of things, ceased to effect us; it is not for us to quarrel for forms—Britain may pretend to any "right" she pleases; provided she does not exercise it, to our injury.

We think the general opinion seems to be—that a peace will be made—the affairs on Champlain, at Plattsburg, Erie, Baltimore, &c. are powerful negotiators against "subjugation" and "unconditional submission."

We would have been glad to have left out of the first sheet that issues this day, many things we had in type and therein inserted, if we had contemplated the length of the papers from Ghent. As it is, many things must lie over.

The quantity of matter, on hand, that we could wish to publish at once, is competent to occupy five or six sheets.

*It is a fact that every note from our commissioners was submitted to the British cabinet; which without doubt, prepared the answer.

The Investigation.

REPORT.

The committee charged with an enquiry so intimately concerning the character of administration, the sensibility of the nation, and the honor of its arms, as the causes of the success of the enemy in his recent enterprises against this metropolis, &c. have endeavored to combine despatch with effect, in the manner in which they have collected the facts and views presented in the following statement:

Proceedings of the Cabinet of 7th June, 1814.

Previous to the 2d of July this city composed a part of military district No. 5. Early in June last, the secretary of war furnished the president, at his request, with a general report of the strength of the regular troops and militia then in the service of the United States, and their distribution; which was submitted to the heads of departments by the president on the 7th June. The secretary of the navy had furnished the president with a similar estimate of our naval forces: that which was applicable to the limits of military district No. 10, will hereafter appear. By a reference to the estimate of the land forces it appears; that the aggregate number of land troops stationed in district No. 5, on the 7th of June, amounted to 2,268, of which there were 2,154 effectives, stationed as follows: at Norfolk, 224 artilleryists: the 29th, 35th and 1st battalion of the 38th regiment of infantry, amounting to 912. at Baltimore, 111 artilleryists: 2d battalion of the 38th infantry, amounting to 316; sea fencibles 173: at Annapolis, 40 artilleryists: at fort Washington, 82 ditto; St. Mary's, 36th regiment of infantry, 350.—The meeting of the cabinet on the 7th, and the estimates of land and naval forces, had no particular relation to the defence of any part of military district No. 5; but for measures generally, and particularly in regard to the campaign on our territorial frontiers in the north and north-west.—Nor does it appear that this city had excited more than ordinary attention at this time.

Proceedings of the cabinet the 1st of July,

But soon after, certain intelligence being received of the complete success of the allies in the subjugation of France, the president believed that the enemy had the inclination and the power to increase his military and naval force against the United States; and in that event he believed a variety of considerations would present this city as one of the prominent objects of attack. On the 26 of June, despatches were received from Mr. Gallatin and Mr. Bayard, confirming the views of the president, which induced him to convene the heads of departments on the first of July; at which time he presented a plan of a force immediately to be called into the field, and an additional force to be kept in readiness to march without delay in case of necessity. It seemed to be his object that some position should be taken between the Eastern branch and Patuxent with two or three thousand men, and that an additional force of ten or twelve thousand militia and volunteers should be held in readiness in the neighboring states, including the militia of the district of Columbia, and that convenient depots of arms and military equipments should be established. The measures suggested were approved by the heads of departments; or, in other words, it does not appear that any dissent was expressed.

Correspondence of the secretary of war and general Winder.

The next day, July the 2, by a general order of the war department, the 10th military district was created, to embrace the state of Maryland, the district of Columbia, and that part of Virginia lying between the Rappahannock and the Potomac, under the command of brig. gen. Winder, who being then in Baltimore was advised of the fact by a letter from the secretary of war of the same date. On the 4th of July a requisition was made on certain states for a corps of 93,500 men, designating the quota of each, with a request to the executive of each state to detach and hold in readiness for immediate service their respective detachments, recommending the expediency of fixing the places of rendezvous with a due regard to points, the importance or exposure of which would most likely attract views of the enemy. Of that requisition, 2000 effectives from the quota of Virginia; 5000 from that of Pennsylvania; 6000, the whole quota of Maryland, and 2000, the estimated number of the militia of the District of Columbia, were, at the disposition of the commanding general, as hereafter appears, making the aggregate number of 15,000, exclusive of the regular troops, viz. the 36th regt., one battalion of the 38th, two troops of dragoons, two companies of the 10th infantry, one company of the 12th, and two companies of sea fencibles, supposed to amount to 1000 men, besides the artillery composing the garrisons of forts M'Henry and Washington.

On the 9th of July, general Winder in a letter to the secretary of war, on the subject of the duties which devolved upon him as commander of the 10th military district, a previous conversation is alluded to as having taken place between them, in consequence of the request of the secretary, in his letter of the 2d of July. General Winder appears to have understood the intention of the secretary of war to be, that the militia force proposed for the 10th military district should be drafted and designated, but that no part of it should be called into the field until the hostile squadron in the Chesapeake should be reinforced to such an extent as to render it probable that a serious attack was contemplated; states the difficulty of collecting a force in an emergency, sufficient to retard the advance of the enemy; and suggests the expediency of calling out four thousand of the militia, with a view to station them in equal proportions between South River and Washington, and in the vicinity of Baltimore.

On the 12th day of July the secretary of war, in a letter to general Winder, encloses a circular addressed to the governors of certain states, requiring a body of militia to be organized, equipt, and held in readiness for future service, and authorises him, in case of actual or menaced invasion of the district under his command, to call for a part or the whole of the quota assigned to the state of Maryland; and in another of the 17th of July, the secretary authorises general Winder to draw from Virginia, 2,000 men; from Pennsylvania, 5,000 men; and informs him that the whole of the militia of the District of Columbia, amounting to about 3,000, was in a disposable state and subject to his orders; making, together with the 6,000 from Maryland, the estimate of 15,000 militia. On the 15th of July the secretary of war advised general Winder, that general Porter had communicated the fact of the arrival of the van of Cochran's fleet at Linnhaven Bay, and that the agent at Point Look-out had represented that 2 seventy-fours, 2 frigates, an armed ship and brig ascended the bay at half past 5, p.m.; on the 14th that he considered it proper to call into service the brigade of militia which had been for some time held in readiness at Baltimore, and not knowing whether general Winder was at Baltimore or Annapolis, he had instructed the major-general under whose orders they were organized, to call them out.

General Winder, in a letter of the sixteenth of July to the secretary of war, among other things, expresses his embarrassment in relation to the situation of Annapolis, and gives it as his opinion that a large force and many additional works would be necessary to defend it against a serious attack by land and water; states its importance to the enemy, and the ease with which it might be maintained by them with the command by water, and an entrenchment of 7 or 800 yards, protected by batteries; represents fort Madison as exposed, and unhealthy in the months of August and September, provided with two 50 lb. columbiads, two twenty-fours, two eighteens, 1 twelve and 1 tom, which might be turned with success against fort Severn; that these guns should be removed and arrangements made to blow up the fort; and represents the importance of defending the town if the means could be obtained; states the governor of Maryland and council had taken the necessary steps to comply immediately with the requisition of the general government. On the 17th July, a letter from general Winder to the secretary of war states, that information, that he deemed creditable, was received that the enemy was ascending the river in considerable force; that he had ordered the detachment of regulars at Nottingham, had sent out the alarm to assemble a militia force, and suggests the propriety of sending to that place the marine corps and all the militia that could be procured from the district of Columbia. The secretary on the same day acknowledges the receipt of the above letter, and states that the marine corps was not under his command; but had sent the request to the president, and, as the authority to call the militia was vested in the commanding general, he had transmitted his requisition upon the district to gen. Van Ness; he also reminds him that the two regiments near Baltimore had been called into actual service, and expresses the wish of the president that no less than two nor more than 3000 of the drafts under the requisition of the fourth of July, should be embodied and encamped at some middle point between Baltimore and this city.

From the letter of general Winder, of the 20th of July, it appears that the enemy proceeded up the Patuxent to Hunting creek, landed and committed some depredations in Calvert county, and returned down the river. Three companies of city volunteers had marched from the district, in obedience to the late call of gen. Winder, which he had halted at the Wood yard, and the detachments of the 36th and 53th regiments at Upper Marlboro' while he proceeded to Annapolis, to arrange with the governor the calling out the Maryland militia; which he states will be immediately attended to by the governor. He states that he had called for the largest number directed by the president, viz. 3000, expecting thereby to get 2000, the lowest number; that he forbore to dismantele fort Madison, as it might alarm the people, and produce disagreeable sensations; preferring rather to risk it in case of attack. On the 23d of July, general Winder informs the secretary at war that the governor of Maryland had issued his order for calling out 3000 of the drafts under the requisition of the 4th of July, and had appointed Hildensburg as the place of rendezvous according to his suggestion. In another letter of the same date, general Winder informs the secretary of war, that he had deemed it expedient to direct capt. Davidson, with the city volunteers, to return to the city of Washington, from the two-fold consideration that the facility with which they could turn out and proceed to any point, rendered them nearly as effective as if kept in the field, and the importance to them individually of attending to their private concerns. That the rifles used by captain Doughry's company were very defective, and that captain Burche's artillery were without swords. He recommends that the camp equipage should be left in charge of the company officers to facilitate their march. On the 25th of July, general Winder, in a letter to the secretary of war, dated at Warburton, near fort Washington, represents that fort in several respects to be incomplete in its preparation for defence; encloses a representation of Lieut. Edwards on the subject; makes a requisition of ammunition, and requests that col. Wadsworth may cause the platform to be enlarged so as to make the battery more effectual. The report of lieutenant Edwards speaks of the necessity of mounting heavy artillery in the block house; states that the 18lb. columbiads were not mounted, and that the garrison wanted means to mount them, being destitute of gin and tackle; represents the width of the platform, which ought to be 21 feet, to be only 14, and that the heavy guns at their first discharge would recoil to the hurtoirs, and on being heated would run over it; that five excellent long 18's were mounted on the water battery, which would be very useful in case of attack; but there was not a single pound of ammunition for them, and that some of the gun carriages in the fort were quite out of order.

This statement of Lieut. Edwards was referred upon its receipt to col. Wadsworth, with orders to supply what was wanting at the fort, of which the secretary advised general Winder, bearing date 28th July; and col. Wadsworth, in a representation about the same date, states, that two hands had been ordered from Greenleaf's point on the Monday previous, to execute the necessary repairs of the gun carriages; that the platform as well as the parapet was too narrow, but not so narrow as Lieut. Edwards had stated, for it was directed to be made 20 or 22 feet wide; and that the disadvantages of too narrow a platform could be obviated with no great difficulty, by means of an elastic handspike introduced between the spokes of the wheels, which would prevent them from turning, and thus check the recoil of the piece. Further states, that two hundred rounds of shot and cartridges for the eighteen's, could be sent down if ordered; that he had long since directed some grape shot to be prepared for the 18lb. columbiads; that a tackle and fall to mount the guns in the block house should be prepared; that capt. Mosteller had just informed him, that a good tackle and fall were at the fort when he left it, and that the platform was upwards of 20 feet wide. General Winder, in a letter of the 26th July, from Piscataway, advises the secretary of war, that the enemy had descended both the Potomac and Patuxent rivers; that he expected him up the bay, and should not be surprized to find Annapolis his object, which he feared would fall before 500 hundred men; and that he should return to Marlborough as soon as he could ascertain the movements of the enemy. On the 27th of July, gen. Winder in two letters to the secretary of war from Piscataway, states the force under general Stewart at 800; col. Beall's regiment at Port Tobacco from 300 to 350 infantry, and 40 dragoons; col. Bowen's regiment at Nottingham at 300, and the detachment of regulars under command of lieutenant col. Scott, was also at Nottingham; and from gen. Winder's letter to the secretary of war of the 1st of August from Port Tobacco, it appears, that he had the detachment under lieutenant col. Scott, at Piscataway.

Correspondence of general Winder, with the governor of Pennsylvania.

In relation to the quota of Pennsylvania under the requisition of the 4th of July, and more especially as it regards the 5000 men subject to the call of general Winder, and assigned to his command, it appears that general Winder wrote to the governor of Pennsylvania, on the 6th of August, advising him that the secretary of war had destined a part of that quota to act under his command, in defending the country embraced in the 10th military district, and requesting that he might be informed of the place or places of rendezvous which would be fixed for such troops, and recommending places most contiguous to the cities of Washington and Baltimore. On the 8th of August, general Winder writes again to the governor of Pennsylvania, stating, that since his first communication he had read a letter from the secretary of war, dated the 17th of July, which had not reached him at an earlier period in consequence of his having been in constant motion since that time; which informed him that of the quota of militia of Pennsylvania under the requisition of the 4th of July, 5000 were destined for the 10th military district, subject to his call as commanding officer, and requested that as great a proportion of the detachment as possible should be riflemen.

On the 11th of August, secretary Boileau, under the direction of the governor of Pennsylvania, in answer to general Winder, states, that in consequence of the deranged state of the militia system, great difficulties occurred to the executive in relation to the quota required to be held in readiness for the service of the United States. The only effort that could be made towards a compliance with the requisition, was to have ordered a designation for the service of the requisite troops, under the militia law of 1807, and before the expiration of that law; which order had been issued by the governor, and was in a course of execution; that the militia law of 1807 expired on the first of August, and that all commissions under it became void, except of such officers as might be in service on that day; and that, by an oversight in the legislature, no complete organization of the militia could be legally made in Pennsylvania, until the 4th Monday in October, when a classification was to take place.

On the 17th of August, general Winder makes a requisition on the governor of Pennsylvania, for one regiment, to march forthwith to the city of Washington; and on the day following, in consequence of large reinforcements of the enemy in the month of the Patuxent, he calls for the whole 5000 Pennsylvania militia, by virtue of his previous authority. The 5000 were ordered out, to rendezvous at York, in Pennsylvania, on the 5th of September; of course, not in time to give any aid on the occasion for which they were called, nor was general Winder's letter of the 18th received by the governor of Pennsylvania until the evening of the 23d.

Correspondence of the secretary of war and general Winder.

On the 13th of August, general Winder, in a letter to the secretary of war, states, that in consequence of the acceptance of the 2d regiment drafted from gen. Smith's division, under the requisition of April, for part of the requisition of the 4th of July, the impracticability, besides a propriety, of calling any portion of the drafted militia from the eastern shore of Maryland, and the necessity of leaving all the men immediately upon the bay, and low down on the rivers of the western shore, for local defence; the remaining portion of the Maryland drafts to be assembled at Bladensburg, instead of being 3000 would not much exceed actually hundred; yet he would require the governor to order out all the drafts that could possibly be spared from the three lower brigades on the western shore, but as the whole number drafted on the western shore, exclusive of the brigade drawn from gen. Smith's division, did not amount to 1500 men, he did not expect more than 1000 under the second order of the government, that of the 4th of July. The most immediate and convenient resource to supply the deficiency, was to take the militia drawn out under the state authority and assembled at Annapolis, to the amount of 1600, into the service of the United States, and to call on Pennsylvania for one regiment, which would make his militia between 2000 and 3000 men, besides the two regiments from general Smith's division.

In answer to this letter, the secretary of war, in a letter of the 16th of August, authorizes general Winder to take into the service of the United States, the Maryland militia then at Annapolis, or elsewhere, that had been called out under the state authority, as part of the quota required by the order of the 4th of July.

Correspondence of the secretary of war with the governors of Maryland, Pennsylvania and Virginia.

On the 27th of July the governor of Maryland states, in a letter to the secretary of war, that in conformity to the request of the president of the United States, communicated in the requisition of the 4th, a detachment of 5,500 infantry and 600 artillery was directed to be organized and held in readiness to move at the shortest notice; and in order to comply with the requisition of general Winder, for calling into the field 3,000 drafts of the Maryland militia, by direction of the president, the whole of the drafts from the western shore, about 3,500 infantry, had been ordered to embark. He speaks of the exposed situation of the western shore, bordering upon the bay, and presumes that the drafts from that section of the country would not be drawn away, and expects Baltimore would be unwilling to have any force withdrawn from that place, by which any aid might be expected. These considerations had induced the order for the 2000 men; this force was to be embodied and moved by the shortest route to Bladensburg; that the artillery of the state was about 900 men, two-thirds in Baltimore; it would create uneasiness to take them to that place &c, the propriety, and he had suggested that order until general Smith should have a communication with the secretary of war. On the 26th of July, general Winder made a requisition on the governor of Maryland for the 19th militia, urging the necessity of leaving them embodied and in service with the least possible delay, and on the 5th of August the governor of Maryland informed general Winder, by letter, that he could not for 3000 drafts could not be completed until the 1st of the brigade in service at Baltimore, from general

Smith's division; that the drafts from one brigade alone were under marching orders, the orders for the march of those lying on the Chesapeake and Potomac having been suspended.

On the 14th of July Mr. Boilieu, secretary of state for Pennsylvania, acknowledges the receipt of the communication from the war department, containing the requisition of the 14th of July, for 14,000 Pennsylvania militia, which was forwarded by express to the governor, who was absent at Selin's Grove, with assurances that the governor would execute with promptness the requisition of the general government. On the 25th the governor of Pennsylvania directs the secretary Boilieu to inform the secretary of war, that general orders had been issued in compliance with the requisition of the 4th of July; explains as before, the difficulties resulting from the militia laws of Pennsylvania, and relies on the patriotism and voluntary services of the people.

On the 14th of July the deputy adjutant-general of Virginia, acknowledged the receipt of the communication from the war department, containing the requisition of the 4th, and enclosed to the secretary of war the general orders issued by the governor of Virginia on the 22d of June, placing in readiness a provisional force of 15,000 men and upwards to repel sudden invasions, and for the purpose of defence, and the points of rendezvous designed, but not organized upon the military establishment of the United States, nor for a longer term than three months, which, with other considerations, prevented the acceptance of any part of those state troops as a compliance with the requisition of the general government. The secretary of war was apprized in this letter also, that the whole of the Virginia troops, then held in readiness, would be furnished with arms and ammunition by the state of Virginia; and on the 18th the secretary of war informs the governor of Virginia that 2000 of the requisition upon the Virginia militia would be placed at the disposition of general Winder as commander of the 10th military district.

Having presented a condensed view of the measures of the cabinet; the correspondence between the commanding officer and the war department, the governors of Pennsylvania, and Maryland and the commanding general, the correspondence with the governors of Pennsylvania, Maryland and Virginia and the secretary of war, in regard to the requisition of the 4th of July, it will now be proper to present some facts connected with the movements and arrangements of the commanding general up to the revocation of his command.

Towards the close of the month of June, the secretary of war gave to general Winder the first intimation that it was in contemplation to constitute a new military district, embracing the country now composing the 10th military district, and that the president intended to invest him with its command. On the 4th or 5th of July, he received notice of his appointment to the 10th military district, and the order creating it; proceeded to Washington and called upon the secretary of war, who enumerated the regular force as before supposed to amount to 1000 or 1200; the residue of his command to be composed of militia to be drafted, and was shewn the circular to certain states, making the requisition of the 4th. He then returned to Baltimore, and after writing the letter of the 9th, proceeded to Annapolis to examine it and to explore the 10th military district generally. The letter of the 12th from the secretary of war, was not received until he went to Annapolis, to Upper Marlborough and back to Annapolis. On the 17th at Nottingham, received intelligence that the enemy was proceeding up the Patuxent; wrote to the secretary of war and to general West, advising him to call out the militia of the county. The detachment of the 36th and 38th regiments was ordered from South river to Nottingham, and three companies of city militia were dispatched to him promptly. On the 25th visited fort Washington; and on the 1st of August fixed his permanent head-quarters at the city of Washington; viewed and inspected the district militia. The people of St. Mary's and Charles had become importunate for aid and protection, and in obedience to the wish of the president, the 36th and 38th were ordered down to unite with general Stewart; but the enemy having retired, this detachment was encamped at Piscataway. He understood by letters from general Smith of Baltimore, and the governor of Maryland, that Stansbury's brigade, upon application of general Smith, had been accepted by the secretary of war, as part of the quota of Maryland militia, under requisition of the 4th of July. On the morning of the 18th of August, Thursday, intelligence was received from the observatory at Point Look out, that on the morning of the 17th the enemy's fleet off that place had been reinforced by a formidable squadron of ships and vessels of various sizes. The commanding general immediately made requisitions on the governors of Pennsylvania and Maryland, various officers of militia, and the militia of the district of Columbia were ordered out en masse.

On the 19th, general Winder, in a letter to the secretary of war, submitted several propositions to the president: 1st, Would it be expedient, under the direction of the navy department, to have vessels ready to be sunk in the Potomac, at fort Washington or other points, at a moment's warning, to obstruct the navigation? 2d, Would it not be proper to put all the boats, which can be propelled by oars, that are at the city of Washington, under the control of the navy, at Washington, to transport troops as events may require? 3d, Would it not be convenient to put the marine corps into service, at all events, to cause them to be in readiness to reinforce fort Washington at a moment's notice, or to be applied as events may require to any point of defence? 4th, That the force under commodore Barney may co-operate with the commanding general, in case of the abandonment of the flotilla. On the same day the secretary of war, in a letter states, that the propositions had been submitted to the president, and general Winder is referred to the navy department on the subject of the propositions relating to the means in that department. General Winder's call upon the militia en masse, is approved, and on the same day the secretary of war, in a letter to general Winder, advises, that the cavalry be pushed into the neighborhood of the enemy without delay, if he indicated an attack upon the city of Washington, for the purpose of driving off all horses and cattle and supplies of forage, &c. in their route. Not a moment was to be lost. Colonel Monroe, with captain Thornton's troop of horse, proceeded to find and reconnoitre the enemy on Friday the 19th; on the same day the militia of Georgetown and the city of Washington, under general Smith, were mustered. On Saturday, the 20th, this and some other forces commenced their line of march towards Benedict about 1 o'clock, and encamped that night about four miles from the Eastern Branch Bridge, on the road to Upper Marlborough. On this day col. Monroe communicated the intelligence of the arrival of the enemy at Benedict in force. Same day col. Tilghman and capt. Caldwell, with their commands of horse, were ordered and dispatched to annoy the enemy, impede his march, to remove and destroy forage and provisions before the enemy.

On Sunday morning, the 21st, the troops were mustered, and the articles of war read to them. At 12 o'clock the marines under captain Miller joined the army; the regulars of the 36th and 38th also joined at the Wood-Yard, seven miles in advance, to which the main body of our troops were marched and encamped on Sunday night. Two letters from colonel Monroe, on the 21st, one stating that he had viewed the enemy near Benedict, enumerating 27 square rigged vessels, some bay craft and barges; the other dated from Nottingham, stating the advance of the enemy upon that place by land and water; and recommending the commanding general to dispatch 500 or 600 men to fall upon the enemy. Colonel Monroe and colonel Beall both joined the army at night, and gave an account that the enemy had been viewed by them. Colonel Beall calculated that he had seen 4000, without supposing he had seen all. Colonel Monroe estimated the enemy at about 6000; captain Herbert joins with his troop; colonel Laval had joined with two companies of cavalry on the day previous; the enemy remained at Nottingham, except an advance detachment about three miles from town. Monday the 22d, early in the morning a light detachment was ordered to meet the enemy, composed of the 36th and 38th, lieutenant-colonel Scott, colonel Laval's cavalry, and three companies from the brigade of general Smith, under major Peter, viz: his own company of artillery, captain Stull's rifle corps, captain Davidson's light infantry. This detachment marched on the road to Nottingham, about 9 o'clock; the remainder of the army marched about mile in advance to an elevated position; the commanding general with his staff, accompanied by colonel Monroe, proceeded in advance to reconnoitre the march of the enemy. Com. Barney had joined the army with his flotilla men, besides the marines under captain Miller; the horse preceded the advance detachment of our forces, met the enemy and retired before them. This induced the advance corps to take a position to impede the march of the enemy; but the advance detachment was ordered to retrograde and join the main body of the army that had remained some hours in line of battle, expecting the enemy to come that route to the city; but who took the road to Upper Marlborough, turning to his right after having come within a few miles of our forces; upon which the commanding general fell back with his whole forces to the Battalion Old fields, about 8 miles from Marlborough, and the same distance from the city of Washington. At this time heavy explosions in the direction of Marlborough announced the destruction of the flotilla under command of commodore Barney. The enemy arrived at Upper Marlborough about 2 o'clock, and remained there until late next day, to be joined it is presumed, by the detachment of the enemy which had been sent against the flotilla.

The commanding general proceeded to Marlborough, and found the enemy encamped; several prisoners taken gave information that the enemy would remain in that position until the next day; and, after making observations of the enemy, till the close of the day, general Winder returned to the army. Late in the evening of this day the president with the secretary of war and navy and attorney general, joined general Winder at the Battalion Old fields, and remained with him till the evening of the 23d. In the morning the troops were drawn up and reviewed by the president. The most contradictory reports prevailed as to the movements and force of the enemy, and it was doubtful in camp whether Annapolis, Fort Washington, with a view to co-operate with his naval forces, or the city of Washington, was his object. As to numbers, rumors vibrated from 4000 to 12000; the best opinion was from 5 to 7000. Our forces at this time at the Old fields, are variously estimated, with no material difference, at about 3000 men, in the following corps; about 400 horse under the command of the following officers; lieutenant-colonel Laval, colonel Tilghman, captains Caldwell, Thornton, Herbert, Williams, &c. 40 regular troops, under the command of lieutenant-colonel Scott, viz: 36th, 38th and captain Morgan's company of the 12th infantry; 600 marines and flotilla men, under commodore Barney and captain Miller, with five pieces of heavy artillery, two 18 pounders and three twelve pounders; 1,800 militia and volunteers; general Smith's brigade of Georgetown and city militia, and Maryland militia under colonel Kramer, of which there were two companies of artillery under captain Burch and major Peter, with six 6 pounders each, making an aggregate of 3,200, with 17 pieces of artillery. The enemy was without cavalry, and had two small field pieces and one howitzer, drawn by men; and the whole country well calculated for defence, skirmishing, and to impede the march of an enemy.

The enemy remained at Upper Marlborough till after 12 o'clock; about which time, general Winder again ordered the detachment under lieutenant-colonel Scott and major Peter to advance and meet the enemy if he should be found advancing, or to attack his positions. About this time, 12 o'clock, some prisoners were taken, and from information given by them and the observations of the videts, general Winder was induced to believe that the enemy intended to remain stationary for the day, which induced him to think of uniting with the forces at Bladensburg, and despatched others to general Stansbury, and other corps at Bladensburg, to move direct for Upper Marlborough, and proceeded himself towards Bladensburg, to meet and hurry on the forces to form a junction. When general Winder left the command with general Smith, and proceeded towards Bladensburg, with several troops of cavalry, he left orders that the advance corps should march upon the enemy, and annoy him by all possible means if in march, or if not, then in his positions; and if he advanced upon Bladensburg, general Smith, with the main body, should fall upon his flank, or be governed by circumstances in other movements.

Captain Caldwell joined the advance corps at 2 o'clock, P. M. An express brought intelligence that the enemy had left Upper Marlborough; that our advance had met the enemy about six miles in advance of our forces, and after a skirmish, in which captain Stull's company had about 4 or 5 rounds, was compelled to retreat, and that the enemy was advancing. One of the aids of general Smith was despatched for general Winder: the whole army was placed in a favorable attitude of defence, in which position it continued until about sunset, when general Winder, who had arrived some time previous, ordered the army to march to the city of Washington. The enemy were about three miles distant, and remained there that night. Having remained till the going down of the sun, the retreat to the city was induced by several considerations, stated by the commanding general. 1st, To effect a union of his whole forces. 2d. The fear of a night attack, from the superiority of the enemy, and want of discipline in his troops. And 3d. In a night attack his superiority in artillery could not be used. The march of our army to the city was extremely rapid and precipitate, and orders occasionally given to the captains of companies to hurry on the men, who were extremely fatigued and exhausted before the camping ground was reached, near the Eastern branch bridge, within the District of Columbia.

General Stansbury had arrived at Bladensburg on the 24th, and the 5th Baltimore regiment, including the artillery and rifle corps, on the evening of the 23d; and at 12 o'clock at night, colonel Munroe, in passing through Bladensburg to the city of Washington, advised general Stansbury to fall upon the rear of the enemy forthwith, as it was understood that he was in motion for the city. General Stansbury having been ordered to take post at Bladensburg, did not think he was at liberty to leave it; but, independent of this consideration, the fatigue of the troops under colonel Sterrett made it impracticable.

It is here proper to state that on the 22d, the secretary of war in a letter to general Winder, which closes their written communications previous to the 24th, except a short note of that morning, states that he had ordered general Douglass to march with his command to the district without seeking a rendezvous with general Hungerford; that a detachment of the 12th infantry had arrived; that it should be armed, equipped and marched to the Wood Yard; that the Baltimore brigade would arrive at Bladensburg that day; and suggests the propriety of throwing Barney's seamen and some other troops on the right of Nottingham, a demonstration which would menace the rear of the enemy, and his communication with his shipping, which would, if not stop, much retard his progress. On the morning of the 24th, in a short note to the secretary of war, general Winder says, the information up the river is threatening; Barney or some other force should occupy the batteries at Greenleaf's Point and Navy Yard, and wishes counsel from the government or secretary of war. Upon this note is an endorsement in the hand writing of general Armstrong to this effect; "went to general Winder, was no necessity for ordering Barney to Greenleaf's Point or Navy Yard, advised the commodore to join the army at Bladensburg, and ordered Minor's regiment to that place."

On the 21st, late at night, colonel Tayloe arrived in the city from the Northern Neck, where he had been charged with orders in relation to the Virginia drafts, and reported himself to general Armstrong, who issued the following general order:

"War department, Aug. 22d, 1814. (12 o'clock.)"

"GENERAL ORDER.

"General Douglass will assemble his brigade at Alexandria, and hold it there subject to orders.

"JOHN ARMSTRONG."

Colonel Tayloe executed this order, and Tuesday night, the 23d, again reported himself to general Armstrong, who issued the following orders:

"War Department,

"GENERAL ORDER.

"Lieutenant colonel Minor will repair to Washington with the regiment under his command with the utmost despatch; he will report on his arrival to colonel Carberry of the 36th regiment, and make a requisition for arms and ammunition.

(Signed)

"JOHN ARMSTRONG."

"War Department, Aug. 23, 1814"

"GENERAL ORDER,

"All the militia now in and marching to Alexandria, besides colonel Minor, will march immediately to Washington; these orders will be communicated by colonel Tayloe."

"JOHN ARMSTRONG."

On the 18th of August, general Van Ness ordered general Young to call out, en masse, the brigade under his command, including the Alexandria militia; the same day two troops of Cavalry attached to the brigade were ordered to rendezvous at Bladensburg on the 19th at 4 o'clock in the morning, to accompany colonel Munroe, secretary of state, and to be subject to his order. On the 20th, in the afternoon, general Young's brigade was ordered by general Winder to cross the Potomac, opposite Alexandria, and encamp in the best position and wait further orders, which was effected. The brigade consisting of 454 men, two brass six-pounders, and one brass four pounder. On the 22d, early, general Young, by order of general Winder, marched his brigade and took a position on a height near the head of Piscataway creek, about three miles in the rear of fort Washington, where the ground was favorable for a small detachment to defend the country against a much greater force, and remained in this position until the morning of the 24th, when several orders were given to him; first, to march towards the Eastern branch bridge; second, to cross the Potomac to the Virginia side, &c. This brigade was intended in its dispositions to aid fort Washington, the town of Alexandria, and to be in a situation to join general Winder.

On the morning of the 24th, general Winder established his head quarters near the Eastern Branch bridge; detachments of horse were out in various directions as videttes and reconnoitering parties, and arrangements made to destroy the Eastern Branch bridge. Colonel George Minor, with his regiment of Virginia militia, composed of 600 infantry and 100 cavalry, arrived at the city of Washington in the twilight of the evening of the 23d; he called on the president who referred him to the secretary of war for orders; the secretary informed him that arms could not be had that night, but gave orders to report himself to colonel Carberry early in the morning, who would furnish him with arms and ammunition, as he was charged with that duty by general Winder. From early in the morning till late in the afternoon, colonel Minor sought colonel Carberry diligently, but he could not be found. He rode to head quarters and obtained an order from general Winder upon the arsenal for arms, &c. marched to the place with his regiment, and its care he found committed to a young man whose caution in giving out arms, &c. very much delayed the arming and supplying of this regiment. An instance is here given when the flints were counted out by the officers of the regiment, to expedite business at this crisis, the young man would count them over before they could be obtained.

Colonel Carberry arrived at this moment, apologized for his absence, and informed colonel Minor that he had the evening previous ridden out to his country seat. Colonel Minor was again delayed some small length of time in having to remain to sign receipts, &c. His men were ordered to Capitol Hill. In the mean time various reports were brought into head quarters as to the movements and intentions of the enemy; the president and heads of departments collected at head quarters, in the following order: the president, next secretary of state, next the attorney general, next the secretary of the navy, and last the secretaries of war and treasury together. Colonel Munroe had left head quarters upon a rumour that gained ground, that the enemy was marching upon the city by the way of Bladensburg, with a view of joining gen. Stansbury, advising him of the rumor and to aid him in the formation of a line of battle to meet the enemy. General Stansbury, for reasons given in his report, had marched from his position in advance of Bladens-burg, and occupied the ground west of that village on the banks of the Eastern Branch. Here the front line of battle was formed by general Stansbury and his officers, with the aid of colonel Monroe, on the presumption that general Stansbury's brigade, and the command of col. Sterret, including the command of major Pinkney and Baltimore artillery.

There is a bridge over the Eastern branch at Bladensburg, and a large turnpike road leading direct to the city of Washington. About 400 yards from this bridge, some small distance to the left of the road, the Baltimore artillery, six pieces of six pounders, occupied a temporary breast work of earth, well calculated to command the pass over the bridge. Part of the battalion of riflemen, under major Wm. Pinkney, and one other company, took position on the right of the artillery, partially protected by a fence and brush; and on the left of the battery, leading to the rear of a barn, two companies, from the regiment under colonel Stuart, and the other part of the riflemen from Baltimore. Col. Ragan was posted in the rear of maj. Pinkney, his right resting on the road; col. Stuart continuing the line on the left, with a small vacancy in the centre of the two regiments; and col. Sterret formed the extreme left flank of the infantry. At this moment, colonels Beall and Hood entered Bladensburg, with the Maryland militia from Annapolis, crossed the bridge and took a position on a most commanding height, on the right of the turnpike, about three hundred yards from the road, to secure the right flank. In the mean time, (about 11 o'clock) certain intelligence was received at head quarters, that the enemy was in full march towards Bladensburg, which induced gen. Winder to put in motion his whole force, except a few men and a piece of artillery left at the Eastern branch bridge to destroy it. The day was hot, and the road dusty—the march was rapid to Bladensburg. The cavalry and mounted men arrived, and were placed on the left flank, and some small distance in its rear. General Winder now arrived, and told gen. Stansbury and col. Monroe, that his whole force was marching for Bladensburg, and approved the dispositions which had been made of the troops; at which moment, it had become impracticable in the opinion of the officers, to make any essential change; for the two armies were now coming to the battle ground, in opposite directions; and the enemy appeared on the opposite heights of Bladensburg, about a mile distant, and halted 15 or 20 minutes. This was about 12 o'clock. The troops from the city were disposed of as they arrived. Capt. Burch, with three pieces of artillery, was stationed on the extreme left of the infantry of the first line; and a rifle company, armed with muskets, near the battery to support it. About this time the secretary of war arrived, and in a few minutes after the president and the attorney general, and proceeded to examine the disposition of the troops. In the mean time, as the enemy advanced into Bladensburg, the officers were forming rapidly the second line. The command of commodore Barney came up in a trot; and formed his men on the right of the main road, in a line with the command under colonels Beall and Hood, with a considerable vacancy, owing to the ground. The heavy artillery com. Barney planted in the road; the three 12 pounders to the right under capt. Miller, who commanded the flotilla men and marines, as infantry to support the artillery. Lieut. colonel Kramer, with a battalion of Maryland militia, was posted in a wood, in advance of the marines and colonels Beall and Hood's command. The regiment under the command of col. Magruder, was stationed on the left of commodore Barney, in a line with him and

col. B. H. The regiment under command of col. Brant, and major Waring's battalion, and some other small detachments, formed the left flank of this second line, and in the rear of major Peter's battery; and lieutenant col. Scott, with the regulars, was placed in advance of col. Magruder, and to the left, forming a line towards maj. Peter's battery, but in such a manner as not to mask it; other small detachments in various directions.

About half past twelve o'clock, while the second line was forming, the enemy approached and the battle commenced: the Baltimore artillery opened a fire and dispersed the enemy's light troops now advancing along the street of the village, who took a temporary cover behind the houses and trees, in loose order, and presented objects only occasionally for the fire of the cannon. The enemy commenced throwing his rockets, and his light troops began to concentrate near the bridge, and to press across it and the river which was fordable above. The battalion of riflemen under major Pinkney, now united gallantly with the fire from the battery. For some minutes the fire was continued with considerable effect; the enemy's column was not only dispersed while in the street, but while approaching the bridge they were thrown into some confusion, and the British officers were seen exerting themselves to press the soldiers on. Having now gained the bridge, it was passed rapidly, and as the enemy crossed, flanked, formed the line and advanced steadily on, which compelled the artillery and battalion of riflemen to give way, after which major Pinkney was severely wounded. He exerted himself to rally his men, and succeeded at a small distance in the rear of his first position, and united with the fifth Baltimore regiment.

It appears from reports of several officers, Stansbury, Pinkney, Law, Sterret, &c. that the command of general Stansbury was 3 or 400 yards in the rear of the battery, and maj. Pinkney's riflemen and some other small corps to the left of the battery; of course this small party had to fight with the whole force of the enemy until they retired, and the enemy occupied the ground they left without any considerable resistance, as the enemy marched on without halting after the bridge was passed. Capt. Burch and colonel Sterret where about the same distance, when col. Sterret was ordered to advance to support the first line. One of the pieces of artillery was abandoned, but spiked previously. The enemy soon took advantage of the trees of an orchard which was occupied or held by the force which had just retreated and kept up a galling fire on part of our line. Captain Burch's artillery and a small detachment near it now opened a cross fire upon the enemy. Col. Sterrett, with the fifth Baltimore regiment, was ordered to advance, and made a prompt movement until ordered to halt, as at this movement the rockets assuming a more horizontal direction and passing near the heads of colonels Schultz and Ragan's regiments, the right gave way, which was followed in a few minutes by a general flight of the two regiments, in defiance of all the exertions of generals Winder, Stansbury and other officers. Burch's artillery and the fifth regiment remained with firmness: the orchard obstructed their fire; but notwithstanding, the enemy's light troops were, for a moment, driven back by them, the enemy having gained the right flank of the firing which exposed it, Burch's artillery and colonel Sterret, who commanded the fifth, were ordered by general Winder to retreat, with a view of forming at a small distance in the rear; but, instead of retreating in order, the fifth, like the other two regiments under general Stansbury, in a very few minutes were retreating in disorder and confusion, notwithstanding the exertions of col. Sterret to prevent it. From reports of various officers exertions were made to rally the men and to bring them again to the battle, which partly succeeded in the first instance, but ultimately, and in a short time, all attempts were vain, and the forces routed; and the first line, together with the horse, were totally routed and retreated in a road which forked in three directions; one branch led by Rock Creek Church, to Tanley Town and Montgomery court house, another led to George Town and a third to the city of Washington. It does not appear that any movement was made or attempted by the cavalry or horsemen, although the enemy to the left were in open and scattered order, as they pursued or pressed upon our lines, and a most fortunate moment presented itself for a charge of cavalry and horsemen.

It may be proper here to observe, that general Winder states his exertions to direct the retreating line to the capitol, with a view of rallying. This intention is corroborated by col. Sterret; but it appears that this determination was not generally understood by the officers or men. Colonel Kramer, posted on the right of the road and in advance of commodore Barney, was next drawn from his position after having maintained his ground with considerable injury to the enemy, and retreated upon the command of colonels Beall and Hood, on a command of eminence to the right. After the retreat of the militia under colonel Kramer from his first position, the enemy's column in the road was exposed to an animated discharge from major Peter's artillery, which continued until they came in contact with commodore Barney: here the enemy met the greatest resistance and sustained the greatest loss, advancing upon our retreating line. When the enemy came in full view, and in a heavy column in the main road, commodore Barney ordered an 18 pounder to be opened upon them, which completely cleared the road, scattered and repulsed the enemy for a moment. In several attempts to rally and advance, the enemy was repulsed, which induced him to flank to the right of our lines in an open field.—Here captain Miller opened upon him with the three 12 pounders, and the flotilla men acting as infantry, with considerable effect. The enemy continued flanking to the right and pressed upon the command of colonels Beall and Hood, which gave way after three or four rounds of ineffectual fire, at a considerable distance from the enemy, while colonel Beall and other officers attempted to rally the men on this high position. The enemy very soon gained the flank and even the rear of the right of the second line. Commodore Barney, captain Miller and some other officers of his command being wounded, his ammunition waggons having gone off in the disorder and that which the marines and flotilla men had being exhausted; in this situation a retreat was ordered by commodore Barney, who fell himself into the hands of the enemy.

The second line was not exactly connected, but posted in advantageous positions in connection with and supporting each other. The command of general Smith, including the Georgetown and city militia, still remained in order and firm without any part having given away, as well as the command of Lieut. col. Scott of the regulars, and some other corps. The enemy's light troops had in the mean time advanced on the left of the road, and had gained a line parallel with Smith's command, and in endeavoring to turn the flank, colonel Brent was placed in a position calculated to prevent it; the enemy also advanced and came within long shot of part of colonel Magruder's command, which opened a partial fire, but without much effect; and at this moment and in this situation general Winder ordered the whole of the troops, then stationary, to retreat, which was effected with as much order as the nature of the ground and the occasion would permit: these troops after retreating 5 or 600 paces, were halted and formed, but were again ordered to retreat by general Winder. General Winder then gave orders to collect and form the troops on the heights west of the turnpike gate, about one mile and a half from the capitol, which order was in part executed, and the forces formed by general Smith and the other officers, when col. George Minor came up with his regiment of Virginia volunteers, and united his forces with general Smith's command, having been detained, as before stated, in obtaining arms, ammunition, &c.; but, while in the act of forming, general Winder gave orders to retire to the capitol, with an expectation of being united with the troops of the first line. Col. Minor was ordered to take a certain position and disposition, and cover the retreat of all the forces by remaining until all had marched for the capitol. The troops were again halted at the capitol while general Winder was in conference with colonel Monroe and general Armstrong.

The first line and the cavalry, except one troop of col. Laval's, had taken a route which did not bring them to the capitol; the most of them had proceeded north of the district of Columbia, and others dispersed and returned home, and sought refreshment in the country. The commanding general represented the diminution of his force, the dispersion of a large portion of it, the want of discipline, the great fatigue of the troops, and believed that it would be impossible to make effectual resistance to the invasion of the city; nor did he think it would be proper to attempt to defend the capitol, the troops being without provisions, and which would leave every other part of the city to the mercy of the enemy, and the prospect of losing his army.—In this consultation the secretaries of state and war, it appears, concurred in their views with general Winder, and advised him to retire and rally the troops upon the heights of Georgetown; this produced an order for the whole forces to retreat from capitol hill through Georgetown. On receiving this order the troops evinced the deepest anguish, and that order which had been previously maintained was destroyed. General Smith in his report uses this language—"when the order for a retreat from capitol hill was received, the troops evinced an anguish beyond the power of language to express."—The troops were halted at Tenleytown, and an attempt was made to collect them together, which only partially succeeded. Some returned home; some went in pursuit of refreshments, and those that halted gave themselves up to the uncontrolled feelings which fatigue, exhaustion, privation and disappointment produced. The force thus collected were marched about five miles up the Potomac, and early in the morning, Thursday the 25th, orders were given to assemble the troops at Montgomery court-house. Gen. Winder seems to have taken this position with a view to collect his forces, and to interpose for the protection of Baltimore, in case the enemy marched upon it, as was anticipated by him. On the 23d, general Winder despatched an order to the commanding officer at fort Washington to place patrols on every road leading to the garrison; and upon the event of his being taken in the rear of the fort, to blow it up and retire across the river. On the 26th, the army at Montgomery took up the line of march about ten o'clock towards Baltimore; gen.

Winder proceeded on to Baltimore. On the 27th, gen. Smith's brigade marched to this district.

The distance from Benedict to the city of Washington, by Bladensburg, is upwards of fifty miles. The enemy was without baggage waggons or means of transportation; his troops much exhausted with fatigue; many compelled to quit the ranks, and extraordinary exertions used to keep others in motion; and as if unable to pursue our forces, remained on the battle ground: the enemy's advance reached the city about 3 o'clock in the evening, the battle having ended about 2 o'clock, or before. The main body of the enemy remained on the heights west of the turnpike gate.

Doctor Catlett, the superintending surgeon, who was admitted to attend upon the wounded; and who passed through the enemy's camps and remained at Bladensburg until the city was evacuated, had the best opportunity of estimating the loss on both sides, as well as a good opportunity to ascertain the number and force of the enemy. His estimate is as follows:

Of the enemy.—On capitol hill, 700; turnpike hill, 2000; wounded at Bladensburg, 300; attendants, 300; wounded and attendants in the city of Washington, 60; killed at Bladensburg and the city, 180; total force, 3540. This statement is corroborated by all the information in his power, besides his own observations. Mr. Law estimated the enemy, on its march, at 5000; but from the best information, his estimate would be about 4,500.—Col. Monroe, who viewed the enemy on his march, estimated the number at about 6000. General Winder states that the best opinion at the Wood Yard, made the enemy from 5 to 7000. Our forces, are variously estimated; and, indeed, from the manner of collecting them, and their dispersion, makes it difficult to ascertain the number with perfect accuracy. General Stansbury represents colonel Ragan's regiment at 550; col. Schuit's regiment at 800; colonels Beall's and Hood's at 800; colonel Sterret's regiment at 500; major Pinkney's command, including two companies of artillery, 300; making 2953. But general Winder estimates colonel Beall, 6 or 700; deduct 100, this leaves 2853. To which add the command of general Smith, and militia that united with him at the Wood-yard, Battalion Old fields, the regulars under lieutenant-colonel Scott, Barney's command, the cavalry, &c. 3200; making an aggregate number of 6053. Besides this force, several detachments are spoken of by general Winder's officers, not known, amounting to several hundred. But as a small detachment was left at the Eastern Branch bridge, others, particularly some of the cavalry, were on detachment, reconnoitering, &c. the number of our forces may be estimated at least 6000, including about twenty pieces of artillery, two 18-pounders, three twelves, and the others six-pounders. Our loss on the field of battle, killed, is estimated, by the superintending surgeon, at ten or twelve, and the wounded, some of whom died, at about thirty. Gen. Winder's official report estimates our loss at about thirty killed and fifty wounded.

The probable estimate of British forces on the 24th August: Total, 4,500. Killed at Bladensburg and in the city, 180; wounded at both places, 300. American forces, 6,000. Killed, 20; wounded 40; besides the regiment under colonel Minor, 600 infantry and 100 horse, which met the retreat on the west of the turnpike gate; and general Young's brigade, about 500, which was ordered to remain on the banks of the Potomac, about twelve miles from the city of Washington, until the evening of the 24th, when he crossed over to Alexandria, and proceeded to Montgomery court-house, to join the main army.

The enemy, on the evening of the 25th, made the greatest exertions to leave the city of Washington. They had about 40 indifferent looking horses, 10 or 12 carts and waggons, one ox cart, one coach, and several gigs; these were sent to Bladensburg to move the wounded; a drove of 60 or 70 cattle preceded this party. Arriving at Bladensburg, the British surgeon was ordered to select the wounded who could walk; the 40 horses were mounted by those who could ride; the carts and waggons loaded, and upwards of 90 wounded left behind. About 12 o'clock at night, the British army passed through Bladensburg; and parties continued until morning, and stragglers until after mid-day. The retreat of the enemy to his shipping was precipitate and apparently under an alarm, and it is supposed that it was known to him that our forces had marched to Montgomery court-house.

The hon. Richard Rush, gen. Stansbury, major Wm. Pinkney, Dr. Catlett, and Mr. Law, all remark, that general Winder was active and zealous; encouraged the men and exposed himself, and acted as a man of firmness during the engagement, and endeavored to rally, with other officers, the lines as they gave way.

There seems to be a general concurrence of statement; that our forces were much fatigued, and worn down with marching, counter-marching, and their strength much exhausted, during their service, by remaining under arms much of the night, as well as the day, by false alarms, and otherwise. Nor does it appear, that it was generally known, among the officers and men of the first line, that the forces from the city were formed behind in the second line, to meet the enemy and support them. This statement is made by gen. Stansbury, major Wm. Pinkney, and some other officers of the first line.

RECAPITULATION.

This statement of facts has brought the committee to a recapitulation of some of the prominent circumstances in this part of the transaction. Without entering into the consideration of the means in the power of the administration, and the equal claims of every part of the extensive maritime and territorial frontier of the United States, in proportion to its importance and exposure, to defensive measures, the committee are of opinion that the means authorised for the security of the 10th military district by the president of the United States, in a cabinet council of the 1st of July, were ample and sufficient as to the extent of the force, and seasonable as to the time, when the measures were authorised. On the 2nd of July the 10th military district was constituted, and the command given to gen. Winder. On the 4th of July the requisition upon the states for 93,560 men was made. On the 14th of July the governors of Pennsylvania and Virginia acknowledged the receipt of the requisition of the 4th, and promised promptitude. About the 10th of July the governor of Maryland was served with the requisition, and took measures to designate a corps of 6,000 men, the whole quota from that state. On the 12th of July gen. Winder was authorised, in case of menaced or actual invasion, to call into service the whole quota of Maryland. On the 17th general Winder was authorised to call into actual service not less than 2 nor more than 3,000 of the drafts assigned to his command, to form a permanent force to be stationed in some central position between Baltimore and the city of Washington. On the same day, 17th of July, gen. Winder was authorised to call on the state of Pennsylvania for 5,000 men; on Virginia, 2,000; on the militia of the district of Columbia, in a disposable state, 2,000; together with the 6,000 from Maryland, making an aggregate force of 15,000 drafted militia, 3,000 of which authorized to be called into actual service, the residue in case of actual or menaced invasion, besides the regular troops estimated at 1,000 making 16,000, independent of marines and flotilla men. This was the measure of defence contemplated for the military district No. 10, and the measures taken by the war department up to the 17th of July, in execution of it.

In relation to the collection of this force several unfortunate circumstances intervened to produce a great and manifest failure. 1st, on the 17th of July gen. Winder was authorized, in consequence of his own suggestions and in conformity to the wishes of the president, to call into actual service as many as 3,000, and not less than 2,000 of the drafts, under the requisition of the 4th of July, assigned for the operations of his district, as a permanent corps and rallying point with his other forces in a central position as before stated, to protect Baltimore, the city of Washington, &c. in case of invasion. Gen. Winder upon the receipt of this authority, proceeded direct to Annapolis, and made this requisition upon the governor of Maryland for the actual service of 5000 men; and on the 23d of July, 30 days previous to the battle of Bladensburg, gen. Winder informs the secretary of war, that the arrangement for the force had been made, orders had issued and Bladensburg fixed as the place of rendezvous; and encourages expectation that the collection of the force would be prompt and certain. On the 27th, the governor of Maryland informs the secretary of war that measures had been taken to comply with the requisition of the 4th of July, and his orders had issued calling into actual service 3,500 men, to rendezvous at Bladensburg, to comply with the demand of gen. Winder, in conformity to the wishes of the president. In the mean time Stansbury's brigade had been called into service at Baltimore, on account of the alarm about the 15th of July, by the secretary of war, and altho' this force constituted a part of the Maryland quota of six thousand, by the consent of the secretary of war, it was to make no part of the 3,000 to be called into actual service for the purposes mentioned.

To form a correct estimate of this failure, which did not bring as many hundred men into the field, in the words of gen. Winder, it may be proper to state that at all times the marines, flotilla men and regular troops, including the different garrisons, amounted to upwards of 1,000 men. The militia of the District of Columbia amounted to 2000 men. These were always in a disposable state, and acknowledged by general Winder, in his letter of the 23d to be almost as efficient as if in actual service, and the event proved this to be correct. The disposable force at Baltimore, including Stansbury's brigade, amounted to upwards of 2,000 men, as the event proved, making an efficient force of at least 8,000 men, if the call for 5000 had been complied with. To this add the designated force assigned to the 10th military district, and the force to be raised on the spur of the occasion by calls upon the militia and population of the country en masse, and whose disposition is always operated upon more or less in proportion to the prospect of success. On the 13th of August, 21 days after the secretary of war was informed that this arrangement had been made, gen. Winder advises him that there would be almost a total failure in relation to the call for 3000 men, and as a temporary remedy proposes the acceptance of certain state troops supposed to be about 1,000, under colonels Beall and Hood, then in service at Annapolis, which was authorized; and these troops came to the battle ground, as before stated, about one half hour before the action on the 24th of Aug. The reasons which operated to produce this failure have been detailed, and there can be no object in having them repeated, as the committee do not consider it a duty to discuss the merits of those considerations.

2dly. On the 17th of July, the secretary of war, by letter, authorized the commanding general to call on Pennsylvania for 5000 men; on Virginia for 2,000 men, &c. as before stated. This letter was not received by gen. Winder until about the 8th of August, as appears by his correspondence with the governor of Pennsylvania, after a lapse of about 23 days. In explaining the delay in the receipt of this letter, gen. Winder says it originated from his being in constant motion in traversing and examining the situation and various military positions of his command, and the letter had gone the circuit with him without having received it. It is impossible for the committee to say what particular influence this circumstance had upon the collection of the troops; and it may be proper here to state, that the difficulties explained in relation to the militia laws of Pennsylvania had no bearing upon the failure of our arms, as no specific call was made upon that state till the 17th of August, when one regiment was demanded, and on the 18th the whole 5,000 were demanded; but this requisition was not received by the governor of Pennsylvania until the evening of the 23d, at which time the Pennsylvania detachment had been designated under the requisition of the 4th and ready for the call which was made upon it.

3dly. The unfortunate circumstances which delayed the arming of a Virginia regiment under col. George Minor, consisting of 600 infantry and 100 horse, who arrived in the city of Washington late on the evening of the 23d. Col. Minor called on the secretary of war, after early candle light, for orders. Col. Carberry had been charged with supplying the various corps with arms, ammunition, &c. Colonel Minor was directed to report himself to col. Carberry early next morning, who would furnish him. Col. Minor was in pursuit of col. Carberry from very early in the morning until late in the forenoon, without finding him; and after obtaining an order from general Winder, marched his regiment to Greenleaf's Point to the arsenal and magazine; where he again met with difficulties as before stated, which delayed his march and prevented him from being in the action. Having made this recapitulation of facts, the military question is presented for consideration: and having furnished the most ample means to the house, to form correct opinions on this part of the enquiry, and as most of the communications from military characters enter more or less into this military view, the committee take it for granted that they have discharged their duty, by the view they have taken, and submit this question to the consideration of the house.

THE NAVY DEPARTMENT.

As it regards the part taken by the secretary of the navy, including the destruction of the navy yard, &c. the solicitude of the president, in anticipation of the probable designs of the enemy against this city and the adjacent country, induced the secretary of the navy to cause three 12 pounders to be mounted on field carriages, and completely furnished for field service, in the month of May last, and the marines trained to act as infantry or artillery. Previous to the reinforcement of the enemy in the Patuxent, he caused to be mounted two long eighteen pounders on field carriages and prepared for field service, to be given to com. Barney, in case of emergency, to co-operate with the land forces; and com.

The capture of Alexandria.

In relation to the conduct of the corporation of Alexandria, and its capture by the enemy in his recent enterprizes, the committee have been furnished with various documents and information, and to which the committee refer: but in justice to the town and to the public, a brief retrospect may not be deemed improper, as connecting certain events with the surrender of that town on the 29th of August. October, 1812, a volunteer company was raised in Alexandria, amounting to about 70 including officers, clothed by voluntary aid and donation from the citizens of Alexandria; intended for the lines, but stationed at Fort Washington; remained in garrison till December; ordered to Annapolis, and there discharged. March, 1813, captain Marsteller's company of artillery stationed at Fort Washington, for upwards of three months. 21st of March, 1813, corporation, by committee, called on the secretary of war for arms, &c. for the defence of Alexandria. 8th of May, corporation, by committee, waited upon the president to apprise him of the defenceless state of the town: president acknowledged that attention was due to the representations of respectable men, and the proper attention should be given, and at the same time apprized the committee of the impossibility, in the nature of things, to give complete protection to every assailable point of the country. 11th of May, committee of vigilance appointed to co operate with the committee of Georgetown and the city of Washington: a deputation from the three committees waited upon general Armstrong, and represented the necessity of additional fortifications at Fort Washington: Col. Wadsworth was ordered to attend the committee, examine and report upon their suggestions. The examination was made, and colonel Wadsworth reported that the battery at Fort Washington was in such a state, and it so effectually commanded the channel of the Potomac, that it was not to be apprehended that the enemy would attempt to pass it while its present defences remain entire. Its elevated situation should prevent dread of a cannonading from ships; that in case of designs against the District of Columbia, an assault by land was most probable; to guard against this some inconsiderable work on the land was recommended; an additional fort in the same neighborhood was considered unnecessary. On the 5th and 13th of August, 1814, the corporation loaned to the U. States $5,000 dollars, upon condition that it should be expended south of Alexandria. After the defeat of Gen. Winder at Bladensburg, the corporation, by committee, waited upon the British commander at this city, to know what treatment was to be expected provided Alexandria should fall into his hands. Admiral Cockburn assured the deputation that private property would be respected; that probably some fresh provisions and flour might be wanted, but they should be paid for. Without firing a gun, on the 27th, Fort Washington was blown up and abandoned by the commanding officer, captain Dyson, who has been dismissed from the service of the United States by a sentence of a court martial, in consequence of it.

On the 28th, after the enemy's squadron passed the fort, the corporation, by deputation, proceeded to the ship commanded by captain Gordon, who commanded, and requested to know his intentions in regard to Alexandria; which he proposed to communicate when he should come opposite the town, but promised that the persons, houses and furniture of the citizens should be unmolested if he met with no opposition. Next day, the 29th, the British squadron was drawn up in line of battle so as to command the whole town. There were 2 frigates, the Seahorse, 38 guns, and Euryalus, 36 guns, 2 rocket ships of 18 guns each, 2 bomb ships of 8 guns each, and a schooner of 2 guns arranged along the town. The committee will not attempt to condense the correspondence and terms of surrender, but refer to it as part of the report. One hour was allowed the corporation to decide. It was stated to the British officer that the common council had no power to compel the return of merchandize carried to the country, nor to compel the citizens to aid in raising the sunken vessels. these two points were yielded by the enemy. The enemy was requested to explain what was included in the term merchandize which was to be taken, and in answer it was stated that it would embrace such as was intended for exportation, such as tobacco, cotton, flour, bale goods, &c. The plunder of the enemy was indiscriminate and not confined to any particular class of individuals, and included alike non-residents and inhabitants. The plunder of the enemy was confined principally to flour, cotton and tobacco.

Estimate of the loss: 3 ships, 3 brigs, several bay and river craft, some vessels burnt, 16,000 barrels flour taken, 1,000 hogsheds of tobacco, 150 bales of cotton, 5,000 dollars worth of wines, sugar, &c. In relation to a letter written by admiral Codrington to capt. Gordon, the committee will refer to the entire letter of gen. John Mason, who gives a satisfactory history of this transaction; and to complete this part of the subject, reference is had to the statement of gen. Hungerford, giving the movements of his troops, and explains the interviews he had with the deputation from Alexandria, on his march to the city of Washington.

CONCLUSION.—In the inquiry into the causes of the success of the enemy in his recent enterprizes against this metropolis and the neighboring town of Alexandria, &c. the committee consulted a mode of investigation least embarrassing to themselves and to others. They determined that as it was indispensable to resort to some of the parties for information, not derivable from other sources, it would be equally their duty to hear as far as practicable those who were deeply concerned as to character and reputation, from the agency they had in this unfortunate transaction, with a determination, that in the event of any contradictions in material circumstances, to resort to impartial sources for explanation or correction. In the mean time the committee called upon those who may be considered as impartial observers for statements, that a just comparison might be made of different allegations and representations. If, therefore, the committee have failed to call upon persons in possession of any additional facts and views not submitted, it has not been through a want of inclination to receive all that could be important, but from a want of a knowledge of such persons and such facts. It was a question with the committee at its earliest meeting, whether personal examinations before the committee should be adopted, or whether resort should be had, in the first instance, to call for written communications or to views and interrogatories submitted by the committee, and best calculated to extract every important fact. Several considerations induced the adoption of the latter mode.

It gave the committee command of part of their time to attend to other public duties equally important and obligatory. It incurred no expense to government or individuals, who were not interrupted in either their private concerns or public duties. The committee knew the anxiety of the house to have this inquiry closed as soon as possible, and which, by a different course, would have taken up the whole of the session, and encumbered with more useless and irrelevant matter and views than will be found in the communications. The committee feel therefore confident, that the house will be satisfied with the manner in which the subject has been developed; and to correct any possible error, and to receive any important fact or additional matter, although it is not very probable that much can remain, the committee will ask leave to report with a reservation of a right to make any other communication that may be found necessary to an impartial examination of this subject.

APPENDIX.

In addition to the report of the committee, in order to give a more satisfactory view and detail upon the main subjects of inquiry, and variety of incidental matter which has arisen from the investigation, the following communications are referred to as an appendix:

1st. In relation to the measures adopted by administration, and the part taken by the president and the heads of departments, the committee refers to the letters from the secretaries of state, war, navy, and the attorney general; one is also expected from the secretary of the treasury which shall be communicated when received.

2. In relation to the steps taken and measures adopted by the secretary of war, the committee refers to the correspondence with the commanding general, the governors of Pennsylvania, Maryland, and Virginia, the letter of colonel Tayloe, two reports from the ordnance office, as to arms, military stores, &c.

3. The conduct of the commanding general, the collection and disposition of the forces and the conduct and movements of different corps, the committee refers to the narrative of general Winder, his correspondence with the states of Pennsylvania, Maryland, and Virginia, the war department and various officers, the reports of general Smith, general Young, general Stansbury, colonel Sierrret, major William Pinkney, general Douglass, colonel Minor, colonel Beall, and commodore Barney's official letter.

4. In relation to the measures and arrangements and acts of the navy department, including the destruction of the navy yard and the public property, as well as the destruction of the public buildings in the city, the committee refers to a report from the secretary of the navy, a report from commodore Tingey, and a report from Mr. Munroe, superintendent of the public buildings.

5. In relation to the capture and capitulation of Alexandria, the committee refers to the proceedings of the court martial upon capt. Dyson; the correspondence between him and the secretary of war, as to the abandonment of the fort; the report of the corporation of Alexandria, including the terms of surrender, &c. and the letter from general Mason, relating to a letter from admiral Codrington.

6. In relation to general information and incidental topics, the committee refers to Mr. Law, general Van Ness, and doctor Catlett.

Destruction of the General Armstrong.

The details that follow, though they regard only a private armed vessel, will be read with great interest. We are called as much to admire the gallantry and perseverance of our seamen as the impudence of the enemy, in violating a neutral territory. But they paid dearly for this irruption on the sovereignty of Portugal, and the rights of hospitality!—The vessels that attacked the general Armstrong arrived at Jamaica on the 5th ult. and acknowledged a loss of sixty three killed and one hundred and ten wounded!—having three lieutenants killed and three wounded! Total 173!—This is not the whole by a great deal. They lost about 300, as the captain of the Rota acknowledged to our consul, that they had 120 men killed, or dead of their wounds, the day after the battle; and, according to the general scale of such things; there must have been at least double that number remaining wounded. Some of the most splendid victories the British have gained were less dearly purchased. Sir Richard Strachan, with four ships of the line and four frigates, fought a French fleet for several hours on the 3d of Nov. 1805, and captured four ships of 74 and 80 guns, with a loss of only 135 killed and wounded—less according to his account than by the British accounts of the attack on the Armstrong, they lost in capturing a privateer, hemmed up in a port! A few such victories as this would teach them better manners.

The court of Portugal is bound to pay for the privateer, and receive satisfaction for the outrage from that of Great Britain.

Copy of a letter from our consul at Fayal to the secretary of state, Fayal, 5th October 1814.

SIR—I have the honor to state to you that a most outrageous violation of the neutrality of this port, in utter contempt of the laws of civilized nations, has recently been committed here, by the commanders of his Britannic majesty's ships Plantagenet, Rota and Carnation, against the American private armed brig General Armstrong, Samuel C. Reid, commander, but I have great satisfaction in being able to add, that this occurrence terminated in one of the most brilliant actions on the part of captain Reid, his brave officers and crew, that can be found on naval record.

The American brig came to anchor in this port in the afternoon of the 26th of September, and at sun set of the same day, the above named ships suddenly appeared in these roads; it being nearly calm in the port, was rather doubtful if the privateer could escape if she got under way, and relying on the justice and good faith of the British captains, it was deemed most prudent to remain at anchor. A little after dusk captain Reid, seeing some suspicious movements on the part of the British, began to warp his vessel close under the guns of the castle, and while doing so, he was at about eight o'clock P. M. approach ed by four boats from the ships filled with armed men. After hailing them repeatedly and warning them to keep off, he ordered his men to fire on them and killed and wounded several men. The boats returned the fire and killed one man and wounded the first lieutenant of the privateer, and returned to their ships; and, as it was now light moonlight, it was plainly perceived from the brig as well as from the shore, that a formidable attack was premeditating. Soon after midnight, twelve or more large boats crowded with men from the ships and armed with carronades, swivels and blunderbusses, small arms, &c. attacked the brig; a severe contest ensued which lasted about 40 minutes and ended in the total defeat and partial destruction of the boats, with a most unparalleled carnage on the part of the British. It is estimated by good judges that near four hundred men were in the boats when the attack commenced, and no doubt exists in the mind of the numerous spectators of the scene, that more than one half of them were killed or wounded; several boats were destroyed; two of them remained along side of the brig literally loaded with their own dead. From these two boats only seventeen reached the shore alive, most of them were severely wounded. The whole of the following day the British were occupied in burying their dead; among them were two lieuts. and one midshipman of the Rota—the first lieut. of the Plantagenet, it is said, cannot survive his wounds, and many of the seamen who reached their ships were mortally wounded and have been dying daily. The British, mortified at this signal and unexpected defeat, endeavored to conceal the extent of the loss; they admit however that they lost in killed and who have died since the engagement, upwards of 120 of the flower of their officers and men. The captain of the Rota told me lost 70 men from his ship. Two days after this affair took place the British sloops of war Thais and Calypso came into port, when capt. Lloyd immediately took them into requisition to carry home the wounded officers and seamen—they have sailed for England, one on the 2d and the other on the 4th inst. each carried 25 badly wounded. Those who were slightly wounded, to the number, as I am informed, of about 30, remained on board of their respective ships, and sailed last evening for Jamaica. Strict orders were given that the sloops of war should take no letters whatever to England, and those orders were rigidly adhered to.

In face of the testimony of all Fayal and a number of respectable strangers who happened to be in this place at the moment, the British commander endeavors to throw the odium of this transaction on the American captain. Reid, alledging that he sent the boats merely to reconnoitre the brig, and without any hostile intentions; the pilots of the port did inform them of the privateer the moment they entered the port. To reconnoitre an enemy's vessel in a friendly port, at night, with four boats, carrying by the best accounts 120 men, is certainly a strange proceeding! The fact is, they expected, as the brig was warping in, that the Americans would not be prepared to receive them, and they had hopes of carrying her by a "coup de main." If any thing could add to the baseness of this transaction on the part of the British commander, it is the want of candor openly and boldly to avow the facts. In vain can he expect by such subterfuge to shield himself from the indignation of the world and the merited resentment of his own government and nation, for thus trampling on the sovereignty of their most ancient and faithful ally and for the wanton sacrifice of British lives.

On the part of the Americans the loss was comparatively nothing, two killed and seven slightly wounded; of the slain, we have to lament the loss of the second lieut. Mr. Alexander O. Williams, of New York, a brave and meritorious officer.

Among the wounded are messrs. Worth and Johnson, first and third lieutenants; captain Reid was thus deprived early in the action, of the services of all his lieutenants; but his cool and intrepid conduct secured him the victory.

On the morning of the 27th ult. one of the British ships placed herself near the shore and commenced a heavy cannonade on the privateer. Finding further resistance unavailing, capt. Reid ordered her to be abandoned after being partially destroyed, to prevent her falling into the hands of the enemy, who soon after sent their boats and set her on fire.

At 9 o'clock in the evening (soon after the first attack) I applied to the governor requesting his excellency to protect the privateer either by force or by such remonstrance to the commander of the squadron as would cause him to desist from any further attempt. The governor indignant at what had passed, but feeling himself totally unable with the slender means he possessed, to resist such a force, took the part of remonstrating, which he did in forcible but respectful terms. His letter to captain Lloyd had no other effect than to produce a menacing reply insulting in the highest degree. Nothing can exceed the indignation of the public authorities, as well as of all ranks and description of persons here, at this unprovoked enormity. Such was the rage of the British to destroy this vessel that no regard was paid to the safety of the town; some of the inhabitants were wounded and a number of houses were much damaged. The strongest representations on this subject are prepared by the governor and his council.

Since this affair the commander, Lloyd, threatened to send on shore an armed force and arrest the privateer's crew, saying there were many Englishmen among them, and our poor fellows afraid of his vengeance have fled to the mountains several times and have been harassed extremely. At length capt. Lloyd, fearful of losing more men if he put his threats in execution, adopted this stratagem: he addressed an official letter to the governor, stating that in the American crew were two men who deserted from his squadron in America, and as they were guilty of high treason, he required them to be found and given up. Accordingly a force was sent into the country, and the American seamen were arrested and brought to town, and as they could not designate the said pretended deserters, all the seamen here passed an examination of the British officers, but no such persons were to be found among them. I was requested by the governor and British consul to attend this humiliating examination, as was also captain Reid; but we declined to sanction by our presence any such proceedings.

Captain Reid has protested against the British commanders of the squadron for the unwarrantable destruction of his vessel in a neutral and friendly port, as also against the government of Portugal for their inability to protect him.

No doubt this government will feel themselves bound to make ample indemnification to the owners, officers and crew of this vessel, for the great loss they have severally sustained.

I shall as early as possible transmit a statement of this transaction to our minister at Rio Janeiro for his government.

I have the honor to be, with great respect, sir, your most obedient servant,

JO. N. B. DABNEY.

To the secretary of state of the U. S. Washington.

The following are the British accounts of this destructive affair.

Canterbury, Eng. Oct. 21—It appears that about the 28th ult. the Plantagenet, of 74 guns, capt. Lloyd Rota, captain Somerville, and Carnation, captain Benham, arrived off Fayal, a neutral port belonging to the Portuguese, and one of the Azores, perceiving a large schooner in the roads. A boat with a lieutenant was immediately dispatched on shore to ascertain her force, and to what nation she belonged; but the tide running strong the boat drifted near the schooner which was then getting under way. After hailing her and desiring the boat to keep off, which was impracticable from the schooner having so much stern way, she fired into the boat and killed seven men. The remainder returned with the boat to the squadron, and the commander considering the neutrality broken by this outrage, immediately ordered the Carnation in to destroy the privateer; but the wind being light and variable, the Carnation made a signal for boats to tow. Nine boats were accordingly dispatched, with three lieutenants and about two hundred men, but not being able to get the Carnation near enough, it being rocky, the boats proceeded to destroy the vessel, and finally set her on fire, but not till we had suffered a severe loss in men and officers. On the approach of the boats a most destructive fire was opened from a thirty two pounder amidships on board the privateer, filled with langrage, nails, knives, buttons, and other destructive matter. The crew of the privateer then escaped on shore, and fired on our men, who were ultimately successful in destroying the American. Lieutenants Multerface and Noman, of the Rota, were killed, and lieutenant Bowerbaux, of the Plantagenet, received a shot through his lungs. Altogether we suffered a loss of 135 killed and wounded.

Kingston, Jam. Nov. 15.—The following vessels came to anchor in the offing last night.

His majesty's ships Plantagenet, of 74 guns, captain Lloyd; Rota, 28, captain Somerville; and Carnation, brig of 18, captain Benham, from a cruise off Fayal, and the Emulous brig, captain Gore, from Negril.

On the 25th of September, the Plantagenet, Rota, and Carnation, touched at Fayal, and on a boat from the former going ashore, she was fired at by a large privateer schooner, which killed an officer and two men; shortly after it was ascertained that she was an American and was the General Armstrong. Her having broke the neutrality of the port, by such conduct, boats from the squadron were immediately dispatched after her, but the crew lashed her to the rocks under protection of the fort, and repaired to the summit of the cliffs, from whence they kept up a destructive fire on the boats as they approached, and we are sorry to add that lieutenants Bowerbank, Cosswell, and Rogers of the Rota were killed, as well as 38 seamen, and 85 wounded, the first, fourth and fifth lieutenants of the Plantagenet were wounded, and 22 seamen killed and 24 wounded; the boats then retreated, and the Carnation went close to the privateer the next morning, and after discharging one or two broadsides, she was entirely abandoned. Captain Benham then took possession, and finding her much shattered, burnt her to the water's edge. The privateer had been 19 days from New-York, and was fitted out for a nine months' cruise. She mounted eight long nines and a 24 pounder on a pivot, with a complement of 120 men. Her consort, the Grampus was cruising in the neighborhood of the Canary Islands.

Events of the War.

Of the present, has been called "a page of documents," and our pages are again almost monopolized by a single report laid before congress. Many articles in manuscript, with a host of facts and papers that belong to these eventful times, are laid over, as well as the regular detail of congressional proceedings and of other things that we are accustomed to insert—the mere enumeration of which would occupy more room than we have left in this number.

The "prize list" though not lately inserted, is by no means neglected. The present number is 1373; it shall appear anon, accompanied with many interesting details of "privateering news."

We are not yet certainly informed of the extent of the depredations of the enemy in the Rappahanock—regular detail, from the information we may receive, will probably appear in our next. It appears that they burnt the little town of Tappahanock, broke open the tombs at that place and abused the dead!—with the usual spoliation of property that belongs to the character of their leader, Cockburn. It seems however that they have not done all these things without loss—for a number of them were killed and some taken prisoners by the Virginia militia.

Congress has had a busy week. The bank bill that passed the senate has been before the house of representatives, and will probably pass, with some amendments. The act for filling the ranks of the army has become a law. The bill respecting militia drafts, that came from the senate, has passed the house of representatives with amendments. This bill appears little more than to extend the period of service for which the militia may be called out, from 6 to 12 months. It has, however, met with the most violent opposition. Much other business has been done, of which a due record shall be made in our next, among which will appear an interesting letter from the secretary of the treasury.

We have nothing new from Europe since our last—but in the papers brought by the Chancey, arrived at New York, there is a great body of matter that must be inserted, as fast as possible.

Maj. gen. Gaines has left Philadelphia for New Orleans. Gen. Scott takes his late command, whether in addition to the 10th District, or not, is not stated.

We may expect, for our next, some account of the proceedings of the Hartford convention, which was to have met on Thursday last. Our own remarks on that subject are only postponed for a little.

FROM GHENT. The N. Y. "Commercial Advertiser" says—We have seen a letter from one of our commissioners at Ghent, and have been permitted to copy the following sentence:

"We shall make peace if Great Britain is disposed to make it. Heretofore the war was ours; if it continues, hereafter it will be hers."

Copy of a letter from the president of the United States to the governor of New-York, in answer to a communication covering the resolution of the legislature of New-York.

WASHINGTON, November 12, 1814.

SIR—I have received your letter of the 5th inst. conveying an unanimous resolution of the two houses of the legislature of New-York, expressing the emotions with which they view the terms of peace proposed by the British commissioners at Ghent, and recommending the most vigorous measures for bringing the war to an honorable termination.

This language does great honor to the patriotism and just sentiments of the state by whose public councils it has been adopted; and the resolution derives additional value from the unanimity stamped upon it.

Such a devotion every where to the rights and dignity of our country, is alone necessary to a speedy triumph over the obstacles to an honorable peace; and such an example could proceed from no source more entitled or more conducive to patriotic emulations.

Accept, sir, an assurance of my high esteem, and my friendly respects, (Signed) JAMES MADISON.

The governor of New-York.

Canada papers furnish us with the following items. Seventy vessels, richly laden with British goods, were unloading at Quebec about the 25th ult. Of these a large part will be smuggled into the United States during the winter, if a good look out is not kept. The neutral vessel on lake Champlain was to sail from the Isle aux Noix for the head of the lake on the 25th ult. with a full cargo of British manufactures. Thirty American deserters are said to have arrived at Montreal on the 23d. There has been a violent gale on Ontario, by which many (British) merchant boats, with their cargoes and crews were lost. Among the supplies received at Quebec, there are 9,000 barrels pork.

One would have thought that the frequent beatings of the English at sea might have taught them a little humility. But so long accustomed to consider themselves invincible on the water, they cannot easily yield the supposed superiority. The following is from a Jamaica paper. To the wish that Rodgers may meet a British vessel of equal force, we heartily say Amen. The crew he had at Baltimore last September would like no better fun:—"The Java and Guerriere American ships of war, had been launched, and were getting ready to start the first opportunity. The latter is to be commanded by commodore Rodgers, who is said to have promised his countrymen, that he never will return into port unless he has captured or destroyed a British ship of at least equal force with his own. We hope he may be fortunate enough to fall in with one!"

Commodore Chauncey arrived at New-York on the 9th instant. An attack upon Sackett's Harbor was neither expected or feared.

According to a resolution intimated some time ago, William Jones esquire, resigned the office of secretary of the navy about the 1st instant. The nation has reason to regret the loss of this valuable officer, who has done more than all that preceded him (being a practical man, with a strong mind and discriminating judgment) to give a system to the whole business of our glorious little navy. The cause of his resignation, we understand, to have been entirely of a private nature. The National Intelligencer of the 12th says, "the office of secretary of the navy is yet vacant; and possibly may remain so until congress determine on the proposition submitted to them by the late secretary of the navy, for the establishment of a navy board in aid of the head of the department. Meanwhile Benjamin Romans, esquire, chief clerk in the department acts as secretary."

The enemy off the coast of Georgia is busy—but a great in-shore trade is carried on, and many valuable vessels arrive from foreign ports. A Russian ship with a rich cargo of salt, crates, dry goods and hardware entered the port of Savannah, the latter end of last month, in distress. She was in Liverpool, ostensibly for Amelia.

The accounts of our privateers on the British coasts are "truly alarming." They go about quite in "mobs," three, six or twelve together—according to the imaginations of those that are chased by them.

And one.—The Alexandria Herald, speaking of the British account of the action between the Wasp and Avon, says: "we can excuse them for magnifying an action of forty-five minutes into two hours and an half, as we have no doubt they thought the time long."

A British frigate and a brig have been off the mouth of the Patuxet several days. We have no reason to believe that the enemy's force in the Chesapeake has been considerably reinforced. It would appear that their present grand object is New-Orleans, or the southern coast; where we are tolerably well prepared for them.

The senate are busy with the tax bills that lately passed the house. It is probable they will all be concurred with,

It was reported at Boston, that the president of the U. S. had required 5000 men of the governor of Massachusetts, to be placed under the command of maj. gen. King of the militia of that state, for an "important expedition"—probably to drive the invader from the state of Massachusetts.

We have not yet received an official account of the capture of Pensacola by gen. Jackson. It is certain, however, that he has captured that place, and driven off the British. It is also understood that he would immediately retire from the same to Mobile.

Major-general Carroll marched from Nashville on the 23d ult. with 5000 men to reinforce general Jackson, whose force at Pensacola was 6000, and he will probably have at least 15,000 brave men, independent of the local militia.

That part of the district of Maine which is held by the British, contains about 20,000 inhabitants.

New-England Convention.

No. III.

I have room at present only for the following brief statement and remarks. But the folly of the jacobins as well as their ignorance, or, what is far worse, their FALSEHOOD, shall be exposed in detail, before I have done with them.

I think the most hardened will feel a little awkward hereafter when he shall speak of the "GREAT COMMERCIAL STATES OF NEW-ENGLAND!" That bubble has burst—truth divested it of the thin coat or covering it had, and dissolved it in air. But for the outrageous noise made by the jacobins, it might have floated yet longer to attract the gaze of an unthinking multitude. I have in reserve some ideas on this subject which, as soon as I can obtain the documents, will perfect the humiliation of those declaimers on commerce. I believe I can shew that one-third of the exports of Boston, (that great place, almost as big as Baltimore!) were not of the product or manufacture of the "nation of New-England," and that two-thirds of said exports were of the growth or product of the middle, southern and western states. I allude to foreign trade and have reference only to domestic articles—the fruits of agricultural or mechanical industry.

It is said, in Baltimore, by those disposed to put the most favorable construction on the intended proceedings of the convention at Hartford, that they will only propose some amendments to the constitution of the United States; intimating, that the "New-England states" have not their just portion of power in the government. So much has been said on this subject that a few figures may be useful.

The power of the government is, at least, as much in the senate as in the house of representatives of the United States. Nay, the senate is more stable, more dignified, and more powerful than the house. They can as well originate laws as the house, except those for raising a revenue, which they may amend or reject; and have, besides, many high prerogatives, or duties, that specially belong to them, particularly in the appointment of officers, civil, military or naval; and one vote has as much weight in the senate, as six votes in the house of representatives—"ergo" a senator, independent of the said special prerogatives or duties, is six times as powerful as a representative. This is very plain, and cannot be denied.

Do not be surprised, reader, but I intend to shew you that the "New-England states" instead of complaining of a want of power in the government, should be complained against for having too much of it. Never mind the blowing about the "slave representation" that has caused the shedding of a hundred gallons of ink in the town of Boston alone. We will take the free population, and see how it stands.

The whole white population of the United States, according to the census of 1810, was	5,862,093 number of senators and representatives, gives a ratio of 28,902 persons for each member of congress.
Other free persons	186,446

The whole white population of the five eastern states, by the same census, was	1,452,085
Other free persons	19,383
	1,471,470

This amount divided by the above ratio (28,902) gives to those states the right to have fifty-two members in congress; one more than they now have. This is the utmost length to which the "slave representation" can be supposed to affect them. But—The amount, 6,048,539, divided by 36, the whole number of senators: including "raw headed and bloody boned" Louisiana, gives us a ratio of 168,015 free persons, for every senator. Then as the population of the "New England states" is 1,471,470, and this being divided by 168,015, they ought to have less than nine (say nine) senators—they have ten; therefore, though in point of mere numbers, they want one of their full allowance, yet it being a fact, as before observed, that one senator has the influence of six representatives, it follows that the "New England states" have a power equal to that of four representatives more than their just proportion, according to the white population of the United States.

How will it stand 15 years hence, say in 1830?

Admitting the United States to increase as they have hitherto done, the population of the "New England States" may be,

White inhabitants	2,178,127
That of the other states will be	8,920,651

Total white persons	11,098,778
---------------------	------------

In this time, it is probable, that Maine may be erected into a state, as well as the Mississippi and Indiana territories, making the whole number of states 21, with 42 senators. Then will the power, the under power, of the "New England states," be felt (and much more so thereafter)—for, with a population of about one sixth of the whole, they will have an influence in the most stable branch of the government equal to between a third and a fourth of the whole, (12—42nds) and a general power in the business of government equal to not less than twenty members more than their population will entitle them to. See WEEKLY REGISTER, vol. VI, page 187.

If, therefore, gentlemen of the convention, you are not content with the extra taxes that the "slave states" as you call them, pay for the one extra member they have in congress, amend the constitution

*Whole white population, 11,098,778, divided by 42, whole number of senators, gives a ratio of 264,255 for each senator. Population of the New England states, 2,178,127, divided by 264,255, gives them eight senators—but they will have twelve. In 1840, at the same rate, they would be entitled to about six; in 1850; to five. Still they will have twelve!

This amount, 6,048,539, divided by 216, the whole as to relieve them from that tax, and fairly represent the white population of the U. States in both branches of the legislature, according to their numbers in the several states. Take the pen and calculate, and see what you will gain by it!

In my next I shall offer some speculations as to the property represented in congress, by the senators and representatives from the several states.

If I am inclined reluctantly to believe, that this Hartford convention may have the effect to prevent a peace, by halting out spies to the enemy of a separation; and, with it, the prospect of a subjugation of the whole of our country.

Mr. Randolph's Letter.

[From the United States' Gazette.]

Letter to a gentleman in Boston, late a member of the senate of the United States, from the state of Massachusetts.

Philadelphia, Dec. 15, 1814.

DEAR SIR—You will doubtless be surprised, but (I trust) not offended at the receipt of this letter. Of the motives which dictate it, I shall forbear to speak: let them be gathered from its context. But should you ascribe my selection of you as the object of its address to any other cause than respect for your character and confidence in your love of country, you will have done much injustice to me; but more to yourself.

At Washington, I learned the result of the despatches brought by the John Adams (a name of evil omen) and, there, rumors were afloat, which have since gathered strength, of a disposition in Massachusetts, and indeed throughout New England, to follow the example of Nantucket, and declare for a neutrality in the present contest with Great Britain. I will not believe it. What! Boston, the cradle of American independence, to whose aid Virginia stepped forth unsolicited, when the whole vengeance of the British ministry was wreaked on that devoted town. Boston! now to desert us, in our utmost need, to give up her old ally to ravage, at the price of her own impunity from the common enemy?—I cannot, will not believe it. The men, if any such there be among you, who venture to insinuate such an intent by the darkest innuendo, do they claim to be the disciples of Washington?—They are of the school of Arnold. I am not insensible to the vexations and oppressions, with which you have been harassed, with little intermission, since the memorable embargo of 1807. These I am disposed, as you well know, neither to excuse, nor to extenuate. Perhaps I may be reminded of an authority, to which I always delight to refer, "Signis irritant animos, &c." but let me tell such gentlemen, that our sufferings under political quacks of our own calling in, are not matter of heer say. It is true they are considered by the unhappy, misguided patient as evidence of the potency and consequently (according to his system of logic) of the efficacy of the medicine, as well as the inveteracy of the disease. It is not less true that this last has become, from preposterous treatment, in the highest degree alarming. The patient himself begins to suspect something of the sort, and the doctors trembling, each for his own character, are quarrelling and calling hard names among themselves. But they have reduced us to such a condition, that nothing short of the knife will now do. "We must fight, Mr. Speaker!" said Patrick Henry in 1775, when his sagacious mind saw there was nothing else left for us but manly resistance, or slavish submission; and his tongue dared to utter what his hear suggested. How much greater the necessity now, when our country is regarded not as a property to be recovered, and therefore spared, so far as is compatible with the end in view; but as an object of vengeance, of desolation.

You know my sentiments of the men at the head of our affairs, and of the general course of administration during the last eight years. You know also that the relation, in which I stand towards them is one of my own deliberate choice; sanctioned not more by my judgment than by my feelings. You, who have seen men (in the ranks, when I commanded in chief in the house of representatives, and others, at that time too green to be on the political muster roll—whose names had never been pronounced out of their own parish) raised to the highest offices; you who are thoroughly acquainted with the whole progress of my separation from the party, with which I was once connected in conduct, do not require to be told, that "there was a time in which I stood in such favor in the closet, that there must have been something extravagantly unreasonable in my wishes, if they might not all have been gratified." But I must acknowledge that you have seen instances of apostasy among your quondam political associates, as well as my own, that might almost justify a suspicion, that I too, tired of holding out, may wish to make my peace with the administration, by adding one more item "to the long catalogue of venality from Esau to the present day." Should such a shade of suspicion pass across your mind, I can readily excuse it in consideration of the common frailty of our nature, from which I claim no peculiar exemption, and the transcendent wickedness of the times we live in: but you will have given me credit for a talent which I do not possess. I am master of no such ambi-dexterity; and were I to attempt this game, which it is only for adepts (not novices) to play! I am thoroughly conscious, that like other bungling rogues, I should at once expose my knavery and miss my object—not that our political church refuses to open her arms to the vilest of hereticks and sinners who can seal their abjuration of their old faith by the prosecution of the brethren with whom they held and professed it; but I know that my nerves are of too weak a fibre to hear the question ordinary and extraordinary from our political inquisitors. I can sustain with composure and even with indifference the rancorous hatred of the numerous enemies, whom it has been my lot to make in the course of my unprosperous life—but I have not yet steeled myself to endure the contemptuous pity of those noble and high minded men, whom I glory to call my friends, and I am on too bad terms with the world, to encounter my own self disrespect.

You may however very naturally ask, why I have chosen you for the object of this address? Why I have not rather selected some one of those political friends, whom I have yet found "faithful among the faithless," as the vehicle of my opinions. It is because the avenue to the public ear is shut against me in Virginia, and I have been flattered to believe that the sound of my voice may reach New England; Nay, that it would be heard there, not without attention and respect. With us the press is under a virtual imprimatur, and it would be more easy, at this time, to force into circulation the treasury notes, than opinions militating against the administration, through the press in Virginia. We were indeed beginning to open our eyes in spite of the opiate with which we were drugged by the newspapers, and the busy hum of the insects that bask in the sunshine of court patronage, when certain events occurred, the most favorable that could have happened for our valers; whose "luck," verifying the proverb, is in the inverse ratio of their wisdom; or, perhaps I ought to say, who have the cunning to take advantage of glaring acts of indiscretion, in their adversities at home and abroad, as these may affect the public mind: and such have never failed to come to their relief, when otherwise their case would have been hopeless. I give you the most serious assurance, that nothing less than the shameful conduct of the enemy and the complexion of certain occurrences to the eastward could have sustained Mr. Madison after the disgraceful affair at Washington. The public indignation would have overwhelmed, in one common ruin, himself and his hiring newspapers—The artillery of the press, so long the instrument of our subjugation, would, as at Paris, have been turned against the destroyer of his country: when we are told that old England says, he "shall," and New England that he "must," retire from office, as the price of peace with the one, and of union with the other. We have too much English blood in our veins to submit to this dictation, or to any thing in the form of a threat. Neither of these people know any thing of us. The ignorance of her foreign agents, not only of the country to which they are sent, but even of their own, has exposed England to general derision. She will learn, when it is too late that, we are a high minded people, attached to our liberty and our country, because it is free, in a degree inferior to no people under the sun. She will discover that "our trade would have been worth more than our spoil," and that she has made deadly enemies of a whole people, who, in spite of her and of the world, of the sneers of her sophists, or of the force of her arms, are destined to become, within the present century, a mighty nation. It belongs to New England to say, whether she will constitute a portion, an important and highly respectable portion of this nation, or whether she will dwindle into that state of insignificant, nominal independence, which is the precarious curse of the minor kingdoms of Europe. A separation made in the fulness of time, the effect of amicable arrangements, may prove mutually beneficial to both parties: such would have been the effect of American independence, if the British ministry could have listened to any suggestion but that of their own impotent rage: but a settled hostility embittered by the keenest recollections, must be the result of a disunion between you and us, under the present circumstances. I have sometimes wished that Mr. Madison (who endeavored to thwart the wise and benevolent policy of general Washington "to regard the English like other nations, as enemies in war, in peace friends,")* had succeeded in embroiling us with the court of St. James, twenty years sooner. We should in that case, have had the father of his country to conduct the war and to make the peace; and that peace would have endured beyond the life time of the authors of their country's calamity and disgrace. But I must leave past recollections. The present and the immediate future claim our attention.

It may be said, that in time of peace, the people of every portion of our confederacy find themselves too happy to think of division; that the sufferings of a war, like this, are requisite, to rouse them to the necessary exertion: war is incident to all governments; and wars I very much fear will be wickedly declared, and weakly waged, even by the New-England confederacy, as they have been by every government (not even excepting the Roman republic) of which we have any knowledge; and it does appear to me, no slight presumption that the evil has not yet reached the point of amputation, when peace alone, will render us the happiest (as we are the freest) people under the sun; at least too happy to think of dissolving the union, which, as it earned us through the war of our revolution, will, I trust, bear us triumphant through that in which we have been plunged, by the incapacity and corruption of men, neither willing to maintain the relations of peace, nor able to conduct the perils of war. Should I, unhappily, be mistaken in this expectation, let us see what are to be the consequences of the separation, not to us, but to yourselves. An exclusion of your tonnage and manufactures from our ports and harbors. It will be our policy to encourage our own, or even those of Europe in preference to yours; a policy more obvious than that which induced us of the south, to consent to discriminating duties in favor of American tonnage, in the infancy of this government. It is unnecessary to say, to you that I embrace the duties on imports, as well as the tonnage duty, when I allude to the encouragement of American shipping. It will always be our policy to prevent your obtaining a naval superiority, and consequently to cut you off entirely from our carrying trade. The same plain interest will cause us to prefer any manufactures to your own. The intercourse with the rest of the world, that exchanges our surplus for theirs, will be the nursery of our steamships in the middle states you will find rivals, not very heartily indisposed to shut out the competition of your shipping. In the same section of country and in the boundless west, you will find jealous competitors of your mechanics—you will be left to settle, as you can, with England, the question of boundary on the side of New Brunswick, and unless you can bring New York to a state of utter blindness, as to her own interests, that great, thriving and most populous member of the southern confederacy will present a hostile frontier to the only states of the union of Hartford, that can be estimated as of any efficacy. Should that respectable city be chosen as the seat of the eastern congress, that body will sit within 60 days march of the most populous county of New York, (Duchess) of itself almost equal to some of the New England States. I speak not in derision, but in soberness and sadness of heart. Rather let me say, that like a thorough bred diplomatist, I try to suppress every thing like feeling, and to treat this question as a dry matter of calculation: well knowing, at the same time, that in this, as in every question of vital interest, "our passions instruct our reason." The same high authority has told us that Jacobinism is of no country, that it is a sect found in all. Now, as our Jacobins in Virginia would be very glad to hear of the bombardment of Boston, so, I very much fear, your Jacobins would not be very sorry to hear of a servile insurrection in Virginia. But such I trust is the general feeling in neither country, otherwise I should at once agree that union, like the marriages of Mezentius, was the worst that could befall us. For, with every other man of common sense, I have always regarded union as the means of liberty and safety, in other words of happiness, and not as an end, to which these are to be sacrificed. Neither, at the same time, are means so precious, or efficient (in proper hands) of these desirable objects, to be thrown, rashly aside, because, in the hands of bad men, they have been made the instrument almost of our undoing.

You in New-England (it is unnecessary I hope to specify when I do not address myself personally to yourself) are very wide of the mark, if you suppose that we to the south, do not suffer at least as much as yourselves, from the impolicy of Mr. Madison's conduct the defence of the country. Do you ask why we do not change those rulers? I reply, because we are a people, like your own Connecticut, of steady habits. Our confidence once given is not hastily withdrawn. Let those who will, abuse the fickleness of the people; I shall say such is not the character of the people of Virginia. They may be deceived, but they are honest. Taking advantage of their honest prejudices, the growth of our revolution, fostered not more by Mr. Jefferson than by the injuries and (what is harder to be born) the insults of the British ministry since the peace of 1783, a combination of artful men, has, with the aid of the press and the possession of the machinery of government (a powerful engine in any hands) led them to the brink of ruin. I can never bring myself to believe, that the whole mass of the landed proprietors in any country, but especially such a country as Virginia, can seriously plot its ruin. Our government is in the hands of the landed proprietors only. The very men of whom you complain, have left nothing undone that they dared to do, in order to destroy it. Foreign influence is unknown among us. What we feel of it is through the medium of the general government, which acted on, itself, by foreign renegades, serves as a conductor, between them and us, of this pernicious influence. I know of no foreigner who has been, or is, in any respectable office in the gift of the people, or the government of Virginia. No member of either house of congress, no leading member of our assembly, no judge of our supreme courts: of the newspapers printed in the state, as far as my knowledge extends, without discrimination of party, they are conducted by native Virginians. Like yourselves, we are an unmixed people. I know the prejudice that exists against us, nor do I wonder at it, considering the gross ignorance on our subject that prevails north of Maryland, and even in many parts of that neighboring state.

What member of the confederacy has sacrificed more on the altar of public good than Virginia? Whence did the general government derive its lands beyond the Ohio, then and now, almost the only source of revenue? From our grant,—a grant so curiously worded, and by our present Palinurus too, as to except ourselves, by its limitations, from the common benefit.

By its conditions it was forbidden ground to us, and thereby the foundation was laid of incurable animosity, and division between the states on each side of the great natural boundary, the river Ohio. Not only their masters, but the very slaves themselves, for whose benefit this regulation was made, were sacrificed by it. Dispersion is to them a bettering of their present condition and of their chance for emancipation. It is only when this can be done without danger and without ruinous individual loss that it will be done at all. But what is common sense to a political Quixote?

That country was ours by a double title, by charter and by conquest. George Rogers Clark, the American Hannibal, at the head of the state troops, by the reduction of Post Vincennes, obtained the lakes for our northern boundary at the peace of Paris. The march of that great man and his brave companions in arms across the drowned lands of the Wabash, does not shrink from a comparison with the passage of the Thrasimene marsh. Without meaning any thing like an invidious distinction, I have not heard of any cession from Massachusetts of her vast wilds; and Connecticut has had the address, out of our grant to the firm, to obtain, on her own private account, some millions of acres: whilst we, yes we, I blush to say it, have descended to beg for a pittance, out of the property once our own, for the brave men by whose valor it had been won and whom heedless profusion had disabled us to recompense. We met the just fate of the prodigal. We were spurned from the door, where once we were master, with derision and scorn; and yet we hear of undue Virginian influence. This fund yielded the government, when I had connexion with it, from half a million to eight hundred thousand dollars, annually. It would have preserved us from the imposition of state taxes, founded schools, built bridges and made roads and canals throughout Virginia. It was squandered away in a single donative at the instance of Mr. Madison. For the sake of concord with our neighbors, by the same generous but misguided policy, we ceded to Pennsylvania Fort Pitt, a most important commercial and military position, and a vast domain around it, as much Virginia as the city of Richmond and the county of Henrico. To Kentucky, the eldest daughter of the union, the Virginia of the west, we have yielded on a question of boundary, from a similar consideration. Actuated by the same magnanimous spirit at the instance of other states (with the exception of New-York, North Carolina and R. Island) we accepted, in 1783, the present constitution. It was repugnant to our judgment and fraught, as we feared, with danger to our liberties. The awful voice of our ablest and soundest statesmen, of Patrick Henry and of George Mason, never before, or since, disregarded, warned us of the consequences. Neither was their counsel entirely unheeded, for it led to important subsequent amendments of that instrument. I have always believed this disinterested spirit, so often manifested by us, to be one of the chief causes of the influence which we have exercised over the other states.—Eight states having made that constitution their own, we submitted to the yoke for the sake of union. Our attachment to the union is not an empty profession. It is demonstrated by our practice at home. No sooner was the convention of 1788 dissolved, than the feuds of federalism and anti-federalism disappeared. I speak of their effects on our councils. For the sake of union, we submitted to the lowest state of degradation; the administration of John Adams. The name of this man calls up contempt and derision, wheresoever it is pronounced. To the fantastic vanity of this political Malvolio may be distinctly traced our present unhappy condition. I will not be so ungenerous as to remind you that this personage (of whom, and his addresses, and his answers, I defy you to think without a bitter smile) was not a Virginian, but I must in justice to ourselves, insist upon making him a set off against Mr. Madison. They are of such equal weight, that the trembling balance reminds us of that passage of Pope, where Jove "weighs the beaux wits against the lady's hair;

"The doubtful beam long nods from side to side,
"At length the wits mount up, the hairs subside."

Intoxicated not more by the fulsome adulation with which he was plied, than by the fumes of his own vanity, this poor old gentleman saw a visionary coronet suspended over his brow, and an air drawn sceptre "the handle towards his hand," which attempting to clutch, he lost his balance, and disappeared never to rise again. He it was, who "enacting" Nat: Lee's Alexander, raved about the people of Virginia as "a faction to be humbled in dust and ashes," when the sackcloth was already prepared for his own back.

But I am spinning out this letter to too great a length. What is your object—PEACE? Can this be attained on any terms, whilst England sees a prospect of disuniting that confederacy, which has already given so deep a blow to her maritime pride, and threatens at no very distant day to dispute with her the empire of the ocean? The wound which our gallant tars have inflicted on her tenderest point has maddened her to rage. Cursed as we are with a weak and wicked administration, she can no longer despise us. Already she begins to hate us; and she seeks to glut a revenge as impotent as it is rancorous, by inroads that would have disgraced the buccanniers, and bulletins that would only not disgrace the sovereign of Elba. She already is compelled to confess in her heart, what her lips deny, that if English bull dogs and game cocks degenerate on our soil, English men do not:—and should (which God forbid!) our brethren of the East desert us in this contest for all that is precious to man, we will maintain it, so long as our proud and insulting foe shall refuse to accede to equitable terms of peace. The government will then pass into proper hands—The talents of the country will be called forth, and the schemes of moon-struck philosophers and their disciples pass away and “leave not a rack behind.”

You know how steady and persevering I endeavored, for eight years, to counteract the artful and insidious plans of our rulers to embroil us with the country of our ancestors, and the odium which I have thereby drawn upon myself. Believing it to be my duty to soften, as much as possible, the asperities which subsisted between the two countries, and which were leading to a ruinous war, I put to hazard, nay exposed to almost certain destruction, an influence such as no man, perhaps, in this country, at the same age, had ever before attained.—(The popularity that dreads exposure is too delicate for public service. It is a bastard species: the true sort will stand the hardest frosts.) Is it my fault (as Mr. Burke complained of the crowned heads of Europe) that England will no longer suffer me to find palliatives for her conduct? No man admired more than I did her magnanimous stand against the tyrant, before whom all the rest of Christendom at one time bowed: No man, not even her own Wilberforce and Perceval, put up more sincere prayers for her deliverance. In the remotest isle of Austral-Asia, my sympathy would have been enlisted, in such a contest, for the descendants of Alfred and Bacon, and Shakespeare, and Milton, and Locke on whom I love to look back as my illustrious countrymen—in any contest I should have taken side with liberty; but on this depended (as I believed and do still believe) all that made my own country dear in my sight. It is past—and unmindful of the mercy of that protecting Providence which has carried her through the valley of the shadow of death, England “feels power and forgets right.” I am not one of that whining set of people who cry out against mine adversary for the force of his blow. England has, unquestionably, as good a right to conquer us, as we have to conquer Canada: the same right that we have to conquer England, and with about as good prospect of success. But let not her orators declaim against the enormity of French principles, when she permits herself to arm and discipline our slaves, and to lead them into the field against their masters, in the hope of exciting by the example, a general insurrection, and thus render Virginia another St. Domingo. And does she talk of jacobinism! What is this but jacobinism? and of the vilest stamp. Is this the country that has abolished the slave trade? that has made that infamous, inhuman traffic a felony? that feeds with the bread of life all who hunger after it, and even those who, but for her, would never have known their perishing condition. Drunk with the cup of the abominations of Moloch, they have been roused from the sleep of death, like some benighted traveller perishing in the snows, and warned into life by the beams of the only true religion. Is this the country of Wilberforce and Howard? It is;—but, like my own, my native land, it has fallen into the hands of evil men, who pour out its treasure and its blood at the shrine of their own guilty ambition. And this impious sacrifice they celebrate amidst the applauses of the deluded people, and even of the victims themselves.

There is a proneness in mankind to throw the blame of their sufferings on any one but themselves. In this manner, Virginia is regarded by some of her sister states; not adverting to the fact, that all (Connecticut and Delaware excepted) are responsible for the measures that have involved us in our present difficulties. Did we partition your state into those unequal and monstrous districts which have given birth to a new word in your language, of uncouth sound, calling up the most odious associations. Did we elect the jacobins whom you sent to both houses of congress—the Bidwells, and Gannetts, and Skimmers,—to spur on the more moderate men from Virginia to excesses which they reluctantly gave into at the time, and have since been ashamed of. Who hurried the bill suspending the privilege of the writ of HABEAS CORPUS through a trembling servile senate, in consequence, as he did not blush to state, of a *verbal communication from the president? A senator from Massachusetts and professor in her venerable university. In short, have not your first statesmen (such I believe was the reputation of the gentleman in question at the time) your richest merchants and the majority of your delegation in congress vied in support of the men and the measures that have led to our present suffering and humiliated condition.

If you wished to separate yourselves from us, you had ample provocation in time of peace, in an embargo the most unconstitutional and oppressive; an engine of tyranny, fraud and favoritism. Then was the time to resist (we did not desert England in a time of war) but you were then under the domination of a faction among yourselves, yet a formidable minority, exhibiting no signs of diminution; and it is not the least of my apprehensions from certain proceedings to the eastward, that they may be made the means of consigning you again, and forever, to the same low, insolent domination. The reaction of your jacobins upon us (for although we have some in Virginia, they are few and insignificant) through the men at Washington (“who must conciliate good republicans”) is dreadful. Pause, I beseech you pause! You tread on the brink of destruction. Of all the Atlantic states you have the least cause to complain.—Your manufactures, and the trade which the enemy has allowed you, have drained us of our last dollar. How then can we carry on the war? With men and steel—stout hearts,

*The constitution admits of the suspension of this writ only when invasion, or insurrection, shall assume such a shape as to make it indispensable.—And yet a bill passed the senate for that purpose, without any official communication from the president of the existence of the one or the other fact, upon which alone it could be bottomed. The honorable senate sat with closed doors. The yeas and nays were not taken, and no record remains of the names of those who voted against it. If that body was unanimous (as is believed) in the vote, this omission was well advised.

† A Virginian and New England republican are about as much alike as an English whig and a French democrat.

and willing hands—and these from the days of Darius and Xerxes, in defence of the household gods of freedom, have proved a match for gold. Can they not now encounter paper? We shall suffer much from this contest, it will cut deep: but dismissing its authors from our confidence and councils for ever (I speak of a few leaders and their immediate tools, not of the deluded, as well in, as out of authority) we shall pass, if it be the good pleasure of Him whose curses are tempered with mercies, through an agony and a bloody sweat, to peace and salvation; to that peace which is only to be found in a reconciliation with Him. "Atheists and madmen have been our law givers," and when I think on our past conduct I shudder at the chastisement that may await us. How has not Europe suffered for her sins! Will England not consider, that, like the man who but yesterday bestrode the narrow world, she is but an instrument in his hands, who breaketh the weapons of his chastisement, when the measure of his people's punishment is full?

When I exhort to further patience—to resort to constitutional means of redress only, I know that there is such a thing as tyranny as well as oppression. And that there is no government however restricted in its power, that may not, by abuse, under pretext of exercise of its constitutional authority, drive its unhappy subjects to desperation. Our situation is indeed awful. The members of the union in juxta position—held together by no common authority to which men can look up with confidence and respect. Smitten by the charms of Upper Canada, our president has abandoned the several states to shift for themselves as they can.—Congress is felo de se. In practice there is found little difference between a government of requisitions on the states, which these disregard, or a government of requisitions on the people, which the governors are afraid to make until the public faith is irretrievably ruined. Congress seemed barred by their own favorite act of limitations, from raising supplies; prescription runs against them. But let us not despair of the common wealth. Some master spirit may be kindled by the collision of the times, who will breath his own soul into the councils and armies of the republic; and here indeed is our chiefest danger. The man who is credulous enough to believe that a constitution, with the skeleton of an establishment of 10,000 men, not 2,000 strong, (such was our army three years ago) is the same as with an army of 60,000 men, may be a very amiable neighbor but is utterly unfit for a statesman. Already our government is in fact changed. We are become a military people, of whom more than of any other it might have been said—fortunatus sua si bona novit. If under such circumstances you ask me what you are to do, should a conscription of the model of Bonaparte be attempted? I will refer you to its reputed projector, colonel Monroe. Ask him what he would have done, whilst governor of Virginia and preparing to resist federal usurpation, had such an attempt been made by Mr. Adams and his ministers: especially in 1800. He can give the answer.

But when you complain of the representation of three-fifths of our slaves, I reply that it is one of the articles of that compact, which you submitted to us for acceptance and to which we reluctantly acceded.—Our constitution is an affair of compromise between the states, and this is the master key which unlocks all its difficulties.—If any of the parties to the compact are dissatisfied with their share of influence, it is an affair of amicable discussion, in the mode pointed out by the constitution itself, but no cause for dissolving the confederacy. And when I read and hear the vile stuff against my country printed and uttered on this subject, by fire-brands who ought to be quenched forever, I would remind, not these editors of journals and declaimers at clubs, but their deluded followers, that every word of these libels on the planters of Virginia, is as applicable to the father of his country as to any one among us; that in the same sense that we are "slave holders" and "negro drivers" and "dealers in human flesh" (I must be pardoned for culling a few of their rhetorical flowers) so was he, and whilst they upbraid Virginia with her Jeffersons and her Madisons, they will not always remember to forget that to Virginia they were indebted for a Washington.

I am, with the highest respect and regard, dear sir, your obedient servant,

JOHN RANDOLPH, of Roanoke.

Proceedings of Congress.

Brief abstract of things necessary to be known and preserved...

SENATE.

Friday, Dec. 2. The bill (reported some days ago) to authorize the purchase of the library of Thomas Jefferson, was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

The bill to extend Oliver Evans's patent for steam engines, was read a third time, passed, and sent to the house for concurrence.

The following motion of Mr. Anderson, made some days ago, was taken up, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the committee to whom was referred so much of the message of the president of the United States as relates to naval affairs, be instructed to inquire into the expediency of making provision by law, that the officers and crews of the vessels authorized to be built or purchased, by an act passed the 15th day of November, one thousand eight hundred and fourteen, may be entitled to receive the whole of the prize money which may arise from the sale of such vessel or vessels, and their cargoes, as they may capture, and which may be condemned as good prize according to law; and that the committee have leave to report by bill or otherwise.

The bill further in addition to an act, entitled "an act more effectually to provide for the national defence by establishing an uniform militia throughout the United States," reported by Mr. Worthington (lately a senator from Ohio) was taken up and considered.

On motion of Mr. Horsey to postpone the further consideration of the same to the 1st Monday in December next—in other words to reject the bill—the vote stood as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Daggett, Dana, Fromentin, Gore, Goldsborough, Horsey, Hunter, King, Lambert, Mason, Smith, Tait, Taylor, Thompson, Turner, Walker—16

NAYS—Messrs. Anderson, Bibb, Bledsoe, Chase, Condit, Gaillard, German, Lacock, Morrow, Roberts, Varnum, Wharton—12.

Mr. King, from the committee to whom was referred the petition of sundry bankers and merchants of New York on the subject, reported a bill to in-

* One of our great complaints against the mother country, previous to the declaration of independence, was the repeated rejection, by the crown, of our bills abolishing the slave trade. With our connexion with Great Britain that traffick ceased. England thus forced upon us, for the benefit of the merchants of Bristol, the very slaves whom we are now reproached with holding, and whom she disciplines for our destruction. Does she forget Jamaica and Barbadoes.

incorporate the subscribers to the bank of the United States of America. [This bill is materially of the same character as the first reported by the committee of ways and means.] The bill was read and passed to a second reading.

Tuesday, Dec. 6.—Mr. Tait, from the committee on naval affairs, reported a bill for the appointment of certain naval officers (three admirals)—which was read and passed to a second reading.

The bill from the house to provide for the defraying the expences of the government, and for the payment of the public debt, by additional duties on whiskey, &c. was taken up, considered and amended.

A motion was made by Mr. German of N. Y. to strike out that section of the bill which authorizes the sale by distillers of liquors in any quantity not less than one gallon; which question was decided in the affirmative by the following vote: for the motion 15; against it 13.

A motion was then made by Mr. Bledsoe of Ky. to strike out twenty cents (the proposed additional duty per gallon) and insert fifteen; which motion was negatived as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Anderson, Bibb, Bledsoe, Chase, Lacock, Morrow, Roberts, Turner, Walker, Wharton.—10.

NAYS.—Messrs. Brown, Condit, Daggett, Dana, Fromentin, Gaillard, German, Goldsborough, Gore, Horsey, Hunter, King, Lambert, Mason, Smith, Tait, Taylor, Thompson, Varnum.—19.

The question on the passage of this bill to a third reading, as amended, was decided in the affirmative by the following decisive vote:

YEAS.—Messrs. Anderson, Bibb, Brown, Chase, Condit, Daggett, Fromentin, Gaillard, German, Goldsborough, Gore, Horsey, Hunter, King, Lacock, Lambert, Mason, Morrow, Roberts, Smith, Tait, Taylor, Thompson, Turner, Varnum, Walker, Wharton.—27.

NAY.—Mr. Bledsoe.

The house then resumed the consideration of the national bank bill.—Mr. Mason's motion to reduce the capital from fifty to twenty millions yet under consideration. Mr. Smith of Md. opposed, and Mr. King of N. Y. supported the motion.—And the bill was postponed to to-morrow.

Wednesday, Dec. 7.—The bill authorising the appointment of certain naval officers was read a second time.

The senate took up the amendments of the house of representatives to the bill sent from this house making further provision for filling the ranks of the army of the United States, which they agreed to.

The senate resumed the consideration of the bill to incorporate the subscribers to the bank of the United States of America.

Mr. Mason's motion to reduce the proposed capital of the bank from fifty to twenty millions being yet under consideration—

An able and comprehensive debate arose as well on the expediency of the proposed bank as on the particular motion before the senate, in which Mr. King supported and Messrs. Bibb of Geo. Taylor and Smith opposed the reduction of the capital.

The question was then taken on Mr. Mason's motion, and decided as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Brown, Daggett, Dana, Fromentin, German, Goldsborough, Gore, Horsey, Hunter, King, Lambert, Mason, Thompson.—13.

NAYS.—Messrs. Anderson, Bibb, Bledsoe, Brent, Chase, Condit, Gaillard, Lacock, Morrow, Roberts, Robinson, Smith, Tait, Taylor, Turner, Varnum, Walker, Wharton.—18.

So the motion was lost.

The bill proposes that subscriptions shall be forthwith opened for forty millions of the capital stock.

Mr. Mason moved to strike out forty and insert thirty in lieu thereof; and a division of the question being required by Mr. Dana—

The question on striking out the word forty was negatived, by precisely the same vote as that just recorded.

After making further progress in the bill, the senate adjourned.

Thursday, December 8. The bill to incorporate the subscribers to the bank of the United States of America, was further discussed; and amendments proposed thereto, some of which were agreed to, and others rejected.

The question to engross the bill for a third reading (a decisive question) exhibited the following result in favor of the bill:

YEAS.—Messrs. Anderson, Bibb, Bledsoe, Brent, Chase, Condit, Gaillard, Lacock, Morrow, Roberts, Robinson, Smith, Tait, Taylor, Turner, Varnum, Walker, Wharton.—18.

NAYS.—Messrs. Brown, Daggett, Dana, Fromentin, German, Goldsborough, Gore, Horsey, Hunter, King, Lambert, Mason, Thompson.—13.

Friday, December 9. The bill from the house for laying additional duties on carriages and carriage harness, was, as amended in the senate, ordered to a third reading.

The bill making additional appropriations for the service of the year 1814, and the bill requiring the staff officers of the army to comply with the requisitions of marine and naval officers in certain cases, were ordered to be read a third time.

The engrossed bill to incorporate the subscribers to the bank of the United States of America, was read a third time. The question "shall the bill pass?" was decided by the following vote:

YEAS.—Messrs. Anderson, Bibb, Bledsoe, Brent, Chase, Condit, Lacock, Morrow, Roberts, Robinson, Smith, Tait, Taylor, Turner, Walker, Varnum, Wharton.—17.

NAYS.—Messrs. Brown, Daggett, Dana, Fromentin, Gaillard, German, Goldsborough, Gore, Horsey, Hunter, King, Lambert, Mason, Thompson.—14.

So the bill was passed and sent to the house for concurrence.

Saturday, December 10. The bill to provide for defraying the expences of the government and for the maintenance of the public credit, by duties on carriages and carriage harness; the bill to require staff officers of the army to comply with the requisitions of naval officers in certain cases; and the bill making additional appropriations for the service of the year 1814; were read a third time and passed, and the first and last of them returned to the house for concurrence in the amendments.

Tuesday, December 13. The bill authorizing the appointment of certain naval officers therein named, was read a third time and passed.

[The bill authorizes the president of the United States, by and with the advice and consent of the senate, to appoint one vice-admiral, and two rear admirals; and fixes their compensation.]

No other legislative business of moment has been done by the senate within the two last days.

Wednesday, Dec. 14. The senate resumed the consideration of the bill to lay additional duties on sales at auction, postage on letters, and retailer's licences.

Mr. Horsey moved to strike out of the bill the section laying an additional duty of fifty per cent on the present rates of postage.

This motion was decided thus:

YEAS—Messrs. Daggett, Dana, German, Gore, Horsey, Hunter, Kug, Lambert, Mason, Smith, Thompson—11.

NAYS—Messrs. Bibb, Bledsoe, Chase, Condit, Fromentin, Gaillard, Morrow, Roberts, Tait, Taylor, Turner, Varnum, Walker, Wheaton—14.

This bill having been otherwise amended, was ordered to a third reading.

The senate re-considered its vote to amend the whiskey tax bill by striking out the section allowing distillers to sell any quantity of liquor not less than one gallon; and having determined to insist thereon, and request a conference on the same with the house, Messrs. Taylor, King and Bledsoe were appointed managers thereof on the part of this house.

Mr. Gore gave notice that he should to-morrow ask leave to bring in a bill for allowing to the widow of the late vice president his salary for the remainder of the term for which he was elected.

Thursday, Dec. 15. The bill from the house for laying additional taxes on sales at auction, postages and retailer's licences, as amended, was read a third time, and the amendments sent to the senate for their concurrence therein. The following was the vote on the passage of the bill.

YEAS—Messrs. Anderson, Bibb, Bledsoe, Brown, Chase, Condit, Fromentin, Gaillard, Lacombe, Mason, Morrow, Roberts, Robinson, Smith, Taylor, Turner, Varnum, Walker, Wharton—19.

NAYS—Messrs. Dagget, Gore, Horsey, Hunter, King, Lambert, Thompson—7.

Mr. Gore, agreeably to notice given by him having obtained leave, introduced a bill, "authorising the payment to the widow of Elbridge Gerry, deceased, late vice-president of the United States, of such salary, as would have been payable to him during the residue of the term for which he was elected, had he so long lived;" which bill was read and passed to a second reading.

The amendments of the house to the senate's militia draft bill, were read, and, on motion of Mr. Smith, referred to the military committee.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

December 1—A report was received from the secretary of the navy, relative to the cost, expenditures and state of the navy yard. The house resolved to meet at ten o'clock in the morning for the remainder of the session.

The engrossed bill to provide additional revenue for defraying the expenses of government and maintaining public credit, by duties on sales at auction, on the postage of letters, and on licenses to retail wines, spirituous liquors, and foreign merchandize, was read a third time. The question on the passage of the bill was decided by the following votes:

YEAS—Messrs. Alexander, Alston, Anderson, Avery, Barbour, Bayly, of Va. Bowen, Bradley, Brown, Burwell, Butler, Caldwell, Calhoun, Cannon, Chappell, Clark, Clifton, Constock, Condict, Conrad, Cox, Crawford, Creighton, Cuthbert, Dana, Davis, of Penn. Denoyelles, Desha, Duval, Earl, Eppes, Evans, Farrow, Fisk, of Mt. Fisk, of N. Y. Forney, Forsyth, Franklin, Gaston, Geddes, Glasgow, Goodwyn, Goudin, Griffin, Grosvenor, Hall, Harris, Hasbrouck, Hawes, Hopkins, of Ken. Hubbard, Humphreys, Hungerford, Ingersoll, Ingham, Irving, Irwin, Johnson, of Virg. Johnson, of Ken. Kennedy, Kent, of N. Y. Kent, of M. Kerr, Kershaw, Kilbourn, Leferts, Lowndes, Lyle, Macon, McCoy, McKee, McKim, M'Lean, Montgomery, Moore, Murfree, N. Ison, Newton, Oakley, Ombsy, Parker, Pearson, Piper, Pleasant, Rea, of Penn. Rheas, of Tenn. Rich, Roane, Robertson, Sevier, Seybert, Sharp, Skinner, Smith, of Virg. Stanford, Stockton, Sturges, Taggart, Thompson, Vose, Ward, of Mass. Webster, Wheaton, White, Wilcox, Wilson, of Penn. Winters, Yancy—114.

NAYS—Messrs. Baylies, of Mass. Bigelow, Boyd, Bradbury, Culp, Culpepper, Davenport, Davis, of Mass. Ely, Hale, Henderson, Hurlbert, Jackson, of R. I. King, of Mass. Lewis, Lusk, Lovett, Miller, Mosely, Markell, Pickering, Pitkin, J. Reed, Ruggles, Schureman, Shipdard, Sturges, Taggart, Thompson, Vose, Ward, of Mass. Webster, Wheaton, Wilcox—35.

So the bill was put and sent to the house for concurrence. The engrossed bill to provide additional revenue for defraying the expenses of government and maintaining public credit, by duties on carriages, &c. was then read a third time and passed without debate, by the following vote:—For the bill 129—Against it 21.

The president's message communicating the despatches from Ghent, was received and read.

December 2.—The speaker laid before the house a letter from the secretary of the treasury, in reply to one from the speaker requiring a warrant for money to defray the charge of this house, apprising him that, the appropriation on this head being exhausted, a further provision therefor by law was necessary. The letter was ordered to lie on the table, on the information of Mr. Ingham that the committee of ways and means were about to act on the subject.

The bill from the senate to call out 80,330 militia was discussed in committee of the whole, and substantially agreed to. The house then took up the other bill from the senate to "fill the ranks of the army."—[This bill authorizes the enlistment of minors and a motion to strike out that part of it was lost—53 to 51.] Afterwards some time was spent on the volunteer bill.

December 3.—Progress was made in the bill to fill the ranks of the army, and in some other business.

December 5, (Monday).—Mr. Eppes from the committee of ways and means reported a bill supplemental to the act authorizing a loan for the several sums of twenty-five millions of dollars and three millions of dollars, which was twice read and committed.

[This bill authorizes the issuing by the treasury department to the amount of any part of the authorized loans not borrowed, or not having come into the treasury, treasury notes, in lieu thereof, in the usual form.]

The house took up the bill for filling the ranks of the army—an amendment was made so that the recruit under twenty-one years of age should be allowed four days, unrestrained, after enlistment, to re-consider and withdraw the same. The bill was then ordered to a third reading 93 to 55, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Alexander, Alston, Anderson, Archer, Avery, Barbour, Bard, Barnett, Bines, Bowen, Bradley, Burwell, Calhoun, Cannon, Chappell, Clark, Clifton, Conrad, Condict, Conrad, Crawford, Crouch, Cuthbert, Dana, Davis, of Penn. Denoyelles, Desha, Duval, Eppes, Fisk, of N. Y. Forney, Forsyth, Franklin, Gholson, Goodwyn, Goudin, Griffin, Hall, Harris, Hasbrouck, Hawes, Hopkins, of Ken. Hubbard, Humphreys, Ingersoll, Ingham, Irving, Irwin, Johnson, of Virg. Johnson, of Ken. Kennedy, Kerr, Kershaw, Kilbourn, King, of N. C. Leferts, Lowndes, Lyle, McCoy, McKee, McKim, M'Lean, Montgomery, Moore, Nelson, Newton, Ombsy, Parker, Pickens, Piper, Pleasant, Rea, of Penn. Rheas, of Tenn. Rich, Roane, Robertson, Sevier, Seybert, Sharp, Skinner, Smith, of Virg. Tannehill, Taylor, Telfair, Trout, Udree, Ward, of N. J. Williams, Wilson, of Penn. Yancy—92.

NAYS—Messrs. Baylies, of Mass. Bayly, of Virg. Bigelow, Boyd, Bradbury, Breckenridge, Brigham, Butler, Caperton, Ciley, Cox, Culpepper, Davenport, Davis, of Mass. Ely, Gaston, Geddes, Grosvenor, Hale, Henderson, Howell, Hurlbert, Jackson, of R. I. Kent, of N. Y. King, of Mass. Lewis, Lovett, Macon, Mosley, Markell, Oakley, Pearson, Pickering, Pitkin, Potter, John Reed, Wm. Reed, Ruggles, Schureman, Sheffield, Shipdard, Smith, of N. Y. Stanford, Stockton, Sturges, Taggart, Thompson, Vose, Ward, of Mass. Webster, Wheaton, White, Wilcox, Wilson, of Mass. Winter—35.

December 6.—The volunteer bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading—read a third time, passed and sent to the senate.

The bill to fill the ranks of the army was read a third time as amended and passed—95 to 52, and sent to the senate for concurrence. Several other bills were progressed in.

The house, on motion of Mr. Eppes of Virg. resolved itself into a committee of the whole, Mr. Breckenridge, of Va. in the chair, on the bill supplemental to the act authorizing a loan for 25 millions, and the act lately passed authorizing a loan of three millions for the service of the current year.

[The first section of the bill authorizes the secretary of the treasury, with the approbation of the president of the United States, to direct treasury notes to be prepared, signed and issued for and in lieu of so much of the sum authorized to be borrowed on the credit of the United States, by the twenty-five million and three million loan acts, as has not been borrowed or otherwise employed in the issue of the treasury notes, according to law, provided the whole amount so to be issued shall not exceed 7,500,000, and applied to the same uses as the loans so authorized were intended to be applied.

The second section authorizes the issuing of treasury notes in like manner for a further sum of three millions, to defray the expenses of the war department for the remainder of this year, and one million for the navy department.

The third, fourth, fifth and sixth sections provide these treasury notes shall be in the same form and possess the same qualities as the treasury notes already authorized, be redeemable in the same manner, appropriate money therefor, &c. as well as for the expenses of issuing and distributing said notes and for punishing counterfeiters thereof.]

The bill having been read through—

Mr. Eppes quoted extracts from the letter last received from the secretary of the treasury, which we take this opportunity to publish at length, viz:

Washington, Dec. 2, 1814.

Sir—Your letter of the 27th of November has been referred to the committee of ways and means, and I am instructed to ask for the amount of the payments to be made during the present quarter on account of the public debt, the funds prepared to meet those payments, and any other information which may enable the committee to decide as to the necessity of adopting additional measures for meeting the public engagements during the present quarter of the year.

I have the honor to be your most obedient,

JOHN W. EPPES.

Honorable Mr. Dallas.

Secretary of the Treasury.

Treasury Department, December 2, 1814.

Sir—I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your letter, dated this morning, stating that mine of the 27th of November, addressed to the committee on a national bank, has been referred to the committee of ways and means.

In my communications to the committees of congress, I have never been disposed to disguise the embarrassments of the treasury. A frank and full development of existing evils will always, I hope, be best calculated to secure the attention and exertion of the public authorities; and, with legislative aid, I am still confident, that all the difficulties of a deficient revenue, a suspended circulating medium, and a depressed credit, may be speedily and completely overcome. My only apprehension arises from the lapse of time; as a remedy which would be effectual to-day, will, perhaps, only serve to increase the disorder to-morrow.

In answering the enquiries of your letter, permit me to state: 1st. The amount of the payments which were to be made during the whole of the present quarter on account of the public debt, and the funds prepared, or applicable to meet those payments: 2d. The payments that remains to be made and the funds that remain to meet them, for the residue of the quarter; and, 3d. General information in relation to additional measures, for meeting the public engagements.

1st. point. It is respectfully stated, agreeably to an estimate which was formed on the 4th of October, 1814:

Dr.
1. That during the quarter commencing the 1st of Oct. 1814, and ending the 1st of January, 1815, including both days, there was payable for the principal and interest of treasury notes, during the whole quarter, chiefly at Boston, New-York and Philadelphia, a sum of	4,457,063 80
2. That during the same period, there was payable for the principal and interest of temporary loans, at Boston, Baltimore and Charleston, the sum of	771,125
3. That during the same period, there was payable in dividends upon the public funded debt, at the several loan offices, the sum of	1,900,000
	dolls. 7,128,184 80

Cr.
1. That there were bank credits scattered throughout the United States, on the first of October, 1814, amounting by estimate to	2,500,000
2. That there was receivable from the customs during the whole quarter, the sum of	1,800,000
3. That there was receivable on account of the sales of public lands, during the same period, a sum of	160,000
4. That there was receivable on account of the internal duties and direct taxes, during the same period, a sum of	900,000
5. That there was receivable on account of loans, during the same period, a sum of	1,700,000
6. That there might be obtained, upon an issue of treasury notes, during the same period, a sum of about	2,500,000
	dolls. 9,560,000

From which it results,

1. That the amount of the whole payments for dividends of public debt, for temporary loans, and for treasury notes, during the whole of the current quarter, was	7,128,184 80
2. That the amount of the whole of the estimated receipts of the treasury, was	9,560,000

Leaving a surplus of receipts of

dolls. 2,431,805 20

It is believed that this estimate, formed upon official facts and experience, would have been substantially realized in the event, if the banks had not suddenly determined to suspend their payments in specie. But for that occurrence, the dividend on the public debt would have been punctually paid to the individual creditors of Boston on the first of October last; the transfer of the public funds from one place to another place, in order to meet the public engagements, would have continued easy and certain; the credit and use of treasury notes (limited to the specified amount) would probably have been preserved; and the revenue arising from duties and taxes, would not have been materially intercepted, if at all in its passage to the treasury, by payments in treasury notes.

2. Point.

Dr.
1. That of the principal and interest of the treasury notes; payable during the present quarter, and which have already fallen due, there remains on this day unpaid, at the places mentioned in the schedule A, the sum of	1,902,630 80
2. That the principal and interest of the treasury notes which will become due on or before the first of January, 1815, at the places mentioned in the schedule B, amount to	1,210,720
3. That the dividends on the public debt payable on the first of January, 1815, at the places mentioned in schedule C, amount to the sum of	1,273,000
4. That the principal and interest of temporary loans, payable during the present quarter, and contracted at the treasury, in part execution of the authority granted by the act of congress, passed the 14th of March 1812 and payable at Boston on the fifteenth and thirty first of December, amount to 506,875

Cr.

1. That on the 29th ultimo, there were bank credits in the banks specified in the schedule D, applicable to the payment of the public debt during the present quarter (deducting the amount of bank credits (813,000) which, as it could not be transferred for the payment of public debt, has been recently applied to the appropriations for the war and navy departments) amounting to	2,371,287 12
2. That the amount receivable during the remainder of the present year, on account of the loan of 5 millions, applicable, also, to the payment of the public debt, if no failure in payment occurs, will be about	450,000
3. That the estimated amount, receivable during the remainder of the present year, on account of customs, applicable, also, to the payment of the public debt (subject, however, to various contingencies, such as the non-payment of bonds, the payment of bonds in treasury notes, &c. may be stated at	350,000
4. The estimated amount, receivable during the remainder of the present year, on account of the sales of public land, subject, however, to contingent payments in treasury notes, may be stated at	150,000
5. The estimated amount, receivable during the remainder of the present year, for internal duties and direct tax, subject, however, to contingent payments in treasury notes, may be stated at	450,000

dolls. 3,772,287 13

From this second view of the debt and credit of the account, admitted merely to the payment of the public debt, becoming due for the residue of the present quarter, it appears,

1. That the debt amounts to the sum of	5,526,275 80
2. That the resources to pay the debt (excluding the sum applied to the army and navy departments as before stated, and excluding the possible proceeds of new loans, and new issues of treasury notes, for the single purpose of paying public debt) amount to	3,772,287 13
	dolls. 1,753,988 67

The difference between the results of the statements, under the first and second points, will be accounted for, by the unexpected effect of payments in treasury notes, on account of duties, taxes and land; by the total cessation of the use of treasury notes, either to pay the public creditors or to raise money; and by an unavoidable variance in estimates, depending upon a variance in the state of information at the treasury. A priority of payment may be justly claimed by the holders of the funded debt; and, therefore, it is proper to add,

1. That the amount of public credit, as estimated in the preceding statement, is the sum of	3,772,287 13
2. That the amount of the dividend on the old and new funded debt, payable on the first of January, 1815, is the sum of	1,873,000
3. And that, consequently, the surplus of the resources, after satisfying that single object, is the sum of	dolls. 1,899,287 13

It will be observed, that these estimates do not include, as an item of the debt, the dividend of the funded debt, amounting to 200,000 dollars, which was not actually paid to the individual creditors at Boston on the 1st of October last. But it is omitted, because an adequate fund in the state bank was seasonably provided for the occasion, and the usual treasury draft was issued in favor of the commissioners of loans, so as to deduct a corresponding amount from the bank credits of the government. The state bank declined, for several reasons (which it is unnecessary to repeat) paying in coin, or in bank notes, and most of the public creditors refused to accept the treasury notes, which the banks offered to them, as an alternative payment. It is not considered, that, under these circumstances, connected with the general state of the circulating medium (which places the power of the government to meet its engagements, on the same footing with the power of the most opulent of its citizens) there can exist any just reproach upon the public credit, or resources. But, nevertheless, efforts have been anxiously made by this department, and are still in operation, to satisfy the public creditors, independent of the fund which was originally set apart, and which still remains on deposit at the state bank, by all the remaining means at the disposal of the treasury.

Nor, on the other hand, have I included in the statement of our resources to pay the public debt, the unexecuted authority to borrow upon public loans, and to issue treasury notes. I have only included the items of revenue, which, in ordinary times, would be deemed certain and effective; reserving any surplus of those items, with the loan and the treasury notes, to meet the general appropriations for the public service.

Third point.—It is respectfully stated, that the non-payment of the treasury notes, and the hazard of not being able to pay the dividend on the public debt, according to the respective contracts, was chiefly (I believe entirely) owing to the suspension of specie payments at the banks, and the consequent impracticability of transferring the public funds, from the place in which they were deposited to the place in which they were wanted. I have endeavored, therefore, to induce the banks, as the performance of an act of justice, not inconsistent with their interest, or their policy, to assist in alleviating the fiscal embarrassments of the government, which they have thus contributed to produce. The answers to my last proposition (of which a copy is annexed, in schedule B) have not been received.

But the danger of depending upon gratuitous aids, (of depending, indeed, upon any thing but the wisdom and the vigilance of congress) makes, with every day's experience, a deeper impression upon the mind. In speaking, therefore, of additional measures for meeting the public engagements, during the present quarter of the year, I derive great satisfaction, in reflecting upon the inevitable and immediate effect of the legislative sanction (even so far as it has already been given) to a settled and productive system of taxes, for defraying the expenses of government, and maintaining the public credit. This policy, embracing, in its course, the introduction of a national circulating medium, and the proper facilities for anticipating, collecting and distributing the public revenue, will, at once, relieve the public credit, and even the existing resources of the present quarter, must ripen and expand under an influence so auspicious. But something may be conveniently and usefully added. For instance:

1. A discretionary authority may be given, by law, to issue treasury notes, for the amount of the sums now authorized to be raised by law.
2. An authority may be given, by law, to transfer bank credits, from one place to another place, in order to meet the public engagements allowing a reasonable rate of exchange.
3. Appropriations may be made, by law, to defray the extra expenses of the war and navy departments, during the present year; and a general authority may be given, to borrow, or to issue treasury notes, to supply any deficiency in former appropriations for those departments, and for the payment of the public debt, the treasury notes and the civil list.

The present opportunity enables me to assure you, sir, that I am preparing, with all possible diligence, to report to the committee of ways and means, upon the subjects which they have been pleased to commit to me.

1. The tax-bills are numerous, new in some of their principles, and complicated in most of their details; nor are the best sources of information at hand. They will, however, be drafted, and sent to the committee in succession.
 2. The plan for establishing a competent sinking fund is under consideration, and will, probably, be ready to be reported, before the tax-bills are passed.
 3. The estimates for the expenses of 1815; the annual appropriation bill; and the bills to authorize a loan, and an issue of treasury notes for that year, are, also, objects of attention.
- I have the honor to be, very respectfully, sir, your obedient servant,

A. J. DALLAS.

John W. Eppes, esq. chairman of the committee of ways and means.

Mr. Eppes then examined the object of this bill, which was to carry into effect the secretary's recommendations except that part which relates to the transfer of funds from one quarter to another, which they had determined to postpone until the question relating to a national bank should have been finally acted on, &c.

The blanks in the bill were then filled, on motion of Mr. Eppes, with seven and a half millions to supply the possible deficiency in the two loans, and with three millions for the deficiency in the provision for the military, and one million for the deficiency in the provision for the naval service for the remainder of the present year.

No debate took place on the principle of the bill. Some discussion and amendment took place on the section for punishing counterfeiters of the bills, in which Messrs. Gaston, Ward and Jenkins of Ken. took part.

The committee at length rose and reported the bill; which, the amendments having been concurred in, was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading to-morrow.

The house then resolved itself into a committee of the whole, on motion of Mr. Eppes, on the bill making further appropriations for the support of the government during the remainder of the year, Mr. Lewis in the chair.

Mr. Eppes read a letter he had received from the secretary of war in relation to the deficiency of appropriations in that department; from which it appeared that though it was impossible to ascertain with precision at this time the number of militia in service during the past summer, there was little doubt but their expenses would greatly exceed the appropriations made for those objects.

On motion of Mr. Eppes, the blanks in this bill were then filled with three millions for the military department, one million for the naval department and other sums for the expenses of congress, &c. &c.

And the committee rose and reported the bill, which as amended, was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

Mr. Ingersoll laid upon the table, without preface, the following resolution:

Resolved, That the committee on military affairs be instructed to report to this house a bill or bills for classifying the free white population of the United States from the age of twenty-one years to the age of forty-five years, for the purpose of drafting therefrom a sufficient number annually to fill up the ranks of the regular army.

2. Resolved, That the committee on naval affairs be instructed to report to this house a bill or bills for the immediate, constant and gradual augmentation of the navy of the United States by adding annually (with the least possible delay in the amendment and progress of the system) to the ships of the line, frigates, sloops of war, and other vessels now built or building.

The consideration of them not being required at this time, they lie on the table of course.

The remainder of this day's sitting was occupied in committee of the whole, on the consideration of the bill authorizing the president to call into service 80,430 militia for the defence of the United States.

Thursday, December 8. The engrossed bill "supplemental to the acts authorizing a loan for the several sums of 25 millions of dollars and three millions of dollars," was read the third time and passed.

The engrossed bill making additional appropriations for the service of the year 1814, was read a third time and passed.

Friday, December 9. Mr. Eppes reported two bills for supporting the public credit—the first to lay a duty on various goods, wares and merchandise manufactured within the United States—the other to tax horses kept exclusively for the saddle or carriage, and on gold and silver wares.

The bill respecting militia drafts was discussed in committee of the whole. A motion to strike out the first section was discussed at length; negatived, only 44 rising in favor of it.

Saturday, Dec. 10. The bill from the senate "to incorporate the subscribers to the bank of the United States of America," was twice read and referred to the committee of ways and means.

The house resumed the consideration of the report of the committee of the whole on the senate's bill to authorize the president to call into service 80,430 militia for the defence of the frontiers.

After a heavy debate, negatived—55 for, 95 against it. Several ineffectual motions were now made to adjourn, &c.

The house then proceeded to consider and separately to agree to all the amendments reported by the committee of the whole. That amendment made in the committee of the whole, on motion of Mr. Eppes, to reduce the term of service of the militia to be drafted, from two years to one year, was agreed to by the following vote:

A motion was then made by Mr. Macon to amend the bill, as recommended by the select committee of this house, so as to place the apportionment on the basis of free white population, instead of the basis of representation in congress, on which the senate had placed it.

And the yeas and nays having been required on this motion—

The house at length adjourned, a little before 8 o'clock, after a sitting of nearly ten hours.

The house resumed the consideration of the bill from the senate authorizing a draft of 80,430 militia, for the defence of the frontiers.

The motion of Mr. Macon, to place the apportionment of the draft on the basis of military strength (or free white population) instead of the basis of representation on which it now stands, being under consideration,

Mr. Kennedy supported the motion at considerable length; and other gentlemen spoke for and against the motion; which was at length decided in the negative by the following vote:

YEAS—Messrs. Alexander, Alston, Archer, Barbours, Bayles, of Virg. Bines, Breckenridge, Burwell, Caperton, Caldwell, Chappell, Clark, Clifton, Conrad, Crawford, Culpepper, Desha, Eppes, Evans, Findley, Forsyth, Franklin, Goodwyn, Ghoslen, Glasgow, Goodwyn, Hall, Hawes, Humphreys, Ingham, Johnson, of Va. Webster, Wheaton, Wilcox, Williams, Wilson, of Mass. Wright—51.

The bill having been further amended—

A motion was made by Mr. Webster, of N. H. to amend the bill by striking out those words, as applied to the term of service of the drafted militia: "for the term of one year from the time of meeting at the place of rendezvous unless sooner discharged" and to insert these words to serve for the term prescribed by existing laws; that is to serve for six months instead of one year.

On this motion a question of order arose, when the speaker decided it to be in order, and, his decision being appealed from, was confirmed by yeas and nays, 129 to 29.

After some debate on this point, the question on Mr. Webster's motion was decided as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Alexander, Avery, Baylies, of Mass. Bayly of Va. Bigelow, Boyd, Bradley, Brookley, Breckenridge, Brigham, Burwell, Butler, Caperton, Champion, Cilley, Comstock, Cooper, Cox, Culpeper, Davenport, Davis of Mass. Davis of Penn. Roane, Robertson, Sage, Sevier, Seybert, Sharp, Smith of Penn. Tammehill, Taylor, Telfair, Troup, Udree, Ward of N. J. Wilson of Penn. Yancey—79.

So the motion was negatived by a majority of one vote.
Tuesday, December 13.—The bill respecting militia drafts being again before the house—and Mr. Wright's motion to reduce the term of service to seven months (made yesterday) being under consideration. After debate, the proposition was rejected—71 for 84 against it.

Mr. Baylies of Mass. moved to amend the bill by adding thereto the following as a new section:

"And be it further enacted, That the militia called forth by virtue of this act shall not be liable to perform any service, except such as may be necessary to repel invasion, suppress insurrection, or execute the laws of the union."

This motion was negatived, by yeas and nays—104 to 58.

Mr. Kilbourn moved to extend the term of service to one year and eight months—lost; 68 for, 95 against it. Mr. Fisk, of Vt. moved that the bill should be recommitted. After a short speech from Mr. Johnson on the necessity of pushing on business, the previous question was called for by Mr. Ingersoll, which being proposed in the usual form, was agreed to, 191 to 57.

The main question, viz. on the engrossing of the amendments and ordering the bill to be read a third time, was decided in the affirmative by the following vote:

YEAS—Messrs. Alexander, Alston, Anderson, Archer, Avery, Barbour, Bard, Barnett, Bins, Bowen, Brown, Caldwell, Calhoun, Cannon, Chappell, Clark, Clifton, Comstock, Condict, Conrad, Crawford, Creighton, Culbrett, Davis of Penn. Stanford, Stockton, Sturges, Taggart, Thompson, Vose, Ward of Mass. Webster, Wheaton, White, Wilcox, Wilson, of Mass. Winter, Wright—71.

And the said bill was ordered to be read a third time to-morrow.

On motion of Mr. Eppes, the house in committee of the whole took up the tax-bills last reported, and made some progress therein.
Wednesday, December 14.—Mr. Fisk of N. Y. from the committee of ways and means, reported a number of amendments to the bill from the senate to incorporate the subscribers to the bank of the United States of America; which were read, and, with the bill referred to a committee of the whole.

Mr. Eppes offered for consideration the following resolution: Resolved, That the committee on post-roads be instructed to enquire whether any and if any what change ought to be made in the compensation allowed to post-masters; and whether any, and if any, what change ought to be made in the right of franking. Agreed to.

The bill from the senate to call upon the several states and territories for their respective quotas of 60430 militia for the defence of the frontiers against invasions was read a third time as amended.

Mr. Ward of Mass. and Mr. Gaston of N. C. spoke at considerable length in opposition to the bill, and Mr. Farrow in favor of it. The previous question having been required by Mr. Rhea the bill was then taken and decided as follows:

For the previous question

87

Against it

63

The main question on the passage of the bill was then taken, and decided in the affirmative by the following vote:

For the bill

81

Against it

72

After several ineffectual attempts to amend the title of the bill, it was adopted without any further amendment than the insertion of $2,000,000 out of $3,300,000, to make it correspond with the contents of the bill.

Thursday, Dec. 15. The House, on motion of Mr. Eppes, of Va. resolved itself into a committee of the whole on the bill "to provide additional revenues for defraying the expenses of government, and maintaining the public credit, by laying duties on various goods, wares and merchandise manufactured within the United States."

[The bill proposes to lay on the following manufactures the duties specified in the following extract from the bill: on Pig iron, per ton, one dollar.

Castings of iron, per ton, one dollar fifty cents.

Bar iron, per ton, one dollar.

Rolled or slit iron, per ton, one dollar.

Cut nails, brads and sprigs, made wholly, or in part, by machinery, per pound, one cent.

Candles of spermaceti or white wax, per pound, ten cents.

Mould candles of tallow, or of wax other than white, or in part of each, per pound, three cents.

Dipt candles of tallow, or of wax other than white, or in part of each, per pound, one cent.

Hats, caps, of leather or fur, and bonnets, except made entirely from wool, silk, cotton or linen, or in part from each, or which, if made from any of these materials, shall not exceed in value one dollar and fifty cents, eight per centum ad valorem.

Paper, five per centum ad valorem.

Playing cards, fifty per centum ad valorem.

Saddles and bridles, six per centum ad valorem.

Boots and booties, exceeding five dollars per pair, in value, five per centum ad valorem.

Beer, ale and porter, six per centum ad valorem.

Tobacco, segars, and snuff, twenty per centum ad valorem.

Leather, including therein all hides and skins, whether tanned, tawed, dressed, or otherwise made, on the original manufacture thereof, ten per centum, ad valorem.

Mr. Eppes assigned at some length the reasons why the committee had, on those manufactures, departed occasionally from the instructions of the house, and generally preferred an ad valorem to a specific duty; the principal of which was the great variety in quality and denomination of these articles, which, whilst it would make specific duties vexatious, would render them liable to continual evasions. All the articles proposed to be taxed, he further said, pay a much higher duty when imported, and, whilst the last section of the bill limited the operation of the tax to the continuance of the double duty now imposed by law, no article had been selected for taxation which it was believed the United States could not manufacture in abundance for their consumption. In the present situation of the country, concerning it unnecessary to say any thing on the necessity of imposing additional taxes, he waived any remarks on that head.

Mr. Baylies, of Mass. moved to strike out the following words in the above enumeration: "cut nails, brads and sprigs, made wholly or in part by machinery, one cent per pound." And supported his motion in a speech of some length. Mr. Eppes replied, and the motion was negatived, ayes 39.

Mr. King, of Mass. then proposed a reduction of the tax on nails. Negatived—ayes only 31. Mr. Forney moved to reduce the tax on pig iron—negatived. Then the tax on hollow ware—negatived. Mr. Wheaton proposed to modify the tax on hats, so as to except those made of straw, which was agreed to. A motion to strike out the tax on leather was negatived, ayes only 42. Mr. Macon moved to amend the above taxing acts, by striking out one dollar and fifty cents and inserting two dollars—agreed to.

Mr. Wilson, of Mass. moved to amend the above extract, by striking out all the proposed taxes, except those on pig iron, castings, bar and rolled and slit iron, playing cards, beer, ale and porter, and tobacco, segars and snuff, and to insert in lieu thereof the following:

"And on flour, 5 cents per barrel.

corn, 5 cents per bushel.

cotton, 2 cents per bushel.

hemp, 2 cents per pound.

sugar, 2 cents per pound.

rice, 1 cent per pound.

tobacco, 1 cent per pound.

On copper and leaden ore, and coal of mines, ten per cent, ad valorem. On steam engines, if employed in factories, 50 dollars; if employed in propelling boats, 100 dollars; and when an exclusive privilege chargeable therewith, 200 dollars.

On offices, created by authority of the United States, whose emolument, by salary or perquisites, shall not exceed 1,500 dollars, and not exceed $500 dollars, one per centum, and on those which exceed $500 dollars, five per centum, on such excess, except those offices whose emoluments are prohibited from diminution by the constitution: Provided, that a sum of each of the foregoing products, as shall be consumed by the owner, shall be exempted from taxation."

Mr. Wheaton supported his proposition by a train of reasoning, at length—but the ayes for it were only 13.

Mr. Fisk, of N. Y. moved to amend the bill so as to exempt from the operation of the tax, all such castings as the government may have contracted for to be delivered at stipulated prices. This motion was opposed by Mr. Eppes, and negatived, by a decided majority.

Mr. Oakley moved to strike out the articles of dipt candles; which motion was supported by Mr. Eppes, and decided in the affirmative by a large majority.

Mr. Oakley moved to except from taxation altogether all mould candles of tallow. Negated by a large majority.

Mr. Reed moved to strike out spermaceti candles—decided in the affirmative—yeas 54, nays 50.

Mr. Udde of Pa. moved to amend the clause for taxing iron castings, by adding thereto the following proviso:

"Provided, That all castings made use of in furnaces and forges shall be exempted from paying the duty thereon." Negated by a large majority.

Mr. Pitkin then moved to reduce the proposed tax on leather from ten to five per cent. Negated. He then moved to strike out the proposed tax on pig iron—negated ayes 32.

Mr. Baylies moved to strike out five per centum, the proposed tax on paper, and insert three in lieu thereof. This motion was supported by Mr. Eppes, and decided in the affirmative.

Mr. Bradbury, of Mass. then moved to except from the clause for taxing paper, such paper as is used for printing newspapers. He said it had been the policy of free governments to encourage the diffusion of information, which this tax would have a tendency to check, &c.

Mr. Eppes opposed this motion, not from any disposition to suppress newspapers, because he did not believe it would have this effect; but because he believed the proprietor of a newspaper who by his business made his four or five thousand dollars a year, was as fit a subject for taxation as the manufacturers, many of whom derived less profit from their business, &c.

The motion was negated by a large majority. The house proceeded to the discussion and amendment of the bill. And, about 4 o'clock the committee rose and reported their proceedings to the house—and

The house adjourned.

Friday, December 16. The amendments of the senate to the bill for laying additional duties on sales at auction, postage, and retailer's licenses, were taken up and referred to the committee of ways and means.

The house resumed the consideration of the report of the committee of the whole on the bill to impose duties on certain goods, wares and merchandise.

The proposed exemption of spermaceti candles was concurred in—63 to 50: also of pig candles, 83 in the affirmative. Visiting cards were subjected to the same tax as playing cards—63 to 29. Mr. Hayles renewed his motion, to exempt nails—lost 39 for, 106 against it. Mr. Higelow moved to strike out the clause for taxing nails "made wholly or in part by machinery"—negated. Mr. Higelow renewed his motion about leather—lost, 57 for 97 against it. Mr. Kerr moved to reduce the tax on manufactured tobacco to 10 percent—negated, ayes 31.

Mr. Oakley moved to amend the first section of the bill so as to reduce the proposed tax on leather from ten to five per cent, ad valorem; which motion, after considerable debate, was agreed to by the following votes—For the motion 10—Against it 53.

Mr. Kilbourn, then moved an amendment, the object of which was to tax candles of spermaceti, at the rate of three cents per pound; which motion prevailed, by the following vote:

For the motion	71
Against it	61

Mr. Wheaton moved to amend the bill by adding, after the clause for taxing cut nails, &c. the following words—"when sold."—This motion was negated.

Mr. Shipherd moved to amend the bill so as to confine the proposed tax on paper to writing and letter paper; under the idea that those qualities of paper could best afford to pay a tax, and from a desire to exempt from taxation all printing paper, and such paper as is used in schools, and in common farmers' and mechanic's books, &c. &c.

Mr. Ingham remarked, that the gentleman had unfortunately selected for taxation the two qualities of paper which could least bear it. He was himself opposed to any discrimination in the tax.

Mr. Shipherd's motion was negated by a large majority.

Mr. Pitkin renewed his call upon the attention of the house to what he deemed the impolicy of the tax on pig iron. He dwelt upon the inefficiency of taxing the raw material of manufacture; and added, that there was not on this article, as on others, any duty on its importation, &c. It was imported, if at all, duty free.

The question on this motion was decided in the negative, by yeas and nays, by the following vote:

For the motion	49
Against it	97

Mr. Forney, then moved to strike out the words "taxing of iron, per ton, one dollar and fifty cents; and to insert in lieu thereof, "shall ware, one dollar per ton and other castings seventy-five cents per ton;" which motion was negated.

Mr. Ruggles made a motion to reduce the tax on candles of white wax, from ten cents per pound to three cents per pound; which motion was negated.

Mr. Kim of Mass. then moved to reduce the duty on nails, spikes and nails, from one cent per pound to half cent per pound; which motion was negated.

Mr. Bradbury moved to amend the clause taxing paper, by inserting thereafter the words "except such as shall be used in printing of bibles, testaments, and common school books;" which motion was negated.

And the bill was then ordered to be engrossed for a third reading tomorrow—and the house adjourned.

Wednesday, December 17.—The house resumed the consideration of the report of the committee of the whole house on the bill to provide additional revenue for defraying the expenses of government and maintaining the public credit, by laying duties on household furniture, on horses kept exclusively for the saddle or for the carriage, and on gold and silver watches; and the amendments made to the same in committee of the whole were read and concurred in by the House.

[The following are the taxes included in the bill: On all household furniture, kept for use, the value of which in any one family with the exception of beds, bedding, kitchen furniture, and articles in the family from domestic materials, shall exceed 20 dollars in value, a tax to be laid according to the following scale:—

If not exceeding 400 dollars,	Dols. 1 00
Above 400 and not more than 600	1 50
Above 600 and not more than 1000	3 00
Above 1000 and not more than 1500	6 00
Above 1500	10 00
2000	17 00
3000	23 00
4000	45 00
6000	90 00
If above 9000	100 00

One dollar on every horse kept exclusively for the saddle; one dollar and fifty cents for every horse kept for use in a carriage liable to be taxed; and one dollar and fifty cents for every horse kept for the use of both saddle and carriage.

Two dollars on every gold watch, and one dollar on every silver watch, kept for use.

Several unsuccessful attempts were made to amend the bill; amongst which was one by Mr. Gaston, to strike out so much of the bill as includes the tax on household furniture; which was decided by yeas and nays, as follows:—For the motion 52—Against it 99.

The bill was, after considerable discussion on the various amendments proposed to it (in the course of which Mr. Law of Conn. made a speech of great length against the bill on general grounds of opposition to the present administration, which was pretty warmly replied to by Messrs. Eppes and Wright)—ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

The engrossed bill "to provide additional revenues for defraying the expenses of government and maintaining the public credit by laying duties on various goods, wares and merchandise manufactured within the United States," was read a third time and passed by the following vote:

YEAS—Messrs. Alexander, Alton, Anderson, Archer, Avery, Barbour, Barnes, Bay, B. Van Buren, Baer, Bradley, Brown, Burwell, Butler, Caldwell, Calhoun, Cannon, Chappell, Clark, Clon, Constock, Condit, Conrad, Crawford, Crighton, Cuthbert, Danna, Davis, of Pa. Rich, Ringgold, Roane, Sage, Sevier, Sharp, Skinner, Smith, of N. Y. Smith, of Pa. Smith, of Va. Strong, Tammehill, Taylor, Telfair, Udree, Ward, of N. J. Williams, Wilson, of Pa. Wright, Yancey—102.

NAYS—Messrs. Baylies of Mass. Bigelow, Bradbury, Breckenridge, Brigham, Caperton, Champion, Cilley, Cooper, Culpepper, Davenport, Ely, Gaston, Geddes, Grosvenor, Hale, Henderson, Jackson, R. L. King, of Mass. Law, Lewis, Lovett, Macon, Miller, Mosely, Markell, Pearson, Pickering, Pitkin, Potter, J. Reed, Wm. Reed, Ruggles, Schuerman, Shetler, Sherwood, Shipherd, Slaymaker, Stanford, Stockton, Stuart, Sturges, Taggart, Thompson, Vose, Ward, of Mass. Webster, Wheaton, White, Wilcox, Wilson, of Mass. Winter—52.

By a report, from Mr. Eppes, and a message from the senate, it appeared that the bill for laying a duty of twenty cents per gallon on distilled spirits had passed both houses. After which he recommended a concurrence with all the amendments of the senate to the bill laying duties on postage, auction sales and retailer's licenses except on—which was agreed to.

Monday, December 19.—Mr. Burwell of Virg. laid upon the table the following resolution:

Resolved, That the committee on military affairs be instructed to report a bill directing the secretary of war to reserve from the regular troops furnished by the militia of any state in lieu of their own services, a sufficient number to perform garrison duty within each State.

The bill for laying duties on household furniture, or horses kept exclusively for the saddle or carriage, and on gold and silver watches was, passed—102 to 46.

The house in committee of the whole then took up the bill for laying a direct tax. The bill proposes to double the present tax, and raise six millions.

Tuesday, December 20.—Mr. Stockton offered for consideration the following resolution:

Resolved, That the committee of ways and means be instructed to inquire into the constitutionality and expediency of imposing a direct tax on the district of Columbia, and the several territories of the United States, and that the committee be further instructed to enquire into the propriety and expediency of authorising the several corporations within the district to impose a direct tax on the public property therein.

Mr. Eppes moved to lay the resolution on the table—Negated. Mr. Stockton's motion was then agreed to.

The bill for laying a direct tax was then taken up—several amendments proposed, and considerable discussion had, which occupied the house until sun-set. The amendments proposed were all negated.

Wednesday, December 21.—Of the bill for laying a direct tax of six millions, Mr. Janney moved to strike out the section that pledges the continuance of this tax to support the public credit, extinguish the debt, &c. on which a considerable debate ensued. It was finally rejected; yeas 48, nays 102, as were many other proposed amendments. The house adjourned at five o'clock.

Events of the War.

MISCELLANEOUS

FROM GHENT. From the Philadelphia Gazette—We have made it a point to inquire of an intelligent and correct gentleman who passed many weeks at Ghent previous to the 28th October, and who had daily opportunities, and those of the best, to ascertain the public opinion at that place, what was the relative degree of estimation in which the American and British ministers were held there. He informs us that the marks of attention to the American legation, by the public authorities, as well as individuals of Ghent, unequivocally manifested their high sense of the political skill and personal worth of the members composing the mission.

On the 27th of October, the anniversary of the academy of Sciences and fine arts at Ghent, the American ministers were unanimously elected members of the institution, and invited to partake in the exercises of the occasion—they accordingly attended. An oration on the objects of the institution was delivered; and in the evening a sumptuous banquet was served up to a numerous company. The British commissioners were not present; nor do we know that they were invited.—The first toast was the Prince of Orange—second, the Intendant of Ghent—third, the Mayor—and the fourth given by the Intendant was, "Our distinguished guests and fellow members, the American ministers; may they succeed in making an honorable peace, to secure the liberty and independence of their country." The effect which this toast produced was like instantaneous thunder; and some minutes elapsed in tumultuous applause before Mr. Adams had an opportunity to address the company. On behalf of the American legation, he returned thanks for the very flattering manner in which they had been treated by the municipality of Ghent; and particularly for the unexpected and undeserved honor conferred on them by the academy. He then made some remarks on the importance and great usefulness of the fine arts, and concluded by giving as a toast,

"The Intendant of the city of Ghent."

Our informant adds, that the entertainment was attended, not only by the members of the city, but some distinguished strangers. It was a splendid, and to the Americans present, a most interesting and gratifying scene."

On reading the above who will not suppose that the good people of Ghent, who treated our ministers so politely and wished them to effect an honorable peace, are under "French influence?" But to be serious, the fact is, and we are proud of it, that the name of an American is respected every where but among the pandors of idiot-royalty.

SOUTHERN COAST. Savannah, Dec. 5—It was reported that Mr. Dubignon, and a Mr. Hall, had raised a breast work on Jekyll island with the bales of cotton they had re-captured from the enemy's barges, that in the encounter with several of the barges, they were repulsed with the loss of 7 killed and 6 or 7 wounded. They afterwards however, effected a landing on Jekyll, and plundered Mr. Dubignon of 6000 dollars in specie, and carried off 35 of his prime negroes.

If the statements in the West India papers are to be believed, the expedition against New Orleans will be very formidable. All the force in those islands, together with the troops late in the Chesapeake appear to have been collecting early in last month, and it is thought the whole may amount to from 12 to 15,000 men.

A REASON AGAINST PEACE, in England, (says the N. Y. Columbian) is given by Mr. Calquhoun, the celebrated statistical writer of London. He calculates that peace will throw out of employment, 25,000 British officers, (naval and military, of different grades,) 2000 clerks, and 230,000 non-commissioned officers and privates. What an immense number of people, of all nations and tongues, not including those employed in the manufacture of arms, munitions of war &c. are kept by the English government engaged in the work of human butchery.

MURDER OF DR. MOLLY.—It is well known to the United States, that last winter the British crossed at Lewistown and took possession of fort Niagara and burned all the houses from Niagara to Buffalo, excepting two houses near the falls, and one at Buffalo in which a widow St. John lived—how these houses escaped I never learned, but I saw the whole which were burned, and the three that remained last July when I crossed into Canada, and went with major-general Brown, and general Scott, and encamped within about one mile and a half of Fort George; but the cowardly murderers prudently kept in their fort and dare not look us in the face until we returned back to Queenstown. When I was on the ground I had not heard of the murder of doctor Molly, and all the sick and wounded soldiers; had I heard of this strange barbarity, I would have looked into the remains of some large stone houses, and I make no doubt I would have seen the poor soldiers' bones among the rubbish. Tears fill my eyes when I attempt to publish the horrid barbarity of the savage British, who have so many partisans among us, who endeavor to excuse or palliate all that our enemies do—this conduct will not always go unpunished.

The British entered the house at Lewistown in which the sick soldiers and wounded lay, and notwithstanding all the entreaties, shrieks and cries of the helpless soldiers, not a life was spared; and it is reported that the houses were burned before they were all dead. Dr. Molly was a practitioner at the Eleven Mile Creek; of a humane and amiable character, and had gone to Lewistown merely as an act of benevolence, to render medical aid to the sick and wounded; seeing such barbarity, he entreated them to save his life, for he had never born arms against them, &c. His answer was profane oaths, and one of them ran his bayonet through his abdomen, and as he drew it out his bowels followed it. The good man placed his hand on his own bowels, and walked six miles to Fort Niagara, and in fifteen minutes bid a final adieu to this wicked world. Let this serve to perpetuate the memory of this good man. If any citizen can read his narrative without shedding a briny tear, I confess his nerves are stronger than mine.

I was not fully determined to publish this narrative, or I should have obtained leave to have published their names, for they lived here then, and are still living at Eleven Mile Creek, and while I was there I quartered in one of their houses. In witness to this I herewith set my name, and station in the army.

DAVID JONES,
Chaplain 9th district

Nov. 30, 1814.

HARTFORD CONVENTION met on the 15th, as proposed, in the council chamber of the state-house.—George Cabot was elected president, and Theodore Dwight, of Con. secretary. The business was opened by praying—after which the following delegates were recognized:

*On this toast being announced an elegant band of music struck up the American air of "Hail Columbia," which was received by the company with enthusiastic applause.

From Massachusetts—Messrs. George Cabot, William Prescott, Harrison Gray Otis, Timothy Bigelow, Stephen Longfellow, Daniel Waldo, George Bliss, Nathan Dane, Hodgeh Baylies, Samuel Sumner Wilde, Joseph Lyman and Joshua Thomas.

From Rhode Island—Messrs. Daniel Lyman, Samuel Ward, Benjamin Hazard, and Edward Manton.

From Connecticut—Messrs. Chauncey Goodrich, James Willhouse, John Treadwell, Zephariah Swft, Nathaniel Smith, Calvin Goddard, and Roger Minnot Sherman.

And, that, from the state of New-Hampshire, in the counties of Cheshire and Grafton, Messrs. Benjamin West and Mills Olcott, had been elected in county conventions in their respective countries, and were entitled to seats in the convention. And the Hartford Mercury, says, that on the day of the meeting "the citizens displayed the American flag thro' the day, with the English flag beneath at half mast. Three of the meeting-house bells tolled a solemn knell, and the United States' band of music played appropriate (funeral) marches through the streets. Upon the whole, we are fully satisfied that the people generally expect nothing good from this convention."

What else they have done, except to appoint two priests for chaplains, is unknown—FOR THEY SIT WITH CLOSED DOORS. A letter to the editor from Hartford informs us, that this proceeding was very ungraciously received by the people.

COUNTERFEITING—The Quebec Gazette says "counterfeit army bills, of the denomination of two five and ten dollars, are in circulation, believed to have come from the United States, and possibly countenanced by the American government."

[The American government will "countenance" no such thing. But if they did, they have many precedents afforded by the British government; who have been the most notorious forgers and counterfeiters in the world—witness our "continental money," the French assignats—and American mercantile papers, publicly sold at London, a little while since.]

TREASON—New London Dec. 7.—A special circuit court of the United States was held in this city, on Wednesday last, for the trial of John Lester, jr. and Daniel Keeny jr. charged with the crime of treason, in supplying the British squadron off this harbor, in giving information, &c. The trial of Lester took up the whole day. One or two of the witnesses, who were before the examining magistrate, were absent on the trial, and forfeited their recognizance; in consequence of which, the overt act was not proved by two witnesses. The jury found Lester not guilty; and the cases being similar, the attorneys dismissed the prosecution against Keeny. Some very pertinent advice was given to the prisoners at the time of their discharge, which it is to be hoped may prevent the necessity of similar prosecutions against other offenders.

[Though we have more traitors than there are in all the world—yet, we believe, that no one has been capitally punished for that crime. It should be better defined, or the farce of adjudication abolished.]

SPYING is travelling rapidly from Boston, &c. to Castine; and the want of it is about to be as severely felt by the late purse-proud people of that quarter as any where else. If the enemy is not driven from that post, between smuggling and dealing, he will soon drain the whole eastern country, which has nothing else than the cash to give in exchange for his goods. The trade with Amelia has a very different effect—there the rich products of the south keeps the business equalized, and makes it profitable to both parties.

BRITISH OPINIONS. From the Quebec Mercury,

November 15—"The humiliation of the Northern states is evidently the interest of Great Britain. A maritime rivalry is more to be dreaded by the United Kingdom from the federal states than from the southern states. The more the eastern states are crippled, the less is that rivalry to be apprehended, at least for a time.—The enmity, then, of the democratic party to the federalists ought in good policy to be rather cherished than suppressed. The more the two parties weaken each other, the better they serve the interests of Great Britain. Indeed Great Britain needs not a better auxiliary than the jealousy of the southern against the northern states. A peace would heal those divisions; wherefore peace is an event that may be considered, perhaps, at some distance, however desirable it might be in other points of view."

TRADE. It is well known, (says the Boston Daily Advertiser) that for some time past, there has been a constant importation of goods, principally, we believe at Hampden, from Castine, under neutral flags. A very large amount of goods, which have been regularly entered, the duties being secured according to law, is now on the way between the port of entry and this place. We are informed that orders have been just issued to the marshal for the seizure of all these goods, on the ground that Castine not being a British port, but a port of which the enemy have only military possession, a trade by neutrals between it and a port of the United States is not a legitimate neutral trade.

Copy of a letter from the secretary of the treasury to the commissioner of loans at Boston, published by request, for the information of all concerned.

Treasury department, November 9, 1814.

SIR—The depressed state of the public credit at Boston, has constantly engaged my attention since my arrival at Washington, with a view to devise the means of relieving it. The suspension of specie payments at the Banks, deprived the government of the power to pay its creditors in gold and silver, and this additional inconvenience followed from that measure, that the bank credits, belonging to the government, could not be transferred from the states, respectively, in which they existed, to any other state, in order to discharge the public debts, where they became due and payable. Every intelligent and candid citizen will perceive, therefore, that the government was unable to avert, or to control, this course of events. If, however, the measures now under the consideration of congress, should be speedily and successfully put into operation, I feel the greatest confidence, that not only the treasury, but that the nation, will be essentially relieved, from the prevailing pecuniary embarrassments.

In the meantime, I am desirous to offer to the public creditors, both on account of the stock interest due in October last, and the treasury notes since due, every accommodation, which this department can furnish, as treasury notes have been refused. You will be pleased therefore to make the following propositions to them:

1. That they subscribe the amount of their respective claims at par to the loan of 6,000,000, opened by the late secretary of the treasury, on the terms of that loan.
2. Or that they accept in payment of their respective claims, drafts on those banks (principally seated to the south and west of Philadelphia) in which there are deposits of public money.

MR. MITCHELL, late agent for prisoners at Halifax, has arrived at New-York in a cartel, being ordered from the British territory in a peremptory manner. This measure is said to have been adopted in consequence of the refusal of our government to receive a certain Gilbert Robertson in the same capacity here. The reason that Robertson was not accepted, is stated to be entirely personal. He resided in New York at the commencement of the war, and reported himself as an alien, but departed from the district that had been allotted him without permission, and got on board the enemy's squadron off New London.

Mr. Mitchell was not allowed to appoint any one in his place. He states that about the 20th Nov. between 4 and 500 Americans had been sent to England, and that there remained at Halifax 900 more. Among the passengers in the cartel were three of the citizens of Baltimore, captured in the attack on this city in Sept. last—the rest, being exchanged, will return in the next vessel.

THE BLOCKADE. In consequence of the "rigorous blockade" of all our coast, the famous privateer Chasseur, ship Essex Junior, and several other vessels for Europe and southern ports, sailed from New-York on the 21st instant!

MILITARY.

Extract of a letter from major-general Jackson to governor Early, dated Head-quarters, 7th military district, near Fort Mifflin, November 16, 1814.

"Before this reaches you, information will have been received of my visit to Pensacola.—It was occasioned by the unprecedented conduct of the governor of Pensacola, in harboring, aiding, and countenancing the British and their red allies. I entered sword in hand, with about three thousand brave followers, in the face of Spanish batteries, and a British fleet of seven sail, anchored abreast and opposite the town.—The English, by intrigue and base falsehood, induced the Spaniards to abandon the works commanding the harbor, entered them and blew them up; otherwise they would have fallen a sacrifice to their own plans. When this took place, the fleet being at liberty to go out, did so; and I evacuated the town, leaving the Spaniards favorably impressed with our conduct, and disgusted with their British friends. The hostile Indians fled across the bay at our approach; and have, no doubt, lost all confidence in the assurances they have received of British protection.—They have retired, it is believed, towards Apalachicola in great alarm.

"The Seminolies, however, it appears, from information given by col. Hawkins, are preparing to assume an hostile attitude.—When they hear of the shameful manner in which the Red Sticks were deserted by their allies, they will wish to retract.

The following was in M. S.

Gen. Jackson was opposed by the Spaniards—and several men were lost on both sides in taking the town. The British retreated to their ships, from which they fired at Jackson, but without effect.—They attempted to decoy Jackson into the fort at the time the match was burning; but he cautiously avoided it until the tremendous explosion took effect, and injured none.

5th Dec. in the morning.

Gentlemen who have arrived at Charleston from Havana report that, "the conduct of the American force under gen. Jackson, in their late entry into Pensacola, was spoken of in the highest terms by the Spaniards. After general Jackson had evacuated the place, he sent in word to the inhabitants that if any of them had suffered loss of property to let him know it, and he would immediately make their loss good."

We have gen. M. Arthur's official letter. It is long, and was received at a late hour for insertion, and must be postponed. But we regret this the less because the substance of it has already been published in his "general orders," see page 239.

Maj. gen. Scott, it appears, is to command the 10th, as well as the 4th military district.

There are a variety of reports, and many reasons to believe they are well founded, that the British are preparing for a winter campaign on the frontiers adjacent to lake Champlain. They are said to have engaged 1,000 sleighs and 10,000 buffalo robes, for the excursion; and many of the former, it appears, have been made for them within and by citizens of Vermont. The great object probably is first to destroy our fleet; though to provide for an eventual failure in this, it is positively said that they are building four large vessels, (frigates) at the Isle aux Noix, offering the enormous price of three dollars per day to American carpenters to assist them. It is intimated, however, that among that patriotic class of our fellow citizens they have found as yet very few villains. Our naval force on Ontario is to be increased.

NAVAL.

The Constitution frigate, captain Stewart, sailed from Boston, some days ago, on a frigate-hunting expedition. The New Castle, a sort of a ship of the line, rating 50 guns, and carrying not less than 64, was in the neighborhood of that port. By the following from a Boston paper of the 17th, it appears possible that a battle may take place.

"By several persons who arrived from different parts of Cape Cod last evening we are informed that the Newcastle, British frigate, went ashore at 6 o'clock on Monday evening off Wellfleet shoal ground, about 13 miles from Provincetown, where she remained in a dangerous situation 18 hours, heeling off shore in from nine to twelve feet water at low tide. Three boats were manned to go to Provincetown to procure vessels to assist in getting her off, but the wind blowing fresh, they put ashore on different parts of the cape. Twenty-three men of the boats' crews seized this opportunity to desert, who had been seen by our informants. The frigate by starting her water, and throwing over spars and other articles, got off, and arrived at Provincetown about 4 o'clock on Tuesday afternoon. Ever since her arrival there, she has remained with springs on her cables, fearing an attack from the Constitution. This is the same ship which was in sight from this town on Monday."

It is stated that the keel of a 74 gun ship has been laid at Kingston, to be ready for the lake by the middle of March—and that a frigate, to carry 56 guns, that came out in frame from England, was to be launched on the 15th of this month.

From the Wilmington, (N. C.) Gazette.

We take pleasure in referring our readers to the interesting letter from Mr. Monroe to R. Cochrane, collector of this port, which at once evinces a determination on the part of our government to conduct the war according to the established rules of nations.

Copy of a letter from the secretary of state to Robert Cochrane, Esq. collector, dated Department of State, November 25, 1814.

Sir—I have received your letter of the 12th inst. enclosing an extract from the journal of the private armed vessel Midas, of Baltimore, whereof Alexr. Thompson is the commander.

It appears by the extract, than on the 13th of September last, captain Thompson authorized a landing, with an armed force, from the Midas, at the plantation of a Mr. Barnett, on Royal Island, within the British dominions; and that the officer to whom it was confided, acting under an order from captain Thompson, "to set fire to the buildings," did actually "set fire to the whole, consisting of four habited some dwelling houses and fourteen negro huts."

The extract from the journal has been laid before the president; and, upon the unequivocal evidence which that affords of the wilful deviation of capt. Thompson from the instructions for the private armed vessels of the United States, issued at the commencement of the war, which enjoin "the strictest regard to the usages of civilized nations," he directs that the commission of the Midas be revoked; and you are requested, as that vessel is now within your district, to revoke the same accordingly.

In communicating to you this determination of the president, it is proper to remark, that, by whatsoever acts of flagrant outrage, upon defenceless towns and property of unarmed and unresisting individuals, the British naval and military officers on our maritime and inland frontiers, may have provoked or may hereafter provoke, severe measures of retribution, it is for the government alone to prescribe the manner and the means of retaliation.

Have the honor to be, sir, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

JAMES MONROE.

Robert Cochran, esq. Collector of the Customs, Wilmington, N. C.

Baltimore.—They had it at Antigua, November 7, that Baltimore had been destroyed by the "shield of afflicted humanity"—that it had been in possession of the British twenty-four hours, and that another of our frigates, the Java, was burnt!

A Jamaica paper has the following queer article, on the same subject. It is among the most comical accounts we have seen. It contains one truth, and that is the date of the attack—

"By the arrivals on Saturday, we are put in possession of some particulars of the landing of the British near Baltimore on the 14th ult. It appears that about 5000 troops, under the command of major general Ross, effected a landing within a few miles of the city, whither they were met by the American force of about 9000 men, an obstinate engagement then took place, which continued nearly 48 hours, when the British finding that considerable reinforcements were coming up to aid the Americans, re-embarked, with a very trifling loss. General Ross was killed shortly after landing, while reconnoitering. Immediately after the embarkation of the troops, admiral Cochrane shifted his flag to the Surprise frigate, and with the small vessels and bombs, commenced a heavy bombardment against fort M'Henry; much damage must have been done, as the soldiers were seen flying in all directions. The city of Baltimore was also assailed, and considerable injury done to the buildings from the number of shells thrown; one vessel (the Meteor, now in port), having discharged near 300.

The Americans had undermined the lines at Baltimore, and it was their intention to have blown up the city, should the British have become the masters of it.

Captains Rodgers and Porter having been ascertained to be assisting in the defence of fort M'Henry, admiral Cochrane sent a flag with a message to captain Porter, reminding him that he was a prisoner of war on parole, and desired that he would immediately deliver himself up for the purpose of proceeding to Halifax, intimating at the same time, that if he refused to comply, he must expect to suffer death should he ever fall into the hands of the British, for violating the law of nations, he being a prisoner on parole, and engaged in defence of his country previous to being regularly exchanged, although he had solemnly agreed with captain Hillyar, at the time captured, to respect rigidly this law;—this was not complied with."

London, September 24.—A report of the taking of Baltimore has reached Plymouth, and is consistent enough in circumstance with all the previous movements with which we were acquainted in the Chesapeake bay. It is, however, supposed that this intelligence is as yet nothing more than an anticipation of what is likely to happen; and much as we shall hail every blow struck at these braggard and mischievous enemies, there is not a spot in the whole United States where an infliction of Britain's vengeance will be more entitled to our applause than on this sink of jacobinical infamy—Baltimore.

Kingston, (Jam.) Nov. 9. We have been favored with the following division order issued by colonel Brooke, after the attack on Baltimore:

Head Quarters, North Point. 14th Sept. 1814

The unfortunate and greatly to be lamented death of major general Ross, having placed the command of his majesty's troops, employed in the Chesapeake, in the hands of colonel Brooke, on the 12th of September; he begs the different officers in the command of brigades and corps to accept his thanks for their cool, steady, and determined conduct, against a much superior and strongly posted force of the enemy. They will be pleased also to communicate to the officers, non-commissioned officers, soldiers and seamen, under their command, the high sense he entertains, and the gratitude which he feels for their distinguished conduct, and irresistible valor, in using their utmost exertions to bring the enemy to the bayonet.

To capt. Carmichael he is much obliged for the manner in which he brought his guns into action.

To the staff of major general Ross, as well as to captain Mitchell, of the royal artillery, and captain Blanchard, of the royal engineers he is sensibly indebted for the handsome manner in which they offered their services. Captain Crofton, commanding the seamen of his majesty's ships, acting on shore, as also captains Sullivan, Money, and Ramsay, are greatly entitled to his best thanks, and he begs they will believe he most gratefully feels and values their very great exertions, witnessed by himself, in maintaining the utmost order and regularity amongst their men, during the hottest of the enemy's fire, and he will ever feel proud in having the brave sailors attached to the land force, which at any time he may have the honor of commanding.

POLITICAL DIVINITY. From the N. Y. Columbian.
"War is a national punishment for national sins." Good.

The English nation is more at war than any other in Christendom. True.

Then "the bulwark of our holy religion" is the greatest sinner in Christendom. Undeniable logic.

ANECDOTE. An American officer who carried a flag over to the British lines, after having dispatched the business of his mission, was invited by the British commanding officer to dinner. As usual, the wine was circulated, and a British officer being called upon for a toast, gave—Mr. Madison, "dead or alive," which the yankee drank without appearing to notice. When it came to the American's turn to give a toast, he gave—the Prince Regent, "drunk or sober." "Sir," said the British officer, bristling up and coloring with anger, that is an insult." No, sir, answered the American very coolly, "it is only a reply to one."—Pet. Courier.

All the subscribers to the REGISTER have been furnished with omni sine qua non—and it is hoped that all will see the necessity, as well as justice, of complying with our demands, founded, as they are, on perfect reciprocity. The object of striking off names, is to reduce the wasteful expence of paper, and it will be impossible that the files of individuals, which shall be broken by this unpleasant procedure, can be made good, without purchases from the beginning—as every one, so completed, would break a set of the work.

With a due sense of gratitude to the many gentlemen acting as agents, who are also my friends, it is right to say, I am convinced that a large portion of the trouble I have had on this account belongs to others, who have proffered their services but neglected, through other business, to perform the duties they voluntarily engaged. As they only stand in the way of some who would do my business, I invite all those who are unwilling, or unable, properly to see to my little affairs, to settle up as far as they have gone, and hand in their resignations.

A considerable portion of the quantity of matter in this sheet, though in a small compass, is allowed to a record of the proceedings of congress, which, for present reading or future reference, especially the latter, are very interesting.

Agriculture, Manufactures and Commerce.

The following, communicated by an intelligent friend, has been on file several months. The time is apt for its publication, and we specially recommend a consideration of it to the Hartford convention and other declaimers on commerce. I am not aware that any material errors exist in the calculations, so far as they go; and, certainly, the amount is very moderate. Many items might fairly be added which cost an immense sum annually, that pertain to neither of the general propositions. How loudly do these facts call upon us to look at home, and seek and secure, within ourselves, that comfort and happiness which the American people seem most happily situated to possess and enjoy. We are not the enemies of foreign trade, commonly called commerce—it acts well as an aid to agriculture and manufactures, and so far we esteem it; but its importance, compared with these, is like “a drop in the bucket.”

The various manufactures of the United States have probably exceeded the value of three hundred millions of dollars in the year that closes this day.—This is a reasonable estimate. Put the amount by the side of the most prosperous year of commerce and see how contemptible that thing is about which we make so much noise. Commerce produces nothing; and its profits, which, certainly, never have exceeded 20 millions in a year, (and I doubt if they have averaged the half of that sum) is all we can pass to its credit—whereas the amount made up by agriculture and manufactures contributes exactly so much to the wants, the conveniences, the luxuries, or the wealth of a country.

The writer of this article, altho' more connected with the external trade than the manufactures of his country, (in consequence of his business depending entirely on external commerce)—has long entertained an opinion that, compared with the internal trade of the United States, our commerce with foreign nations has been estimated at a value far beyond its real worth. From that foreign commerce we may date the bloody and expensive war in which we are now engaged, and which, it is probable, will swallow up all the profits that have really resulted directly from commerce since the revolution. But, as almost every evil has its attendant good, so this state of things may produce a revolution in opinion and action, the beneficial effects of which will be felt for ages to come, if we have the prudence to avoid war and foster the arts of peace. To render those opinions more clear to the reader, I shall venture upon some calculations. It will not be pretended, however, they are absolutely accurate, but will be found sufficiently so to verify the position I mean to assume, “that the value of our foreign commerce is trivial when compared with the sum requisite to supply the people of the United States with the necessities, the conveniences, and the luxuries of life,” which they enjoy; and it is with much satisfaction that I avail myself of some of the sentiments of the editor of the Emporium, vol. V. page 278, on this subject.

After some curious examinations and calculations relative to the quantity of food necessary for the maintenance of a person for one year, he gives his readers the following result:

“The grain required for one man per annum then will be 8 1 2 bush. a 125 cts.	$10 62 1/2
“Meat 365lb. 1 lb. per day, at 6 cts.	21 90
“Whiskey” or other drink equivalent to	15 00
“Fuel, vegetables, pepper, salt, &c.” may be fairly considered at least	7 47 1/2
	$55 00

He adds, “I am not at this time aware of any material fallacy in the above calculations;”—and further, “it follows then, that the yearly produce of our agriculture is worth 640 millions of dollars;” he afterwards says, “how the boasted pen givings “on foreign trade dwindle into comparative insignificance when set in competition with this.” But tho' the above sum may appear, and really is an enormous one, we have to add to it the produce of our agriculture for the food of 1,400,000 horses, (see Blodget's tables) one and a half tons of hay per annum, for each horse, will make 2,250,000 tons at 10 cents.

4 quarts of grain per day, 365 days, is	$22,500,000
63,875,000 bushels, which at 40 cts. per annum is	25,550,000
For which add the above sum of	640,000,000

And we have the enormous amount of $688,050,000

Taking the produce of our agriculture as consumed in the United States, at $688,050,000

And the provisions exported in common times at 25 millions 25,000,000

We have as the whole product of our agriculture $713,050,000

*In the year 1810 the quantity of spirits distilled in the United States, were 24 millions of gallons nearly, at 50 cents per gallon; this will be 12 millions of dollars—cyder, beer, ale, wine, brandy, rum, &c. may possibly amount to 15 dollars for each inhabitant, which would be at the rate of 4 cents per day or something more, and is a large allowance, considering that probably more than one half of the population seldom drink any thing but water—one half the people of the United States are children under 17 years of age, and of the remainder, near one half are females.

†The export of domestic produce and manufactures from the United States were in 1802, as follows:

Produce of the sea	1,481,000
the forest	4,978,000
agriculture	33,502,000
manufactures	2,174,000
uncertain	231,675
	42,366,675
Of foreign produce	24,391,295
	$66,757,970
10 per ct. profit is	6,675,797

And assuming 8 millions as our present population, it is at the rate of 89 dollars to each individual for food and drink, and for the food of his horses, without taking into view the pasturage of 1,400,000 horses, for six months of the year, and which at 25 cts. per week, would amount to $18,200,000.

Let us suppose the product of our agriculture to be per annum $700,000,000

And apply again to the Emporium, page 279, "the dress of a labouring man cannot be estimated at less than 25 dollars per annum."

And as before assuming the population of the United States at 8 millions, we have as the cost of clothing our citizens for one year 200,000,000

Budget, some years since, calculated the houses in the United States at 1,375,000, worth on an average 200 dollars (a low calculation) five per cent. may surely and safely be added for repairs of houses, and the erection of new ones per annum—this will be 13,750,000

Carriages, waggons, carts, stages and other carriages, chairs, sulks, &c. one to each 100 families, at 100 dollars each, is 8000 carriages—8000 carriages at 100 dollars each, is 800,000 dollars—suppose each of those carriages to sink its whole value, including cost of repairs, in seven years, the annual expence then will be 114,265

†Calculations carefully made shew that the clothing of children (averaged at 7 years old) will cost 25 dollars per annum.

In the neighbourhood where the writer resides there is a carding machine which cards for the inhabitants within the vicinity, 7000lbs. of wool per annum. In the U. States there are, probably 3000 carding machines; and supposing them to card 5000 lbs. each, on an average, we have an amount of 15 millions. This wool is made use of in the domestic way, mixed with cotton, flax and tow; and, independent of what is employed for stockings, may produce 15 millions of yards of different kinds of stuffs.

We have no data for calculating the number of woolen manufactories in the United States; but there are five within 9 miles of where this is written. Of cotton spindles at work, we may safely, it is presumed, reckon 500 thousand; from these, at the rate of one half pound of yarn per week, we may calculate as the annual product thirteen millions pounds of yarn—converted into a great variety of stuffs, and made use of generally in the domestic way—producing perhaps 26 millions of yards, of stuff per annum.

A manufacture of cotton sail cloth has commenced here. The article looks well, but has not been sufficiently tested; should it succeed, and the United States employ one million and a quarter of tons of shipping as they have done, and clothe them with cotton sails at 10 yards to the ton, it will require half a million of spindles to provide yarn for so much sail cloth. This will be the work of years to come; but a million of spindles will consume 26 millions of cotton per annum, which amount would probably be equal to more than one half of our export of cotton wool in peace and prosperity, if we had no cotton works. The consumption of cotton wool for our different manufactures is, at the present moment, supposed to be equal to one third of the export of the United States in that article, in times of peace. What a change in 10 years!

Repairs to, and additional mills and manufactories, per annum	1,500,000
Shoeing 1,400,000 horses, per annum	1,000,000
New tools and repairs of old do. for agriculture and handicraft employments (a.)	1,000,000
Watches or clocks for 1,300,000 families—one to each family at 20 dollars each is 26 millions—for interest per annum, and repairs, take 8 per cent. and we have	12,080,000
Rings, jewels, fowling pieces, &c. &c.	120,000
House furniture for 1,300,000 families at 200 dollars each, 260 millions—for interest repairs and decay, say 10 per cent. per annum	26,000,000
Coasting vessels, and vessels in the river trade, say 500,000 tons, at $30 per ton, is 15,000,000 for interest repairs and decay, say 20 per cent. per annum	3,000,000
	$948,564,265

Making nine hundred and forty eight millions, five hundred and sixty four thousand two hundred and sixty five dollars, as the sum representing all the annual internal labor of the U. States—(independent of all profit arising from the internal sale and exchange of commodities) which is at the rate of about 118 dollars, for each individual.

This sum of 948,564,265 dollars, divided among the families of the United States, averaging each family at six persons (1,334,000 families) would be at the rate of 711 dollars to each family, representing thereby the food, clothing, fuel, house rent, repairs of house-hold goods, food for their cattle of all kinds, travelling expences, &c. &c. for such a family—beside whatever profit might result from any profession, trade or occupation, such family carried on over and above their annual expences.

But as, in the opinion of the writer, 711 dollars is too large an average including all the families in the United States, let us adopt another mode of calculation as follows:

8 millions of persons, their food reckoned at 75 cents per week for one year, is	$312,000,000
Food for 1,400,000 horses as before	49,875,000
Clothing for 8 millions of persons at 25 dollars per annum, is	200,000,000
Interest and repairs on 1,375,000 houses, at 11 per cent. reckoning nothing for new houses	30,250,000
8000 carriages at 100 dolls. to be sunk in 8 years	100,000
Repairs to, and new mills and manufactories, per annum	1,000,000
Clocks and watches as before	2,080,000
Personal ornaments, &c.	100,000
House furniture 260 millions, at 8 per cent.	20,000,000
Vessels engaged in coasting, river, and sound trade—say 500,000 tons as before, at 15 per cent.	2,250,000
	617,655,000

(a) This appears to me as estimated a great deal too low. The next is, probably, too high; but that which follows is far less than the amount expended annually, for those things; many other items, the product of labor, should be added, which pertain to neither of the general heads mentioned; such, for instance, as the business of the paper maker, printer and bookbinder, cum multis aliis. EDITOR.

which is less than professor Cooper thinks the agricultural productions alone of the United States are worth; it will, notwithstanding, be sufficient for our present purpose. But as we intend to credit our external trade for the whole amount of its worth, it is right to notice the 25 millions or our productions which go to make up that trade and to include it with the above, will produce $642,655,000, making the yearly charge of each family of six persons, 481 dollars, or 80 dollars to each individual.

Now, it is believed, that the whole exports of the United States for any three years since the establishment of the government has not amounted to 10 millions—but taking the whole at that sum, the domestic productions at 40 millions and the foreign productions and manufactures at 60 millions, and allowing for freight, insurance and profit, 20 per cent. or 20 millions; yet, with this liberal allowance, what a trivial proportion does it bear to the 642,650,000 stated above! Of that sum 80 dollars is necessary to every individual in the country, on an average; but the profit on commerce, admitting it to amount to 20 millions, is but at the rate of $2.50 to each citizen on an average, or a 32d part of the value to him of the labor of our own country. Yet it will not be denied that foreign trade is of great importance, as it gives a spring to all other business by promoting a demand for the surplus of our food and our manufactures; but, if by any arrangement, that surplus could be employed in the country, we should have no occasion for foreign trade, as respects that surplus. True, we should want many of the manufactures of Europe for a few years; but in the United States, where the human mind, and body too, are left at such perfect liberty, a few years only would supply us with those manufactures that habit has rendered necessary, if it became the interest of the citizens to do so, and they were secured from the interference of foreign nations, as far only as a good and a prospective policy would dictate. Witness the progress which has been made in the manufactures of cotton and wool in a few years. Let any man disposed to examine how long it will require to place this country in a state of independence on foreign manufactures, turn his view back to the days of our revolutionary war, and consider how trivial were our manufactures then to what they are at present. It is not in wool and cotton only that the country has progressed so rapidly, but in almost all the articles necessary to the comfort of the people. For two years past an insignificant proportion of the clothing of the inhabitants has been imported, and has any real want been experienced? on the contrary, do not our manufactories already either supply us with the stuffs ready made in large quantities, or place in the hands of the people the means of supplying themselves, from the carded wool and spun cotton, which now is so common?

As to sugar, we must be supplied from Orleans and Savannah—for tea and coffee and the produce of foreign climates, we must still be dependent. Spirits are already manufactured in injurious quantity. Wine is a native of our soil, and only wants cultivation and care. Iron, lead, copper and coal we have. Let us only enjoy peace, and the means of the entire independence of the country is within it, if we employ them aright—but "There are whom Heaven has blessed with store of wit,

"But want as much again to govern it."

The project of offering some "speculations on the value of the property represented by the members of congress from the several states," though supposed difficult to perform, is much more laborious than I apprehended it to be. Much dexterity in reading, writing and calculation has been bestowed on the subject; but it is questionable whether, with the means in possession, we shall arrive at that probability which should always belong to things of the kind. The "midnight oil shall again be trimmed," and the statement, if made out to my own satisfaction, be inserted—if not so, our readers will hear no more about it. In the progress of the examination, however, many curious statistical facts have unfolded themselves, which we shall have the pleasure to present and preserve on some other occasion.

The Goths at Washington.

"THE COSSACKS SPARED PARIS, (says the London Statesman.) BUT WE SPARED NOT THE CAPITOL OF AMERICA."

FOREIGN OPINIONS.

Paris, Oct. 6. We receive every day details respecting the horrible catastrophe which has annihilated one of the finest cities in the world. [The writer should have said building.] How could a nation eminently civilized, conduct itself at Washington with as much barbarity as the old banditti of Attila, and Genesic? Is not this act of atrocious vengeance a crime against all humanity? Robespierre, who, seconded by his execrable accomplices, the committee of public safety, burnt the towns of La Vendee, ordered the massacres of Toulon and Beloin, and demolished the city of Lyons, is devoted to the execration of ages. The revolutionary Vandals, who devastated France in 1793, and took a ferocious pleasure in destroying or mutilating the monuments of the arts, were men taken from the lowest ranks of society, wretched Sans Culottes, agitated by all the fury of the revolution. But from the bosom of the most enlightened nations of the world, there should go forth a military chief, who, without fanaticism, without any extraordinary motive of vengeance, without any of those violent passions which disturb the understanding, should have imitated the fury of the most savage hordes, should have carried fire and sword into the heart of a city, whose riches and beauty formed one of the most valuable monuments of the progress of arts and human industry; that he should have made war, not upon his enemies, but upon columns of temples, public edifices and palaces; that he should have devastated for the pleasure of devastating; who can contemplate all this without grief and indignation? During twenty years Europe has groaned under the horrors to which the frightful genius of revolution has given birth. England was justly indignant at these excesses, and now, when sentiments of humanity have reanimated all hearts, it is she that renews in America these scenes of carnage and desolation. If she believes that such conduct will frighten her enemies and conquer them by terror, she deceives herself. Injustice and barbarity revolt still more than they affright. They communicate to the soul an unknown energy, they raise the spirit of even the most pacific, and produce bold and desperate determinations which secure the safety and independence of nations.

Another Paris paper says,—"It is most assuredly not without the most painful feeling that our readers will have perused the details we have given them respecting the capture and destruction of the capital of the United States of America. Thus, then, the war is prosecuted in the new world with the same character of fury as for so long a period spread desolation over the old. It there exhibits the same spectacle of devastation and horror, at the moment when we flattered ourselves with the prospect of beholding the revival, even in the midst of battles, of those principles of humanity and the law of nations, which polished and civilized people ought never to violate. Was it intended to furnish him with an excuse, who was justly charged with trampling under foot all those principles, by imitating his barbarous example? What! the English who reproached him with such force and justice, with spreading pillage and conflagration wherever he went, with ruining and destroying the towns that submitted to his armies, now make themselves masters of Washington, plunder and lay it waste, blow up all its public establishments and public edifices, and carry off in their ships all that they do not choose to destroy by fire and sword—it is not an absolute foreign city, and to which tie, none of those ancient relations which doubtly claim the rights of humanity, might have to ensure a less severe fate, that they have thus treated it; it is a city, which may be called English, which speaks the same language, which has the same manners, and is composed of inhabitants whose fathers were English.

In the last war, which has divided England from the United States, our wishes and our feeling have been constantly in favor of the English arms. The English combated the general enemy of Europe—the enemy of France in particular. The American government seemed to have espoused the odious cause of our tyrant—it thwarted the active war made upon him, by declaring itself against England, whom we considered as the soul of the coalesced powers, and whom we heartily wished to see performing a part at once so brilliant and so honorable. We, moreover, beheld in Madison and his party, adherents to those democratic principles, which brought upon us such calamities; we wished, therefore, that his party might fail. But how much was it to be wished, that hostilities had ceased in America, as in Europe, on the fall of him who had given the signal for them in all parts of the world? Why, at least, has not war itself experienced the good effect of that?—Why is it conducted in the manner of pirates who land upon a coast to ravage it, and then precipitately embark again, not feeling themselves sufficiently strong to occupy it and maintain their position? Was it not, in this manner that the English landed, to the number of five thousand, as it is said, at Washington, and then fled, after having ruined, and as it were, swept from the face of the earth one of the finest capitals in the world, which most forcibly struck by its magnificence and its establishments one of the most celebrated travellers of the present day, M. de Humboldt? Is it thus that the hero whom they hold forth with just pride to the admiration of Europe, made war in Portugal, in Spain, in France!

The English have often preached up excellent principles of morals and humanity; they have often justly reproached their enemies with violating those principles; but let them beware—their edifying sermons and their severe reproaches will lose much of their force, if they themselves commit those excesses of which they accuse others. Their enemies assert, that it is rather their own interest than that of humanity, which in general governs their morality and their conduct; that at this moment, for instance, when they are so zealously pleading the cause of the negroes, it is less out of love for the Africans than from jealousy of the French colonies; we, indeed, believe no such thing; but we must confess that frequent examples, such as that which they have just exhibited at Washington, would grievously embarrass their friends.

From the Liverpool Mercury.—"There are few of our readers but who will form their own comments on the capture and destruction of the seat of government of the United States of America; and to their own comments we shall therefore, on this particular occasion, leave them. We love the true glory, the true honor of our country; and therefore, while we applaud the spirit and intrepidity of our seamen and soldiers, who were the brave instruments of this successful enterprize, we shall add nothing at present to the sentiments which we have frequently and recently expressed, on the justice and policy of such warfare. We will content ourselves with asking the most earnest friends of the conflagratory system, what purpose will be served by the flames of the senate house at Washington? If the people of the United States retain any portion of that spirit with which they successfully contended for their independence, the effects of those flames will not easily be extinguished."

The London Statesman says "It is not by flying squadrons, burning wooden houses, tobacco sheds, and attacking defenceless towns, we can terminate the war or conquer America; we tried Virginia expeditions under general ARNOLD and others, the last American war, when they were poor, and not one third their present population; but all would not do, nor is it reasonable to suppose it can have a better effect now. The present war, if continued, will be ruinous to our commerce, our seamen will emigrate, and our navy be left without men; and our declaring their coast, 2000 miles in extent, in a state of blockade, is as ridiculous as Napoleon's paper declaration was when he issued it against Great Britain and dependencies. In a climate so boisterous, ask any seaman who is acquainted with the coast of America, if he can keep his station for one day on it from September to May, a period of at least seven months out of twelve, how then can such a coast be blockaded?"

The capture of Washington was received in London with great exultation and joy, the park and tower guns were fired for three days successively, at 12 o'clock at noon.

A gentle rebuke.—We learn by a late London paper, (says a writer in the New York Mercantile Advertiser) that the representative of the fast anchored Isle, the great lord Wellington, elated at the irruption of the Goths and Vandals into the District of Columbia, laying waste the monument of the arts erected by a grateful people to commemorate the name of the great and good Washington, and in which was deposited the national library, invited the choice spirits of the city of Paris (among whom were all the foreign ministers) to banquet on this ignoble deed: but, alas! not one of the latter honored him with their presence. This admonition speaks more than volumes to the modern Vandals.

Extract of a letter from Washington to a gentleman in Philadelphia.—"The beautiful hall of the house of representatives is ruined past repair, and what remains no doubt must be pulled down; for it seems that the free-stone, of which it is constructed, flies to pieces in the fire. The large pillars that surrounded the hall have dwindled into slender posts. The figures and leaf work, which were carved upon them, have crumbled into dust—and it appears dangerous to walk among their gigantic remains.

"In the north wing the fire has been equally destructive. The beautiful polished marble columns of the senate chamber are burnt to lime—but in both wings enough remains to excite admiration of the talents and genius of the architect, the whole of whose labors for many years have been in one day destroyed."

To the editors of the National Intelligencer.—"The city of Rhodes was once saved by a picture; when that city was besieged by Demetrius, king of Macedon, he being able to attack it only on that side where Protogenes was painting. His first intention was to burn the city; he chose rather to abandon his design than to destroy so fine a picture—this was long before the birth of our Saviour. Those people were called heathens, and were unacquainted with the covenant of grace. What think you of a nation who styles itself the bulwark of the Christian religion, and wantonly destroys the mansion-house once occupied by our late venerable Washington?—A. B.

The Attack on Washington,

London Gazette Extraordinary.

Colonial department, Downing-street,
September 27, 1814.

Captain Smith, assistant adjutant-general to the troops under the command of general Ross, arrived this morning with a despatch from that officer, addressed to earl Bathurst, one of his majesty's principal Secretaries of state, of which the following is a copy:

Tonant, in the Patuxent, August 30, 1814.

MY LORD—I have the honor to communicate to your lordship, that on the night of the 24th instant, after defeating the army of the United States on that day, the troops under my command entered and took possession of the city of Washington.

It was determined between sir A. Cochrane and myself, to disembark the army at the village of Benedict, on the right bank of the Patuxent, with the intention of co-operating with rear-admiral Cockburn, in an attack upon a flotilla of the enemy's gun-boats under the command of commodore Barney. On the 20th instant, the army commenced its march, having landed the previous day without opposition: on the 21st, it reached Nottingham, and on the 22d moved on to Upper Marlborough, a few miles distant from Pig Point on the Patuxent, where admiral Cockburn fell in with and defeated the flotilla, taking and destroying the whole. Having advanced to within sixteen miles of Washington, and ascertaining the force of the enemy to be such as might authorise an attempt at carrying his capital, I determined to make it, and accordingly put the troops in movement on the evening of the 23d. A corps of about 1300 men appeared to oppose us, but retired after firing a few shots. On the 24th, the troops resumed their march, and reached Bladensburg, a village situated on the left bank of the eastern branch of the Potomac, about five miles from Washington.

On the opposite side of that river, the enemy was discovered strongly posted on very commanding heights, formed in two lines, his advance occupying a fortified house, which, with artillery, covered the bridge over the eastern branch, across which the British troops had to pass. A broad and straight road leading from the bridge to Washington, ran through the enemy's position, which was carefully defended by artillery and riflemen.

The disposition for an attack being made, it was commenced with so much impetuosity by the light brigade, consisting of the 85th light infantry and the light infantry companies of the army, under the command of colonel Thornton, that the fortified house was shortly carried, the enemy retiring to the higher grounds.

In support of the light brigade, I ordered up a brigade under the command of colonel Brooke, who, with 44th regiment, attacked the enemy's left, the 4th regiment pressing his right with such effect as to cause him to abandon his guns. His first line giving way, was driven on the second, which, yielding to the irresistible attack of the bayonet, and the well directed discharge of rockets, got into confusion and fled, leaving the British masters of the field. The rapid flight of the enemy, and his knowledge of the country, precluded the possibility of many prisoners being taken, more particularly as the troops had during the day, undergone considerable fatigue.

The enemy's army, amounting to eight or nine thousand men, with three or four hundred cavalry, was under the command of gen. Winder, being formed of troops drawn from Baltimore and Pennsylvania. His artillery, ten pieces of which fell into our hands, was commanded by com. Barney, who was wounded and taken prisoner. The artillery I directed to be destroyed.

Having halted the army for a short time, I determined to march upon Washington, and reached that city at 8 o'clock that night. Judging it of consequence to complete the destruction of the public buildings with the least possible delay, so that the army might retire without loss of time, the following buildings were set fire to and consumed—the capitol, including the senate house and house of representatives; the arsenal, the dock-yard, treasury, war office, president's palace, rope-walk, and the great bridge across the Potomac: in the dock-yard, a frigate nearly ready to be launched, and sloop of war, were consumed. The two bridges leading to Washington over the Eastern Branch had been destroyed by the enemy, who apprehended an attack from that quarter. The object of the expedition having been accomplished, I determined, before any greater force of the enemy could be assembled, to withdraw the troops, and accordingly commenced retreating on the night of the 25th. On the evening of the 29th we reached Benedict, and re-embarked the following day. In the performance of the operation I have detailed, it is with the utmost satisfaction I observe to your lordship, that cheerfulness in undergoing fatigue and anxiety for the accomplishment of the object were conspicuous in all ranks.

To sir Alexander Cochrane my thanks are due, for his ready compliance with every wish connected with the welfare of the troops, and the success of the expedition.

To rear admiral Cockburn, who suggested the attack upon Washington, and who accompanied the army, I confess the greatest obligation for his cordial co-operation and advice.

Col. Thornton, who led the attack, is entitled to every praise for the noble example he set, which was so well followed by lieutenant colonel Wood and the 85th light infantry, and by maj. Jones, of the 4th foot, with the light companies attached to the light brigade. I have to express my approbation of the spirited conduct of col. Brooke, and of his brigade, the 44th regiment, which he led, distinguished itself under the command of lieutenant col. Mullens; the gallantry of the 4th foot, under the command of major Faunce, being equally conspicuous.

The exertions of captain Mitchell, of the royal artillery, in bringing the guns into action, were unremitting: to him, and to the detachment under his command, including capt. Deacon's rocket brigade, and the marine rocket corps, I feel every obligation. Capt. Lempriere, of the royal artillery, mounted a small detachment of the artillery drivers, which proved of great utility.

The assistance afforded by captain Blanchard, of the royal engineers, in the duties of his department was of great advantage. To the zealous exertions of captains Wainwright, Palmer, and Money, of the royal navy, and to those of the officers and seamen who landed with them, the service is highly indebted; the latter, capt. Money, had charge of the seamen attached to the marine artillery.—To captain M'Dougal, of the 85th foot, who acted as my aid-de-camp, captain Falls, and to the officers of my staff, I feel much indebted.

I must beg leave to call your lordship's attention to the zeal and indefatigable exertions of lieutenant Evans, acting deputy quarter-master-general. The intelligence displayed by that officer in circumstances of considerable difficulty, induces me to hope he will meet with some distinguished mark of approbation. I have reason to be satisfied with the arrangements of assistant-commis. gen. Lawrence.

An attack upon an enemy so strongly posted, could not be effected without loss. I have to lament that the wounds received by col. Thornton, and the other officers and soldiers left at Bladensburg, were such as prevented their removal. As many of the wounded as could be brought off were removed, the others being left with medical care and attendants. The arrangements made by the staff surgeon Baxter for their accommodation have been as satisfactory as circumstances would admit of. The agent for British prisoners of war, very fortunately residing at Bladensburg, I have recommended the wounded officers and men to his particular attention, and trust to his being able to effect their exchange when sufficiently recovered.

Captain Smith, assistant-adjutant-general to the troops, who will have the honor to deliver this despatch, I beg leave to recommend to your lordship's protection, as an officer of much merit and great promise, and capable of affording any further information that may be requisite.

Sanguine in hoping for the approbation of his royal highness the prince regent, and of his majesty's government, as to the conduct of the troops under my command, I have, &c.

I beg leave to enclose herewith a return of the killed, wounded and missing in the action of the 24th inst. together with a statement of the ordnance, ammunition, and ordnance stores taken from the enemy between the 19th and 25th August, and likewise sketches of the scene of action and of the line of march.

Return of ordnance, ammunition and ordnance stores taken from the enemy by the army under the command of major-general Robert Ross, between the 19th and 25th or August, 1814.

AUGUST 19.

1 twenty-four-pounder carronade.

AUGUST 22.

1 six-pounder field gun, with carriage complete,

156 stand of arms with cartouches, &c.

AUGUST 24, AT BLADENSBURG.

2 eighteen-pounders, 5 twelve-pounders, 3 six-pounders, with field carriages.

A quantity of ammunition for the above.

220 stand of arms.

AUGUST 25, AT WASHINGTON.

BRASS.—6 eighteen-pounders, mounted on traversing platforms; 5 twelve-pounders, 4 twelve-pounders, 1 five and half-inch howitzer, 1 five and half-inch mortar.

IRON.—26 thirty-two-pounders, 36 twenty-four-pounders, 36 eighteen-pounders, 27 twelve-pounders; 2 eighteen-pounders, mounted on platforms; 19 twelve-pounders, on ship carriages; 3 thirteen-inch mortars, 2 eight-inch howitzers, 1 forty-two pounder gun, 5 thirty-two pounder carronades, 5 5 eighteen-pounder carronades, 13 twelve-pounder guns, 2 nine pounder guns, 2 six-pounder guns.

Total amount of cannon taken—206.

500 barrels of powder.

100,000 rounds of musket-ball cartridge.

40 barrels of fine grained powder.

A large quantity of ammunition of different natures made up.

The Navy-Yard and Arsenal having been set on fire by the enemy before they retired, an immense quantity of stores of every description was destroyed, of which no account could be taken; seven or eight very heavy explosions during the night denoted that there had been large magazines of powder.

(Signed) F. G. J. WILLIAMS, lieutenant

Royal Artillery, A. Q. M.

J. MITCHELL, captain commanding artillery.

N.B. The remains of near 20,000 stand of arms were discovered, which had been destroyed by the enemy.

[When the naval letters on this subject are inserted, we shall follow them by com. Barney's corrections, and notice a few other errors these despatches contain—just to shew—"British veracity."]

A WINTER CAMPAIGN is apprehended, (says the N. Y. Columbian) from the preparations reported from the enemy in Canada; and the supplies and materials for invasion are supposed to be obtained from the states, principally Vermont, where it is said too much facility is given by the legal measures adopted to discourage and prevent the detection and prevention of smuggling and traitorous intercourse. A new habeas corpus regulation has been enacted by the legislature; and it is stated that the heroic and patriot commodore Macdonough, on the day he partook of the public dinner at Burlington, was arrested and compelled to pay several thousand dollars at the suit of the wretch from whom he seized the masts and spars on their way to the enemy's fleet—an act for which, in any other country, the gallant commodore would have been rewarded, and the traitorous villain hanged.

Militia of New-Jersey, 1814.—The following statement will show the strength of the different corps of militia of this state, and the amount of the whole, agreeably to the returns of the several brigade inspectors:

	Caval-ry.	Artille-ry.	Infan-try.	Total in each brigade.
Burlington,	113	94	3,193	3,400

The commander in chief, suite and staff amount to 16, and the division and brigade general and staff officers to 72, making the total strength of the militia of this state, 37,562.

NEW ORLEANS. The fate of the much-talked of British expedition to New Orleans is probably decided before this time, from the facts stated below. As general Jackson must have been perfectly aware of this expected movement of the enemy, we trust he was fully prepared for it, and we look for the result with confidence and hope. Perhaps, and from the nature of the country and its waters we think it very possible, that New Orleans is destined to the same celebrity as Saratoga and York town.—The commanding general will find a great co-operating power in our gallant naval officers on that station, who are Porter's pupils—capable of attempting any thing that any men have ever performed.

Extract of a letter from major general McIntosh to governor Early, dated Camp Hope, December 12.

"Maj. Dale, arrived at col. Hawkins' last evening, brings the following intelligence:—fifty or sixty British vessels had arrived at the Balize (mouth of the Mississippi). Gen. Jackson had marched for New Orleans. The infantry from all quarters of his district were marching in the same direction.

"Maj. Blue of the 39th, with about 15 or 1600 mounted men, Choctaws, Chicasaws and Creeks, were to march on the first inst. for Alpalachicola, in pursuit of the Red Sticks and their allies. Lieut. Carey of the U. S. army, and his associates, 3 men and a woman and child, passing on westwardly are missing. They left fort Jackson by water. The woman and child have since been massacred in the streets of Pensacola, having only time to state that she was of this party and that the men were killed.

THE FLORIDAS. It is said that the British have negotiated an exchange of Trinidad for the Floridas, with Spain. As Canada has been acknowledged to be held as a "rod over the back" of the "rebel colonies," we may suppose that by this transfer of enemy intends to hold two "rods" over us, that she may occasionally give our frontier people one of the pious Sam Johnson's "whippings," such as "roasting them alive," &c. as that "religious" thing, thought we ought to have received for our "rebellion."

MAINE. It appears from statements which have reached us in the Boston papers, that government had determined to attempt the expulsion of the enemy from the district of Maine. It seems, however, that the design has been abandoned from the refusal of the governor of Massachusetts to assist in rescuing a part of his own state from the hands of a foreign enemy. The historian who records this must support the fact by many vouchers, or even the people of Asia, who meekly pass from one conqueror to another, will not believe him. The enemy's force at Castine is estimated at about 13 or 1400 men.

MANUFACTURES. We are gratified beyond expression to observe the progress made to independence, through domestic manufactures. They are instantly rising to the demand of the country. Every time that the spindle goes round we lop off a little from the immense British influence that pervaded our land, to the transformation of our people into shapes and forms that Ovid never thought of! May the righteous work prosper, and go on to the fullness of strength!

I think it not only possible, but probable, that in 10 or 15 years, we may raise more fine wool than all Europe. It is proved, that the Memo increases in value on our soil, and that they are of better quality here than in far-famed Spain. The fabled golden fleece is really ours; in the space allowed (10 or 15 years) the United States will be the grand market of the world for wool; and this branch of agricultural pursuits will produce more than the boasted commerce we had, if the demand for it be sufficiently great. I believe we have the only country, Spain excepted, where this breed of sheep does not depreciate.—With the stock on hand, as we have land enough, we may have in that time 10,000,000 Merinoes—say they produce 3lbs of wool each, and their annual value will be 60,000,000 dollars!—This is speculation; but, gentle reader, not wilder than if a man, ten years ago, should have said that we might have our present quantity now—or that we should drive between a half a million and a million of cotton spindles in the year 1815. Nay, it is moderate, compared with what has happened.

These few remarks, such as I delight to indulge myself in, occurred on seeing it stated in a Pittsfield, (Mass.) paper, on the 15th inst. that within the week past there had been sent from that place towards Albany, N. Y. no less than thirty bales of woollens, the manufacture of that [Berkshire] county—and that other greater quantities had been sent in the same direction, by the same person, within a little while before. These cloths, it adds much to our pleasure to learn, were mostly manufactured in private families; the plan that, of all others, we wish may be pursued; as it brings the whole labor of the people into active and healthful employment, and is without the many objections to which large establishments are liable. It is astonishing to be informed of the extent to which this industry is applied. Many of the most elegant belles that trip our streets are covered with superb shawls, and otherwise protected from the cold, by the labor of their own hands—hands that, heretofore, chiefly sold a romance or touched a piano. Those household manufactures are a sort of clear gain to our country, and we particularly exult at the progress they make.

STATE TROOPS. The legislature of Pennsylvania have a resolution before them to raise five regiments of infantry, one battalion of flying artillery, and one of riflemen, to serve during the war, to assist in the defence of that state, and of the states of New Jersey, Delaware and Maryland.

CHAMBERS' REPEATING GUN. In the house of representatives of Pennsylvania. The committee appointed to enquire into the nature and advantages of Chambers' repeating guns and the expediency of employing them in the service of this state:

REPORT:

That in order fully to investigate the subject referred to them, they have had much personal intercourse with the inventor, have carefully examined and tried the guns themselves and have obtained the testimony of distinguished officers both of the army and navy, in favor of their efficacy. The committee abstain for obvious reasons, from any public explanation of the construction of these arms—the result, however, of their enquiry is a decided conviction that the invention is of the highest importance, not merely from its destructive powers but as occasioning a great saving both of men and money and that it is particularly entitled to the attention of the legislature as the production of a citizen of Pennsylvania—they therefore submit the following resolution:

Resolved by the the senate and house of representatives, That the governor of this commonwealth be and he is hereby authorized to contract with Joseph G. Chambers for the supply of fifty of his newly invented repeating swivels of 224 shots each with ten carriages and a complete apparatus of moulds, rods and implements adapted to field service—and also to contract with the said Joseph G. Chambers for the alteration of five hundred muskets belonging to this state, in such manner as to fit them to discharge twelve shots each—Provided, that the price of each swivel and its apparatus shall not exceed 156 dollars—of each carriage for five swivels 150 dollars—and the alteration of each musket with the rod and charger $4.12 1 2 cents to be delivered into the arsenal of this state and paid for on delivery, on a warrant drawn on the treasurer.

[The property of these guns is to fire the number of shots stated in rapid succession, 100 fast to count, but allowing opportunity to point the piece.]

MR. CLAY. A London paper says that Mr. Clay (our minister at Great) "was the man that killed Tecumseh, and that he cut several razor straps out of his back after he was dead."

This article is fully up to the comprehension of John Bull. There are millions of people in England who would believe the Americans had tails, like oxen, if told so. At the time Tecumseh, the British general and murderer, was killed—Mr. Clay was presiding over the house of representatives of the United States, at Washington city.

BANKS. A number of the banks to the eastward have recently stopped payment in specie; and if the trade with "his majesty's" port of Castine, with the usual smuggling is continued, we venture to say, without pretending to a spirit of prophecy, that all the rest will soon follow the example.

WAGGON TRADE. Charleston, December 17. A gentleman who arrived here a few days since from the northward, states that he met about four hundred waggons loaded with tobacco, between New-York and this city. There were probably at the same time a much larger number travelling the upper road, with the same articles, and for the same markets.

HARTFORD CONVENTION. We have nothing new from this congregation of lawyers,* assembled to preserve the quiet of the state, and take care of its commercial concerns, except that they are said to have refused seats to two very modest gentlemen that nobly came forward, of their own free will and accord, to represent the state of Vermont! All their proceedings are veiled in the secrecy of the Illuminati—there is a consistency in this that we admire; and they fulfil the scripture, which says, "the light is shunned by those whose deeds are evil." If, however, an opinion may be formed from the Connecticut Mirror, a paper at all times of the most violent cast, and published by their secretary, they are either going on "Jehu-like" with treason, or palized by a fear of the consequences of it; for the "Mirror" has a double portion of life and spirit; which may be intended either to prepare the people for rebellion, or spur on the lagging members of the caucus.

* We believe that more than twenty of the 26 delegates at Hartford, are lawyers.

CONGRESS AT VIENNA. By arrivals at Amelia we have a report that the congress at Vienna had been postponed to the 1st of March next. [Disbelieved.]

MILITARY.

At our last accounts from Halifax an expedition with a force of 2 or 3000 men, appeared to be fitting out that place.

Thomas Croft alias John Rodgers, and James Robinson alias James Elmore, were hung at fort Mifflin 10 or 12 days since, in pursuance of a sentence by a court martial, for the crimes of fraud, stealth and desertion.

Colonel Appling, one of Georgia's gallant sons, who has "earned a name on the Niagara frontier," arrived at Savannah on the 5th inst.

Joseph Sterett, late lieutenant-colonel of the 5th regiment, has been appointed by the governor and council of Maryland, general of the third, or "Baltimore brigade." Colonel Macdonald, of the 6th regiment, one of Pulaski's band, was the senior officer of the brigade.

The Democratic Press says—We understand that major-general Izard has been excused from serving as a member on the trial of general Wilkinson, to be held at Utica, and general Porter ordered in his place.

The 29th regiment of foot in the British army, (says the Boston Daily Advertiser) which is now at Castine, is called the Boston Regiment; it being the same that perpetrated the memorable Boston massacre. It is said that one man who was at that time a private in that regiment, still belongs to it, and is now at Castine.

It is said the British officers at Castine are building a theatre—and that they expect to import the female performers from Boston. If Boston was now as it was in 1776, they would have some other amusement.

The Virginia brigade under general MADISON, called out for the defence of the 10th district, was discharged on the 17th instant, with the thanks of major-general Scott, commanding.

Colonel Mitchel, a son of Maryland, who, as Henry the 4th of France said of one of his favorite officers, we are "happy to introduce to our friends or our enemies," has, we learn, been appointed by major-general Scott to command at Baltimore, &c. during his absence.

The youthful and gallant Towson, a Baltimorean, whose battery for its terrible fire, was known by the name of the "light-house" by the enemy, now a lieutenant-colonel of artillery, having received two brevets for his conduct on the Niagara frontier, was presented with a sword by the citizens of Buffalo, without distinction of party. His men were also from Baltimore.

Colonel Carberry of the 36th regiment United States' infantry, has published a vindication, and we think fully justified himself, against the imputation made by a committee of congress, to investigate the causes of the capture of Washington, respecting the distribution of arms to colonel Minor's regiment. See page 246.

The corporation of New York have advanced $400,000, as a loan to the United States, to pay the troops lately called out for the defence of that city.
